She saw right through me, knowing my answer was not true. I bruised my knuckles two days earlier when I punched one of those other kids' skull. Bare knuckle fighting is not like the movies: knuckles crashing into skull bones are going to leave a mark. He was still breathing after we'd stopped and for that I was thankful. We fought in a cage they built for large dogs kept in kennels. Twenty feet long and thirteen feet wide, they shoved us in there and prod us to fight. They prod us with shock sticks that emitted sparks on our skin when we resisted; sticks normally used by ranchers in the area to drive cattle into the places they wanted them to go. We "fought" for twenty minutes; it was just a sparring match of different methods and techniques as neither of us was given a blade to bring it to an end. It was a sport for money as gambling is legal on The Reservation.

Suze didn’t know it, but she had moved into a town like hell, where men were monsters who peddled children and slaughtered babies to summon devils and murder hope. This city I lived in was a “high place” where demons and men came from the desert to dance and delight. It had a strategically located airport which facilitated many of the plans of “he who shall not be named” and their Familial interests. It was at the school where so many of us went that they picked children and made them into a sport. They selected the ones who were furious fighters or seductive “screwers,” as whatever the clients desired could always be accommodated. I was their product perfected by both; these perverts had been using me for years, and I had gotten used to it. What more could they do than what had already been done? My dissociative soul split almost daily and I didn’t know why.

Suze stared into my soul, while I got lost in these thoughts. How could I tell her all these things? It would break her heart if they did not kill her for knowing. The man who lives two doors from her paid for these things. He watched us fight a teen that kicked us in the back so hard we could barely walk. To cover my limp up, they made me tell my teachers that it was from jumping off the playground too many times “performing my stunts.” Weeks before this, I’d felt like my feet had exploded when they beat them with paddles. It shatters the soul when they slap your feet so hard they blister and boil, so many nerves stinging away. The Brutes did this to me while they programmed backdoors and booby traps, which would trigger fury, rage, and murderous pain.

Then in a moment the atmosphere in the bus changed. I was not a child of God but a son of Belial, and I knew how to rid us of these questions. The girl sitting next to me was now shivering and cold. I knew it was not from the weather but from the demons in my heart that do this when they manifest. It came from the opening of a doorway from this realm to theirs. FEAR, DEATH, PAIN, SORROW – they are servants of the Dark One who were placed into me on that trapezoidal altar of gold inlay, stone, and wood.

Many eyes stared at Suze they poured out their fury and pain, and yet the girl did not care. Suze just sat there and stared as I tried to make her leave; I spoke a curse against her: "Run away and flee this place. Run away and never look back, to be tormented by demons who will make sure of that." This curse had worked on everybody before. People, especially Christians, fear these demons so much it is scary, but here sat this girl unwavering. She looked deeper still, her eyes piercing my soul. They saw past my shields, dams, and inner walls. She saw my heart not in pieces but as a whole. I knew that when her eyes had seen my heart, and she did not run away, it was something that had never happened before.

Everyone who looked deep ran away before they saw our abyss, but not this thirteen-year-old girl who wore glasses and sometimes lisped. She said,

"I am sorry, Nate, for what has happened to you. I will pray for you tonight like I always do. God told me to. He said, 'Pray for that boy no matter what he says.' So I do, Nate, because I know God loves you."

Like a match to dynamite, the atmosphere shifted from The Kingdom of Darkness to the Kingdom of Light. It was an explosion of power that caused my demons to tremble and I saw that they were afraid for the first time in my life.

She said this as my demons screamed, "RUN, RUN, RUN AWAY, GET AWAY NOW NO MATTER THE COST!" They are the words of these KEEPERS who activate this program and send us scurrying up to the front of the bus and away from her eyes. We hide and are not allowed to look anywhere but the ground, "TRANSPORTING PRODUCT KEEPS ITS EYES ON THE GROUND, OR IT GETS POUNDED DOWN." We obey, and she lets us run away. We'd never seen power like that; who knew there was power which did not hide from our dark ones and could turn the tables against us and say such kind things.

We saw her the next day, and she walked past us towards the back of the bus. We breathed a sigh of relief as our Familiars calmed down. We never saw her work her way down to the seat behind mine. My head was leaning against the window, fogging the glass. Halfway to school, we heard her whispers, and it changed our life. She said those words and opened up our heart.

She said, "Can you keep a secret?"

I don't know how she knew to say these things, but they opened up that programmed part which wrote down a letter of the words she spoke next. The message would be placed in a box; this would be sealed and floated down the river to be sent to the abyss of my heart where the children keep secrets.

"I'm sorry your heart hurts, and I know why. You gave up too early, your chase for meaning, matter, and more. You always mattered more than this and I know it is true. God told me to tell you these words when I prayed for you last night. He told me there is always hope no matter what color the robe is that they put on your back. He knows your name, Nathan, and He will bring you back."

These were words of rescue, a life raft of redemption, thrown into the midst of our chaos. She said these words as the demons exploded; they screamed at her through us as we stood to our feet, cursing again.

We bellow out, "&#! I hate your soul!"

I wanted to cry inside as they made us run again to the front of the bus. We heard her weeping, and it broke our heart. We were robots and wanted control of our body and the will of our soul returned to us. How could she know these things we told no one? We broke her heart, and she never talked to us again. She moved that next year and I don't know where. We were made to forget the words she spoke. The Brute found them when we told him so. We always told them whenever he asked us so. He made us "never remember and always forget" that Suze ever existed and that God ever cared. We lost our hope and cried all day. We wept not knowing why.

It didn't matter because she obeyed The Holy Spirit and prayed for me still. She walked by us each morning on that early bus, and smiled anyway. She smiled at me every morning for nearly a year. She sat by a fifth-grade boy only a handful of times and yet that thirteen-year-old girl saved my life. She prayed for a boy who was killing men for money, degrees, power, and control, to uphold The Secrets sworn during The Oath. She was a child of God and now so am I. She breathed His Words of hope into the abyss of my soul.

A thirteen-year-old follower of Messiah saved my life in the fifth grade, what she didn't know was that my father worshiped the light bearer (Halal Son of Sheher) in secret but went to a charismatic "spirit-filled church" down the road. The dispensationally indoctrinated pastor of that church once came into my room to try to cleanse our house. My "Christian parents" called him to ask for help. They told him I had been having night terrors for weeks and they wanted it to stop. My parents didn't tell him it's because my great-grandpa was raping me in the hours just after midnight, long before the dawn.

The pastor came into our little house and after sitting down with my parents and me, he decided to go and look into my room. I could feel the fear smash into him when he stepped into our defiled space. He paced around our room and then he stated that he discerned demons were in my room. He said this was what was causing my night terrors, not the fear of the clock striking two. Even when that brute of a Family member didn't come and have his way with us for weeks, we would scream, panic, and kick. We thought he was coming and begged him to get out. Most nights no one would come through the door, but all too often he did.

The pastor discerned that the demons were coming from the wall I shared with my grandpa. He prayed and said they were inside the poster I had hanging up of a Jurassic Park T-REX bursting through a wall. I'd saved up my money for two months and bought it at Universal Studios when we'd been taken there the previous summer; it glowed in the dark. After hearing the pastor's words, my dad grabbed our poster off the wall and threw it out in the trash.

I saw it crumpled, wrinkled, and torn. It was my favorite thing in the room; it brought me courage in the darkness and was my only night light. I could see it in the trash from my bedroom window. I looked at it after the pastor left, feeling like he did something right. I, however, felt like he had taken my only hope. That poster meant more to me then he could have comprehended. The poster didn't have the demons on it; the man who lived in the room next to mine did. My grandpa slept there, and when he didn't sleep, he came and brutalized, manipulated, and controlled me. I believe that powerless pastor had good intentions, but he never stood a chance against The Kingdom of Darkness. He was a sheared sheep led by the wolves.

That night we gave up hope. Hours later, Grandpa came as the clock struck two, and we split off a piece of our soul too big to survive what he did. We tore away a chunk of our heart and threw it in the trash outside. That poster was our night-light, but instead, we had darkness fill the madness of my room. We wanted to die that night. We wanted to leave this awful place they call life and be welcomed into a new one. We wanted to go and never come back, to run from this hell and get into heaven instead. We tried to find peace, but our only hope had been thrown in the trash.

We did not want to die, but we didn't know what else to do. We gave up; we couldn't take another minute of this cruel world, and we surrendered to the split. We knew it would be more painful than ever as we had so little left to tear.

Our heart was left bleeding on the floor when we finally woke up. The sun was not up yet, and we still had "to clean ourselves up." We woke up that morning believing this was all there ever was. That maybe Dutch, my friend who lived down the road from my house, had to endure incest at night. We had to assume this was normal, just like any person who wakes up with another bruise on their face justifies it away as another drunken mistake.

My heart was stuck there, and I didn't want it back. I left it in the trash, crumpled, torn, and in tatters. We watched the dump truck pull up a few days later. Our hearts sloughed into the compactors open jaw as the man pulled a black handled lever and crushed our soul. He drove off as if nothing happened; his tires bore the weight of a heart now even more broken. I watched him turn the corner and move on to the next house; I think he eventually dumped it in a mound outside of town.

What do you do when they buried your heart in a dump eighteen years ago? What do you do when the lion's share of your heart was torn off of your soul and made to pass through incestuous fires? What do you do when you wake up and have to limp to the bathroom for the second time that week? You survive and get tougher than you thought possible, or you give up and decide to die. We refused the latter and had always done the former. We were survivors.

Before I could pack my lunch, I had learned how to leave the rape, rage, and ragged edge parts of my soul in the trash outside. The men with their trucks, shovels, and bulldozers could do what they did best; bury our heart somewhere no one wanted to look. No one wanted to look at the horror or the hell that was my life any longer than was necessary. While this may work with trash, it does not work with trauma, torture, and regret.

It was not my choice to make my heart break; it had been programmed into me since I was conceived. My whole life I'd been conditioned to break along the lines my abusers scored into the surface of my soul. Some cracks broke cleanly along the prepared points of pain; others shattered splitting off shards that were sharp and deadly. One piece tore to ribbons and was left to be used as the dumping grounds of our inner world.

The Father saw us in that ragged state, in that place of pain, crumpled in a heap, He provided us a new heart of hope when He showed us the truth. That morning we woke up after our grandpa had done his deed. We'd walked to the bathroom and showered off. We dressed quickly and ate a bowl of oatmeal before the house stirred. We checked our violin and rosined its bow. We put on our shoes and walked out the door. We stood on the dirt across from our house. We shivered against the cold as we stared at our crumpled poster in the trash. We knew something terrible had happened but had "always forgotten" what. We saw the bus turn onto our street and readied our hands. We stepped onto the stairs as our bus driver, Sue, opened the door.

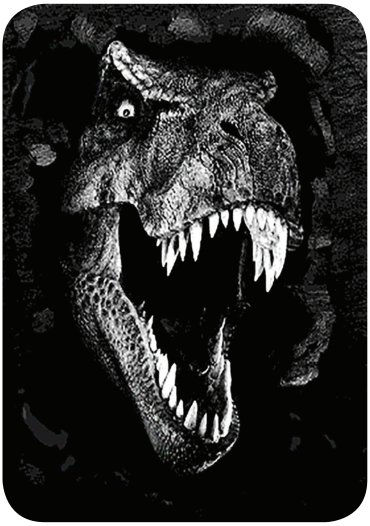
There were no seats open in the first nine rows, so we picked the tenth. We sat on the left like we always did, hoping to hide our heads on the window's frosted glass. The bus rumbled on as we gazed at that poster and thought it was trash. Our life was trash, and we hoped we might die. The bus made more stops, and before we realized it, a girl sat down next to us. We looked over and saw her then. Her smile was electric and full of life. She looked over at us for an introduction and said,

"Hi, my name is Suze."

A thirteen-year-old girl saved my life that morning. She did not know I had given up last night, but Jesus did. He sent His beloved child to protect that tattered piece of my soul and keep it breathing. She spoke such kindness to us, and her prayers kept my heart beating. She did not run from me like the other Christians but anchored herself in The Messiah. She had something the church has lost: child-like faith and a reckless love for the lost.

I write these words in desperate prayer for her and for our church. I pray she reads these words some day and knows what she did. I knew her for hardly a month, but she did more in that month than I have done in years. She spoke her words of faith boldly. The Lion of the tribe of Judah sent a teenage girl to save my heart on a cold morning many years ago. She prayed and prayed for us; we know it was true. She prayed over our heart, and those prayers kept it hidden and safe. I don't know where she went or moved off to but no matter the place, I love you, Suze. I pray your faith is broad and bold, and your courage is too.

I am alive today because someone was willing to pray, someone looked closer and saw a hurting heart and our bruised knuckles. In all the years of my life, she was one of the few. She saw us with The Father's eyes and was not scared or disgusted. She helped us know there was still hope for the hurting, abandoned, fatherless sons and daughters. She met the needs of an orphan, and The Father is so proud. She obeyed His Words and spoke The Truth.



Yahweh knew our names, and He was coming soon. He rescued us that morning as He always does. His joy broke through our burdens and pain. His light scattered the darkness and set us all free. We don't need a glow-in-the-dark T-Rex poster to escape to if we have made His refuge our dwelling place. We have hidden under the shelter of His wings. We no longer hunger and starve because His Word is our daily bread, and we have grown capable, strong, and full. Our thirst has been quenched by the Living Waters flowing from The Father's throne; we have confidence now and can enter into His presence with a boldness of faith, knowing The Lamb's blood has purchased us forever.

We are sealed by The Holy Spirit and have been given a mission from The King. We are told to go into all the world making disciples by preaching The Good News to every creature. If they are a fifth-grade boy whose knuckles are bruised or the man who locked two kids in cages for sport, they both are prisoners of pain, torment, and shame. I know the true Lord Jesus, and He came to redeem them all. We are His treasured children and its time you all know this is so. We pray people will listen but understand that most won't. We pray without ceasing knowing our prayers have power, and The Father hears and answers them all.

Save your people, Father Yahweh, we beg you now; help set them free. Set this powerless church free from its shackles. May they learn the truth: that power comes from obedience, holiness, and perfect love, which casts out all fear. That pastor was like all the others, a man who was a disciple of the doctrines of men rather than the commandments of His Creator. The Good News is not that sinners can be saved from hell so they can live a meaningless, powerless life to one day go to a happy heaven. The Good News is that the prodigal sons and daughters, the lost sheep of The House of Israel can be made inheritors of The Almighty God of heaven and earth, and with that freedom comes new hearts that walk The Way Jesus taught.

We can be clothed with power from on high like Stephen in Acts 8 or Peter who feared a child's persecutory words one day and boldly proclaimed obedience to his Master when he faced whips and scourges a few months later. There is power in the living Vine, the Body of Messiah, just not in our churches. There will never be power in our churches; there will only ever be power in the followers of The Way.

Chapter Twenty Four Learning His Ways

The power of the Church comes when we out of our love for Him choose to obey His Word. It is His Law and commandments we must once again learn in order to be empowered to fulfill our calling. The Instructions of Yahweh especially those first five books written by the finger of Yahweh Elohim are the power source for the Body of Messiah. (Deuteronomy 9) "The Law" as we read it does not mean what most Greco-Roman indoctrinated people today thinks it means, but in actuality it translates to "The Loving Instructions of The Father."

His Law is not a burden but rather the only source of blessings that comes with clear and easy to understand instructions on how to receive and fulfill it. How could any pastor or professor say that Jesus came to do away with The Loving Instructions of The Father? He told us that if we have seen Him (Jesus), we have seen The Father; their ways will never be in contradiction or at odds. (John 14) How could we, fleshly people, claim Paul advocated for disobedience to and dismissal of the doctrines of the Messiah who instructed him? Jesus walked with absolute authority on this earth because His identity was secured in His obedience to Yahweh's Instructions found in His Torah, The Prophets, and The Writings.

If Christians claim to be imitators of Jesus, then why don't they do as He did? Why don't they keep the Biblical Feasts and Sabbaths, eat what Yahweh said to eat and live as He lived? We know throughout His life He perfectly kept the commandments of the Torah, which brought a blessing that Satan himself could not take from Him. Why would we not want to be like Him or His disciples who were like Him when they obeyed Him?

The cure for the cancer infecting the church is in being set apart (holy) like He is holy. Our Church should look like the Torah-obeying Jesus, the perfect Israelite, and not like this tainted and corrupt world, like gaudily dressed bishops, or like white collared priests. We – all of us who follow His ways – are called to be peculiar people, a royal priesthood that is dedicated wholly unto the King. (1Peter 2) We should be set apart, holy unto Him, not wholly of the world.

We will look like Him when we follow His Ways, when we learn His Word and obey it. We – like the Israelites of Judges – must go through the pains of captivity and slavery under destructive judgments until we learn the same lesson as they did. They had to learn that Yahweh Elohim alone was their King. Obedience to His Loving Instructions brought them the blessings of living in peace, of healthy children, of material providence, of deliverance from persecutions, and eternal springs of hope. The Church must go through the book of Judges before we can ever hope to go through the Book of Acts. Once we submit ourselves to the kingship of Jesus and obey Him, then we will have the power to raise the dead, and to walk in the prosperity of the blessings of Deuteronomy 28 and not the curses.

In that day, we will have the power to tread down lions and scorpions, and to walk in the valley of the shadow of death and not be afraid because obedience to Yahweh builds an impenetrable shield of protection around a person that no technological, mechanical or spiritual enemy can stand against. The reason the looked over shepherd boy stood against the demonized Nephilim giant Goliath, while all the rest of Israel's warriors hid in the rocks like the cowards they were, was because David knew who he was.

David was a man after Yahweh's own heart because on David's heart was written The Torah. The Instructions of Yahweh had circumcised the foreskin of David's heart, and David's first love was for The Instructions of Yahweh. I beg you to read Psalms 1 and 119; read it and be an imitator of The Scripture, not a hearer only. David's freedom, courage, and boldness came from his identity as a child of Yahweh.

Never before or since has Israel the people been so blessed as they were under the kingship of David. This perfect blessing will not return until The Torah who became flesh, Instruction obeying Son of God is forever enthroned. Even in the great and eternal reign of Jesus, we will keep the Biblical Feasts. No one will enter His New Jerusalem except through one of the gates of the 12 tribes; which tribe we become will be His to decide, but all of us must become Israelites, by birth or by belief. Why not learn His Way now before we do it with Him forever? What if we prepared ourselves for eternity with the Perfect One instead of waiting for it to be our great escape from misery and monotony?

Yahweh told us where His blessings come from and we need to read and obey the whole Bible – even the parts we've disobeyed and ignored throughout our lives. Blessings, safety, and peace come from obedience, not from your manipulated tithe, not from your "name it and claim it", not from your seed faith, not from the anointing oils, holy water, or Babylonian ritual Rosary Beads, but from surrender. Our offerings to the Holy God should be our holiness, our set-apartness, our willingness to look more like Yahweh and Jesus than like this world.

Do you know why those who have persecuted the real followers of The Way never had any trouble finding them to put them in the Coliseum or to light as torches at night? Do you know why the real body of Messiah can be rounded up when obeying Messiah is outlawed, like when the Roman Catholic Church made it an executable offense to observe The Sabbath or celebrate the Biblical feasts? It is because The Remnant look like Daniel who still bowed to Yahweh alone when the laws of the nation said it was illegal. They do not hide from the light of examination as those who walk in darkness do.

It is because they looked nothing like the pagans worshiping Saturnalia or Christmas, knowing it was not even Jesus's birthday. They did not eat pork in honor of Tammuz on Ishtar's (Easter) day when we know Messiah was slain and resurrected during Passover and First Fruits. They were not working on the Sabbath but were gathering together, fellowshipping, and studying His Whole Testament. They were keeping The Feasts of Yahweh, not the pagan holy days of the world repackaged by The Universal (Catholic) Church to help pagans feel comfortable with their pantheistic "Christianity."

The true church is not a building but a body of people who are lovers of The Way, The Truth, and The Life, Jesus of Nazareth, and who seeking to walk on His narrow Torah-observant path. They have lost friends and family, farms and fortunes because they forsook the broad way of the world (which includes religions too) and followed their Teacher Jesus instead.

They were hated by the world for His Name's sake. We are not hated by this world because we do not love Jesus. I know many of you are screaming with internal conversations about what I just said, but please hear me: we who call ourselves Christians do not love Jesus, not The Way He told us to. As Jesus commanded us, so too we must all obey: "If you love me, keep My Commandments." (John 14:15-31, 15:10, Matt. 5:19, 1 John 2:3, 5:3, 2 John 1:6) There was no new testament when He said it, and He meant it then, and He still means it now. Obedience is how we show Him we love Him. We cannot have a love-filled faith without works, and our works of righteousness are outlined in The Instructions, which start in Genesis.

This is not about salvation; keeping the commandments does not save you, but once you believe on His Name by faith through grace and mercy you can become saved on the day of your judgment. Now it's time you learn His Commandments so you can be like Him. Don't you want the power to walk on water and deliver a man possessed by thousands of demons? Don't you want to be able to stand before a hurricane and command it to be still? What would it feel like to walk into a children's hospital and heal every single patient in that place? Do you not want to bless the little food you have and see it multiplied and fed to tens of thousands? What would this world look like if we did not fear the convicts, parolees, and felons or the homeless, and the prostitutes but boldly stepped into their fringe worlds and shared Messiah's hope with them? What could this world look like if we repented for our failures to the freaks, the misfits, and rebels who rage against God?

What would this world look like if the poor, the fatherless, and the widows in our congregations never had to go on food stamps or government benefits, but instead we provided them all they needed? What if instead of debt-laden church buildings and pastors' student loans soaking up the tithe, we met in our houses, apartments, or parks and each week our tithes went towards paying off one family's debts, medical bills, or high-interest loans, and then the next, and the next?

What if we were not dependent on our jobs but were the innovators, the entrepreneurs, and creators of income instead of being dependent on our task masters every paycheck? What if we cashed out our 401k accounts, stocks, retirement plans, and purchased human slaves and gave them freedom instead? Hear me: retirement from Kingdom work on a padded golf course or elite country club is not biblical; it's worldly and wicked. Forsake your flesh and get in the game of life. There is no retiring from working in The Kingdom of Heaven because many are the needs and great is the harvest awaiting its workers.

Men are dying today while you look at your investment portfolio and hope to be able to have enough money to spend on yourself and on your family until you die. Babies are screaming in the darkness, abandoned by mothers who have to work the truck stops of your very town just to survive; you could be the one paying her rent and groceries instead of the greasy ten dollar bills earned in the shadows. Netflix binges will never satisfy you like buying a hungry man a meal or giving him the spare room in your basement. The Way of Messiah is all about our little becoming much, our faith and obedience becoming a brilliant beacon of hope.

What if we walked into the pagan temples, or those Gnostic realms of deceit and called out their devoted practitioners and challenged them to call upon their gods while we called upon Yahweh Elohim and fire consumed our offering and drove the people to repentance as in the days of Elijah in 1 Kings 18? What if we could finally be entrusted with the power of Yahweh and His prophets who called the people back to obeying and worshiping Yahweh The Way He instructed us to? What if we raised the dead at funerals and walked into fiery furnaces of public mocking's and familial hatred? We can and we will.

In that day when The Remnant of Jesus leave the powerless church and become part of His faith-filled vine, I assure you of this: the world will know where the children of The Most High God are. They would not have to wonder if you were a believer in Messiah. They would not have to see your Facebook "religion" description to know. No, they would see our good deeds and praise our Father in heaven. It would draw so many who have longed for salt and light, who have longed for freedom, power, and hope. The few who follow The Way would shine brighter than ten thousand dead churches with their filled up pews.

But those who would not praise our Father would hate us as He promised us they would. Then they could come for us and throw us in their pits and demand us to be silent as we convicted them of their sins, called them to turn from their former ways, and showed kindness to the wounded and gentleness to the weak and weary. In that day we would be set apart, we would be holy unto Jesus Christ, The Savior of the world. We would walk in authority; The Kingdom of God would walk with us because it would be flourishing within our hearts and overflowing into the lives of this world. The world would know that we walked in an abundance of salty truth with power-filled grace to obey and surrender to The Ways we have learned.

The Father never desired a temple built by pagans with its masonic twin pillars, cornerstone, and fixed location men did. In The Wilderness, He commanded His people to build for Him a tabernacle of skin. A Yurt like tabernacle of animal skins that moved where He moved, which lived and moved and breathed. The True Tabernacle of Yahweh will never be built up my manipulated men in Jerusalem on a desecrated mount because the New Tabernacle for His Spirit is in our hearts. We are to be The Tabernacle of Yahweh so the Kingdom of God can have skin on and be the living, active Body of Messiah on this earthly realm.

Once we fully surrender to His explosive story of redemption we would not look like the false religions of the world, even those that claim Christ as their cornerstone. We would be the living stones of Jesus, who do greater things than even He did while on this earth. The Spirit of Truth would abide in us as The All-Consuming Fire used to abide with the Israelites in the wilderness. It would testify to all the nations: “Here are the people of Yahweh.”

Then The Families and Chosen Ones would see. Then they would know that the true bloodline of authority and kingship does not course through their veins, and it is not found in their genealogies; even you who think you carry the seed of Christ, you have been deceived. You “King Fishers” have preserved not the blood of The Redeemer in your bloodlines but that of a deceiver. You have been beguiled, played by the masquerading spirits that led our fathers astray before The Rebels’ tower fell. The real power to rule is in the mighty right hand of Messiah. He is the one who will rule the earth forever, not your chosen one. The Rider on the white horse is coming with His great armies, and the earth will rock and sway under His glory and fury. The crowned and conquering child king you hold so dear will be crushed beneath His once pierced feet.

PART 6

Chapter Twenty Five

The Inner Worlds

What is it like being married to a man of many? What is it like when we are back home and going about our daily lives? It is not what you think.

The process of healing and restoration can look very different from what most would imagine. I spent six years of my life wondering what it would be like to just be me, to be naked and unashamed, to know the feeling of unconditional love. What is it like to wake up and be able to be whomever you wanted to be, unhindered by handlers and manipulators? It was joyful beyond measure, overwhelming, and heart-wrenching agony.

Some days were better than others. The first nine months of my deepest healing were the worst. They were plunged into the depths of chaos looking for lost pieces of my shattered soul. I needed time to heal; I needed to experience lifetimes of comfort and gentleness. I needed to know I would not be condemned for what I'd done to survive, the things I'd been made to do and were done to me. Chelsea along with a biblically gifted and spiritually discerning counselor helped to ensure these were offered to me. With that being said I need to make sure to take a moment to discuss therapists and counselors for Survivors of trauma or survivors of "normal" life.

There is a quagmire of problems infesting counselors and therapists especially those who are "Christian." The unfortunate truth is that most of them have been indoctrinated into worldly, unbiblical, but profitable methods of counseling, psychiatric and symptom management and treatments protocols. The primary and biggest thing to guard against when you are looking for a counselor is to test what their true doctrines and approaches are.

For example in no way do I support any memory retrieval techniques such as hypnotism, past life regression, or even guided imagery like many schools of theophostic and New Age infiltrated counselors teach. In no way should individuals go about astral projecting into the second heavenly realms and dimensions to do battles or find fragments and personalities. The Captain of The Heavenly Host is more then capable to do this work as we pray and agree with His will. Furthermore, there is no need to try to have SRA/DID clients imagine new things or go after memories while in dissociative states, let alone under the control of other potential handlers or manipulators. Unfortunately, this happens with regularity. Many handlers and cult loyal therapists under the guise of "Christian Counselors" will reprogram Survivors to go back to their abusers; perpetrators or worse still get them to re-engage in ritual majik and the opening of further spiritual doors to The Enemy.

It is critical to learn how to allow The Wonderful Counselor and His Living Word to do the real work to test the spirits (1 John) and walk in truth. However there can and are some, though not many, quality and trustworthily counselors out there who are gifted and disciplined in their understanding of The Word and this complex issue. They are faithfully and humbly ministering and working to see the restoration and deliverance of SRA/DID.

It is critical to test the fruits of these counselors or teachers' doctrines and approaches before you just jump in. More often then not the more secularly educated or New Apostolic Reformation indoctrinated they are they tend to have the greatest hindrance to following truly Biblical approaches to healing and restoration. This is why each of us must learn to trust Yahweh's written Scriptures and His Set-Apart Spirit is a better guide to our inner healing than any fleshly being could hope to be. If you are in need of another to help you along in this I know He is faithful to help provide them to all who have need. That being said, the vast majority of my healing and those of most Survivors is not done through outside counselors but through faithful yielding to His restorative work. Much of this ground work is critical to set up a better understanding for the methods of healing and redemption of past bondages and wounds I will now discuss.

When Survivors believe it is safe to let your other parts or personalities come out or come up and experience the world the real healing can begin. Coming up to the surface gives the personality body time where they can experience the world in a different way from what they've known. It is a time of great vulnerability, and often there is a tremendous amount of fear, confusion, and insecurity. More often than not, the last time they'd experienced life, it had been so horrific that they had to shatter their soul. As such, their understanding of reality was locked up in shattered lenses of pain, suffering or terror. The Little who was coming up was in need of healing. Every day we would pray and ask The Holy Spirit to show us anything we needed to see to be set free, but we also prayed that He would buffer the pain, emotions or flooding to not cause us further trauma.

These parts or as I like to call them, "Littles," are often fragments and pieces of my soul that were shattered off during a moment of such insurmountable pain the only way to survive was to split off so the rest of our soul could go on living. They are the Littles who stood in the face of torture and volunteered to take the pain, the beatings, or the killings. They endured death time and time again. If not for them, surely I could not have survived a single moment of madness.

Dissociation is a miraculous gift from God that allows us to survive things no being should have to endure. It is our way of living when all others would perish. It is not supposed to be permanent or an identity we continue to seek to embrace, but rather a way to endure and then heal when we can.

The pain the Littles carry can be brutal and is often physically debilitating. Our bodies were not made to endure so many traumas. Our bodies carry the pain or the marks of abuse until that trauma pocket or neural network is able to share the load and release the pain. Many days I would wake up in the morning with excruciating lower back pain. The pain was so severe I could not stand; I would crawl around instead on my hands and knees, trying to be a helper to Chelsea and Naomi but just being a mess. My body needed to connect to the pain so that my soul and spirit could deal with the reality of what we went through.

Once I felt truly safe and I was able to either meet with my counselor or sit down and write, I could allow the Littles up and let them speak. Sometimes I would be co-conscious and present as the other personality shared their story, the memory, or the reason for their hurt. Other times a full switch would happen, and another personality would be in the driver's seat. We did not allow any portion of our personality body time unless it had surrendered to the will of God and renounced its service to The Enemy. I was not about to let my body be used as a tool for The Wicked One; however, I was going to let healing be done according to The Holy Spirit.

The Little often needed to describe the moment they split, the ritual they were partakers of, or the physical abuse they'd survived. They would share their memory and found that they would not be condemned. Not by Chelsea, my counselor, or by The Deliverer. So much of the healing would come when we discovered the source of the lie that had caused them to split or prevented them from getting healed. It was most often associated with guilt or shame or fear that Jesus would condemn us, our wife would leave us, or retribution would come for speaking The Secrets.

Commonly, an identity crisis would occur internally as our Little had come into agreement with a false identity, such as murderer, filthy, cursed, or hated. The power of healing flooded into our hearts as we combated these lies with The Sword of The Spirit, which is the Word of Yahweh. We needed truth to counter the lies about ourselves – His Word is Truth – and once we surrendered to this, we could find freedom. This was the literal reading of The Scriptures to counter the specific lies we'd come into agreement with.

Once our Little would find forgiveness, for themselves or even later for their abusers and targets, we would be free to lay our burdens, doubts, and fears at Messiah's feet. We would cleanse out any demonic elements that may have mingled with this portion of our personality and cleanse the internal space with The Scriptures, and then ask for a filling of the emptied space with The Holy Spirit. There can be no vacuum in our souls or in this world; something will always take its place. When you bind up the unclean spirits or cleanse out an area, you must also fill it back up with The Holy Spirit and allow His redemptive work to be done. (Matt. 12:43-45, Luke 11:23-26)

This healing and restoration can happen in two places at once. It is sometimes marked on the outside, as we need to weep and cry or have a cat purring on our lap. Other times we are not entirely aware of the internal healing that is occurring; instead, The Holy Spirit is allowing portions of our soul to see what is happening and show us the blessings of peace, safety, and refuge we now live in.

Chelsea would see us typing away, our fingers on the keys as we let these Littles share the suffering that split their soul. We would have to take a break to crawl under the table and sob hysterically, grieving the death of someone whose name we never learned. Or we would head out to the backyard to let the anger boil over while we pulled weeds, smashed a stick into a tire, or dug a hole only to refill it. Other times we needed to head up into the mountains and hike with our dog, seeing there were still beauties of this world to be explored.

The agony once so strong it split our soul would come roaring to the surface buffered only enough to prevent us from further trauma but not enough to cause us to remain distant from the pain. We had lived through impossible things – horrible things – that left a devastating mark on our soul. It is essential to touch that pain, fear, or fury even if only for a moment in order to let your Little know that you too have felt their hurt, their betrayal, and their despair. We would then surrender that pain and burden to the Messiah, finding He would give us a new hope and purpose instead.

There are moments that define each of us. Moments in life that are so monumental, so pivotal that they can shift our focus from the present to a time lost in the past. It's like a hyper reality, so intense and focused that the monotony of our life fades into oblivion and this moment shines brightly against the greys of our day-to-day. Such a moment could be when we stand in front of our family as we walk across the stage and receive a diploma we'd worked years to achieve, or when we feel the weight of relief when our child resurfaces after we thought he'd drown, or the moment a truck backs over our favorite childhood pet and leaves us weeping in our mother's arms, or when we see our mother throw her wedding ring back in our father's face.

These moments of delight and moments of crumpled hope become pebbles of remembering on this journey of life. They mark our souls, and for those who have used dissociation to survive, they become us. They become the shattered pieces of the puzzle that once was a whole soul. To heal, we may need to step back into that memory and see it from The Father's perspective to be given understanding, purpose, identity, or a new job. Out of the pain can come freedom, meaning, and relief.

I am going to do something I had been so afraid to do. I am going to open up a few of the pages of the journal from my first year of healing. It will paint the canvas with harsh reality and with the strokes of salvation to a nine-year-old boy and a twenty-eight-year-old man.

Chapter Twenty Six

The Dodge Viper

His name was Danny, and he gave me a toy car. It was a 1997 Dodge Viper GTS. It was my favorite car and I don't know how he knew it, but he gave it to me while we walked into the forest on our way to The Grove. He slipped it into my hand as he brushed by me.

I saw him on the bus on the way to school the previous week; he talked to me about my violin and said he wanted to play the cello but wasn't allowed to. I said I was sorry but if he wanted to, I would teach him the violin, and he could use mine. He started shaking when I said that; I don't think anyone had ever been that nice to him. He had black under his eyes; I knew the things he saw at night that kept him from ever finding rest.

"Why would you do that?" he asked me. "I like helping people do things they really want to do." He looked confused again and said, "But I don't know you and what if I broke your violin." I thought for a second and told him, "My name is Nate, so now you know me, and if you break it, it's ok. I'll tell my parents I fell getting off the bus; they'll be mad, but that's ok." He didn't say anything for a while; I was scared I'd made him mad because I told him I would lie. "My name is Danny. My dad won't let me play in the orchestra; he says I have to play football and get angry. I like classical music and want to play Bach. But I don't know what it takes to get a cello to sing like that."

I opened up my case and took out my violin. I showed him the stickers under the strings and explained to him how I learned. I told him, "this is my bow; it's made of horsehair." I pulled out the wood-lined rosin from its felt-like cubby and let him rub it on the bow. His lips parted with a broad smile and he started to laugh. I said to him, "It's my favorite thing to do in the mornings when I get on the bus. You can sit with me if you want to and I'll let you do it instead."

He said, "That's nice of you but I can't. My dad is going to be taking me on a trip next week, and I don't know when I'll be back. He says we have to go to my uncle's house again to see my new cousin. I think she's too little to remember, but it doesn't matter."

Sue, the bus driver yelled at a boy who was standing up as the bus had not come to a complete stop. When it finally did, we started standing up. "Thanks for sitting by me, Danny. I hope to see you tomorrow." He nodded his head and smiled really big. "Thanks for letting me rosin your bow. I will try to get on the early bus if my sister doesn't drive me." He walked down the aisle as I put my violin back.

Two days later, I saw him walking towards The Grove, and my heart fell; I was so scared. I didn't want him to be at this defiled space in the forest. I hated these places they took us to, and I hoped he would not have to see me on the portable altar where I had been the previous week. Winter solstice was coming, and I was so scared.

He nodded at me as we started to walk in; he jogged over like he was going to run past me, but slowed down just before he did.

He said in a whisper, "I got this for you last night at Wal-Mart. Put it in your pocket and don't pull it out till you get home tonight."

I felt the touch of cold metal and plastic but slipped it straight into my pocket. I was scared it would fall out when they made me take my clothes off and put on my robe, but it didn't. I felt it on my leg when I put my clothes back on later. I was so scared my master would see me smile, so I looked down at the ground.

…I will spare you the full details, which shattered my soul and Danny's with it. I do this not for your sake but for his and to let her death not be wasted on keystrokes and ink. They killed his mother that night in The Grove, in twisted and terrible ways in front of his eyes and my own…

I give you a cautionary warning: the next paragraph is not pretty, but it is necessary. I left many pages of details out of this book, but a simple paragraph of questions from this moment says more than enough. It is the reality of these questions that disintegrate a soul, pulverizing it into dust. It is the surface level details of The Underworld where children are forced into the impossible world of cannibalism, murder, and black tomes of The Ancient Ones. To those who may be triggered, you can pass over this next paragraph and move on. These words are for those who never got an option to pass over the details of misery, violence, and death. There is even hope for healing from secrets as dark as these.

"What song do they play at your friend's funeral? What do you do when the funeral was nothing more than monsters cleaning up their mess? What do you do when you have to watch them shovel pieces of the body of your friend's mother into construction grade black trash bags that are thrown over shoulders, while the rest of the coven walk away in silence, stomachs freshly filled with her blood and flesh? Later burials will be in bathrooms, trashcans, or sinks where they will vomit her out into toilets, or on the side of the road. Will they burn her at The Family's veterinarian's office crematorium or in the funeral home's incinerator, or just dump her in an unmarked pit dug by desensitized drones? Will they leave her in a car parked twenty miles in the middle of the desert with its windows cracked enough to let the bugs in to do the work but keep the scavenging critters out? Will they shovel her ashes down the drain or scatter them into the winds of forgotten dreams?"

The questions pummeled my mind as we slipped into the robotic march up the trail. I didn't move on the way home, afraid they would see I had the slightest sense of hope. I was dropped off outside my parent's house and slipped in through the window to my room. Bowser, my black lab, heard me come home and got excited but I told him, "be quiet," and he went back into his Dogloo. I had a step stool I kept outside my room but brought it in with me. The house was silent; no one ever listened to what happened in my room. I waited a while before I got into my jammies.

No one moved or stirred, so I thought I was safe, and I slipped into my closet and hid behind the clothes just in case. I reached into my pocket and pulled it out. It was a Dodge Viper painted sparkly blue with two white racing stripes. It was sleek, gorgeous, and brand new; I could tell the wheels had never gone on the dirt or a track. I was so thankful; I had never been given such an excellent gift. It was my favorite car, but no one in my Family paid attention to things like this. I would get things I didn't want for Christmas and my birthday as a way of getting my hopes up before shattering them again. But not this time; Danny got me the perfect gift, and it would get me through the winter solstice the following week. I would remember it when I was on the altar, and the master was on my back.

I would remember that my little car would be back at home in the hiding spot I made inside my bed frame. I'd hollowed out a tiny space with a hammer, awl, and chisel under the bedpost near my head. I hid it in there every morning, but I never pulled it out except when everyone was sleeping. I didn't want my dad to see something I liked that he might take "until I behave." He never did.

In the quiet of the night I would slide it up and down my bed and on my arm. It was so smooth; not damaged by the desecrated dirt. A three-dollar car kept me breathing; I loved it because I knew it was a perfect gift. Danny saved my life, and I wanted to tell him "thank you." I don't know what happened to him; he never came back from his trip. I wanted to teach him the violin and watch him play Bach. I thought about stealing a cello from the practice room, but it was too big for me to get onto the bus without Sue ratting me out. I looked over at the cello every morning and watched Anne play it, and I thought of Danny. Nate didn't know why we loved that cello but we thought of Danny and we wanted him to play it instead of her; she wasn't terrific anyways. Danny would have been so much better, but we don't know where he went.

We shift from the external memory to the view of our Little's internal world. The door to our inner heart exploded open last week when we heard Brian Crain play A Walk in The Forest on cello and piano. Nate was dancing with his daughter in his arms, and Chelsea was laughing and swinging too. She giggled with us both, and we began to weep. The Holy Spirit brought us up then to see it. It was the first thing I'd ever seen since that night when Danny watched his mother die while I was shattering off a piece of my soul to survive the madness. The Lord let us come up and hear Naomi Grace, the Pleasantness of Yahweh, our undeserved favor, laugh and laugh. Oh, how we wept tears of joy and peace. My God, we'd never known a heart could feel so much joy. Who knew there could be relief like I was experiencing? Who could have known such wonders existed in this cruel world. What a miracle, what a gift this is.

It healed us in a moment in ways I cannot express. The Most High God knew exactly what we needed to get set free. We required joy, not sorrow or death. Back in our inner room, He loosed forth the angels who scattered the night; they drove out the darkness buried in every corner. They bound up the wicked ones and threw them into a heap at The Angel of the Lord's pierced feet. We saw them tremble and shake; we saw terror in their eyes. THEY WERE AFRAID! THEY WERE TERRIFIED!

We sat and watched them weep and wail, begging for mercy and receiving none. Their sentence was severe; they went out screaming, “Too much is this punishment; this is not just.” Their mouths were stuffed with rags as the angels left to carry out their sentence. Fire shall consume them every morning, and ice at night. They shall be disquieted and contorted in piles and heaps, and in filthy rags will they wander in the outer darkness until The Day of Judgment comes.

My Littles ran to Him first; they were dressed in rags; some were naked under robes while others wore only their birthday suits. Blood was caked onto their shoulders, backs, and butts. Messiah Himself washed them, He wept over them, and His tears made them clean. The only begotten Son of God cleansed them, and their broken hearts were made whole. They didn’t have to walk in shame; they were born again in freedom, and finally, they knew no pain. He took their wounds and showed them His own. He showed us His mutilated back, neck, wrists, and arms. They had beaten Him mercilessly in ways we could not fathom. They tore the flesh from His body and with it His soul. They tore it asunder not just with whips and sticks but with the sin, guilt, and shame we were carrying.

He let us touch the flesh and feel it all. He showed us His side and told us He was pierced for us all. He said He paid for our sins and carried our shame. He said we didn’t have to fear the master’s hands anymore. He had broken their backs, and they were never the same. They were His to deal with now, and we knew His Name was Justice. All vengeance was His, and we knew it would be severe. We heard those devils wailing and nearly pitied them.

He looked at me as I watched this all and said, “Come here, my son.” I walked over with my eyes on the ground, not wanting to let my tears or nakedness be seen. I was so ashamed, and soon I tripped on the shackles that were wrapped around my feet. I fell into the dirt and began to tremble. He breathed out a single word, and everything changed.

“Peace.”

I felt a waterfall erupt above me and fall onto my shoulders. It fell from the roof of our heart and tore the madness apart. It was living water of light, and it washed away the darkness, bloody soil, and filth. It washed us new, and soon we could feel the warmth of sunlight on our skin, and we opened our eyes.

Our internal room, once a grotto in the forest of death, had become a farm of peace where they grew hope, love, and joy. We saw trees of patience growing tall, and the fruit of kindness fell ripe onto the warm ground, its seed sinking into the freshly tilled fertilized soil where it sprouted even more. Joy was springing up from a well in the corner, a river of life flowed from the throne above this all. He who sat on it is The Lamb Who Was Slain. He is The Redeemer Jesus, The Christ, The Savior of the World, Savior of even the Little piece of our inner world.

He turned our fields of filth into furrows of faith. He planted a vineyard, which spread out beyond our vision. He came down from His throne and picked me up. My shackles were lost in waters that took away our shame. He carried me to the base of the tree where He set me down. My feet were still not used to walking on such purity or hope. Kindness was unfamiliar to us, and we knew it would take us some time to learn. He sat down next to me, dirtying His majestic robe. He scooped up the soil and set it in our hands.

He said, “This is for you, my son. I give it to you freely. I made you for this moment, not the one you were conceived in. I made you for kindness, grace, and hope. Look into your hands.”

The soil had turned to seeds of faith, hope, and love. He said, “I made you to sow them into the hearts of my people, the ones who are trapped in rooms like these.” We could see that one of the seeds was set apart. He said, “Do you see this one?” Holding the brilliant seed up to the light, I nodded yes. “This one is kindness. Do you know where it came from?” I told him no. His eyes grew wide as a smile spread upon His face, “It came from Danny and that little blue car. You grew this seed, Nathan, so long ago. You sprouted it when you were a child, not even ten years old. You planted this seed in Danny’s heart that morning on the bus.

He asked his sister to drive him to Wal-Mart the next morning, and she did. He took the money he’d been saving for a video game and bought this instead.” He held up our little car and set it in our hand. “That seed you planted grew in his heart, and it bore a pure fruit of kindness which he gave right back to you. That tree is still thriving today, and I will reunite you with Danny, this I promise. He does play the cello now, and he is spectacular. He brings tears to My eyes when he sings out the chorus and shouts its melody. It is a sweet fragrance, one I so delight in. You will get to hear him play for you and you will weep together. Because I am faithful, Nathan, and I have never left you. I never left you alone to wither and rot. I do not leave my gardens unattended even though The Serpent told you otherwise. I am not one who is far off and forgotten; I am The God of Comfort, and my Word is Truth.

“Hear me now and listen: nothing will stop the things I came to do. I came to set the captives free and to bind up the broken-hearted. I am not afraid of your brokenness; I let them shatter me to pieces. I allowed them to beat me on the whipping post. Do you know I took their beatings and refused to resist or flee? It is because I saw Danny and you in that grove wanting to vomit and die. I knew you would need someone who could understand your sorrow and shame. I became shame for many including you, Nathan, and for Danny, so you wouldn’t have to stay in that awful place.”

“I knew Danny would need someone to come alongside him and help his fingers find the notes. I knew he would need the rosin on his bow. You were the rosin, Nathan, and I was the bow; he will play before my Heavenly Throne forever, and you will marvel and dance with your daughter and wife. You will lift up praises with my angels, and we will laugh together; because I am Redemption and My Word is true. You can trust me always, Nathan, no matter what you went through. I am Salvation, and I came back for you. I refused to stay with My Father but left Him and took on flesh, needing to suffer these things for you and the others whose hearts are broken, tattered, and covered in scars. I wanted to, and I would do it a thousand times over even if it was just to rescue you two."

"Your hearts are still beating, and now they beat with mine. Walk in freedom, my son, and lift up your notes of praise before me, for I drink them in with delight. You are my beloved son, and I fight for you now. You do not need to fear those masters' hands because they are broken and overlooked, and I will grind them into dust; they will be scattered into the lake of fire and forgotten by all. You will dwell richly on pastures of peace by streams of living water forever, and none will take my gifts from you. They are freely given to you; may you receive them all now."

We held onto him for hours, and as we wept and told him our hurts, His tears fell in buckets on us, washing away the years of sorrow, screaming, and death. He took our burdens, every one we had. He held them all on that cursed tree and let us have His robes of righteousness instead; a great exchange of His life for our death, a true story of salvation and grace. "I thank you, Father Yahweh, for saving us today."

Chapter Twenty Seven

Secreted Away

I typed out those words just a few days after standing in our living room, listening to that song with Chelsea and Naomi. I had felt the flooding of emotion, the overwhelming sorrow and grief. Chelsea saw me on the ground, crying hysterically that night and then when I wrote down the healing session. She heard me scream and groan with the agony of memories so vivid and real they crashed through my consciousness and invaded my outer world. I wrote those words and the other ten pages of that memory which I've left out. The details are so brutal they tear the fabric of reality and wrench out your soul. This book is not for those words; this book is not to defile you with a Survivor's maddening past but to point those who are looking towards the path to restoration.

After I'd finished writing those words, The Father gave me a miracle and brought to memory where I'd hidden our Dodge Viper. I ran downstairs and began shuffling boxes around. Nathan had buried many of our keepsakes when he'd gone through the "Switch", but thankfully I knew it would be there. It took me twenty minutes, but eventually, I found the stained oak box. I did not get back my childhood possessions or things from my room; those were lost when I left The Family and chose freedom instead. So many of the treasures I'd once held dear were trapped in their hands, but Yahweh had preserved this one for me.

Keepsake box in hand, I pressed on the lever and opened up the secret compartment. As I'd grown up, I became more sophisticated at hiding my treasures and learned how to build false bottoms into trinkets so no one could steal away our joy. Pulling back the panel, I saw it there, as shiny as on the day Danny gave it to me was our blue car. I touched the paint, the metal, and the two white lines. I slid its wheels on my arm and felt familiar memories of laughter and peace.

I shed tears decades in the making. I opened up the floodgates, and the rivers of my soul let loose their sorrow mingled with relief. Of all the things He could have preserved for me, He chose the best. In the curled knuckles of my scar-covered hands was His miracle of life among all the death. It was hope so tangible, The Redeemer at His best.

For the day you read this, Danny, know that I've never forgotten you, your mother, or the kind thing you did. You saved my life in that winter of death when I was nine years old. You saved it again decades later when that little blue car showed me Yahweh's providence. He is our provider no matter what we go through, be it mothers murdered in front of us or the loss of a spouse. He alone can shine a light of hope upon our days of darkness. He alone can rescue us from the pock marked memories of madness and loneliness. He is our rescuer, and He is always faithful. Even when I was in that grove, He gave me the strength to survive. No matter what your grove is, He can give you hope that defies logic and conquers death.

Before we can conquer those groves or the Enemy who stalks us in the darkness, we are going to have to come to grips with the battle we were all born into. We are going to have to learn the ways of war.

PART 7

Chapter Twenty Eight

Paying the Final Price

How much does it cost to speak the truth? How much would you pay to know the truth about life, about death, or the way the world works? What would you be willing to give up to know with absolute certainty you've found true reality? Many say they want the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, but when shown the cost and the consequences of knowing the truth, they choose to flee. Speaking The Secrets of my Family cost me more than I thought I would have to pay: it cost me jobs, physical and financial wellness, friends, family, rest, and too many material things. What I gained, though, was my immortal soul and the freedom of sleeping in peace. The retribution of The Enemy increased to a roar during the first year of Naomi's life. It was brutal beyond measure, but amidst this season Chelsea and I found the inexpressible joys of learning how to live in truth at the cost of the lies.

I wish I could articulate the frenzy of attacks we encountered during that season, but words are too weak to carry the burdens of sorrows we endured. How do you explain to someone the hurts of a broken heart? How do you comfort your wife when she has to read Family Crafted lies spoken about you time and time again? How do you wage war when you are the one bleeding and screaming in the bathroom, too agonized to walk? The war waged against us nearly every day and night. Some days were good: peace would invade our home and settle upon us in waves of relief. Other days the Enemy would slam into us with a ferocity that threatened to tear us apart.

Leaving the Families and betraying the Brotherhoods brings its retribution, one I'd embodied far too many times. We had come to know The Captain of The Heavenly Hosts could overcome those whose hands now carry the blades, bullets, poisons, and digital threats. The outright attacks on us had died down after severing our communication methods, but the covert spiritual battle had only begun.

It would come when severe spiritual oppression would invade our home: icy cold presences would manifest, lights would be turned on and off throughout the night, objects would be thrown around the room as dread fell upon us in waves. The reason for the drop in temperature often associated with spiritual manifestations of the darker kind is because when one of these entities comes into our realm, it does so through dimensional doorways.

Remember that The Kingdom of Darkness requires fuel to operate, and the fuel source most available during manifestations is the atmosphere in the room or the negative emotions that are invoked in their targets by their appearance. These manifestations will bring with them a clouding of the mind like a brain fog, fatigue, headaches, or even nausea, which slows your thinking and your reaction time, and hinders your ability to perceive what is going on. The emotions which will likely surface will be things like dread, fleshly cravings, doubt, irritability, rage, hopelessness, and fear. It is often better to understand these extra-dimensional entities as spiritual vampires who feast upon their host's will, essence, and life.

The counter to this attack comes from the presence and authority of the Prince of Peace. The most effective defense and offense against extra-dimensional entities comes not from holy water, ritualistic exorcism, smart weapons, or magic but through repentance of our sins, His strategic Living Word being read out loud, and worshipping in our obedience to His truth amidst those feelings and experiences. In a sense, this starves their fuel source and begins to weaken and break their power, enabling us by His authority to cast them into the Abyss or to he feet of Jesus, forbidding them from ever returning to us or those in our spheres of influence. It also comes from repentance and the asking of forgiveness for our sins and those sins which may have empowered this wicked one.

These are the fundamentals of spiritual warfare, and none of these things were foreign to Chelsea and me, as we had been contending with this type of attack for years. However, much of it amplified and exposed our own need to learn to take authority over The Enemy, read the Word of God out loud, and pray in agreement with His will for our life. It was critical not to give into the fears and the stealing of the peace we were finding in our new freedom. The peace we were gaining granted us newfound understanding, especially in regards to targeted prayers of repentance for familiar or ancestor sins and spirits.

This peace gave us the ability to start asking The Father to sever also any soul ties that united me with those I killed. These soul ties are generally only discussed in relation to former sexual partners, which need to be repented of. However, they are made not only through sexual union (an act of creating life) but also through taking life. Please see the resource section at the end of this book for an excellent guideline to aid you in this process.

Soul ties are created when there is destruction of a life and these soul ties need to be severed and this is done by repenting for the act of killing even if it was justified, legal, or defensible. By asking The Father to cleanse us of any ungodly soul ties made through this with The Blood of the Lamb, we will be freed from any spiritual repercussions of this union. If I had not done this, I do not believe there would be any way for me to find healing and restoration. So too do our combat veterans need to learn to pray in this way, as well as the counselors, friends, and families of those who've been forced to end a life under any circumstance need to pray in this manner.

The attacks did not stay spiritual but stepped into our world when servants of The Family began to do ritual magic and curses on our property. We came home to find power cones of animal bones and ritual objects on our front patio, and at other times we would find massive pieces of animal fat buried in our garden, in the compost bin, and around the corners of our property. Specific animals used during blood sacrifice are defiled and charged with curses before pieces of them are buried in the ground – this is a ritual done to defile the land and break down the hedge of protection.

It was infuriating to know the lengths to which they were willing to go to come against us, and yet it was also a reminder that The Resurrected King has stripped The Enemy of his powers. Each time we would find the chunks of bone or other cursed objects, we would pray and ask The Father to forgive the sins committed that empower the evil spirits sent on assignment against us or the sins of those who were cursing and attacking us. We are commanded to pray for, bless and not curse our enemies, and there is so much power in choosing to forgive those that come against us and asking The Father to strip them of their occult power and to extinguish every curse lit against us.

This is what changes the world: bold belief backed prayer. Prayer even for our enemies. When we choose to forgive our enemies, it strips our true Enemy of his spiritual power over the righteous. We choose to ask The Father to bring to those who persecute us redemption, deliverance, and salvation. We can pray and ask Yahweh to deliver these people from their own bondages and to lead them to freedom in The Way. (Matt. 5:44)

I know most people will not have to worry about cannibalistic covens of serpent worshipers and Jesuit assassins being sent against you. I know most people do not have demonically charged letters showing up in your mailbox, but some of you do. It boils down to the following question: do either curses or blessings spoken of throughout the Bible still apply today? (Exo. 20:1-26, Deut. 28, 30:19, Jer.17: 5-8, Mal. 3:10, Matt. 5) You can choose to try to dismiss this as another dispensation or epoch in time where "that stuff" no longer applies but it does. Curses still can be lit, rituals can and do empower dark workings that directly affect people, Christians and atheists alike. It is ignorance of this that fuels The Kingdom of Darkness to overcome the Body of Messiah every day.

The Kingdom of Darkness still has to abide by the spiritual laws Yahweh put in place and outlined in His Word. Satan is a title for The Accuser who legally stands upon the Laws of Yahweh when He accuses us and seeks to have legal right to come against us. (Genesis to Revelation, Job 1-3, Zech. 3) If we have sinned and transgressed God's Instructions, it gives The Enemy a legal right to come against us. It does not matter if this sin was outlawed in the "Old or new Testament" legal right for The Adversary to accuse you is not dependent on man's perception of its applicability to this season of time. There is no scripture where God ever says something He declared was a sin no longer is a sin. If Yahweh changed in any sense of expression, word, or declaration, He would cease to be The Perfect and Just God. (Num. 23:19, Micah 3:6, James 1:7)

This is why there's so much power in repentance and in asking for forgiveness for even our secret sins: this renders those accusations powerless. However, if we continue to walk in willful, and proud disobedience, we allow the Enemy legal foothold to work against us, to send curses against us, which will be able to ignite and burn away our blessings. (Prov. 26:2, Num. 23:23) The truth that kept Chelsea, Naomi and I alive, and still does to this day is that obedience to God's Loving Instructions is what brings about blessings and extinguishes curses.

Our loving obedience to His Ways gives us assurance of knowing the hedge of protection promised us will be strong and impenetrable. Chelsea and I in no uncertain way believe the reasons we are still alive is because we have learned to seek to cover any doors we have open to the Enemy with The Blood of

The Lamb. Through humility and doing our best to turn and go in a new direction of our life, we seek to close those doors so they can never be opened again. We seek to let The Scriptures circumcise our flesh and mark us as set-apart unto His ways.

The reason our heart still beats is that we began to walk in His ways and obey His Loving Instructions. Without The Father's mercy and faithfulness in honoring our loving attempts to follow Him, we would be dead. I know the breath in my lungs is a gift from Him. I know some people wake up every day devising ways to destroy my new family. I know the lion stalking in the darkness who seeks to steal, kill, and destroy the hope of life I've been given. (1 Peter 5:8) I decide to pray for those people; I choose to bless my enemies and not curse them. I pray they are brought to repentance, deliverance, and ultimately salvation. I choose to forgive those individuals for their murderous machinations and malice. I instead let the knowledge of this war drive me into studying my new weapons of warfare. Because of this, Chelsea and I have been able to learn a great deal about The War of the Ages we were all born into. It is from those experiences and our hunger to see you made ready for The War that we share this with you all.

In the months following our severing of ties with The Family, a more significant form of attack came against Chelsea and me. Most individuals will not suffer this type of engagement, but those of you who do, I hope you will know there is no weapon formed against you that will prosper. (Isaiah) When this type of attack came against us, we set about our usual ways of praying and interceding for deliverance, but it would not stop when we prayed and took authority over it in the name of Jesus. It didn't take long for us to learn what this was. These spirits coming against us were not demonic, nor were they devils or higher powers; rather these icy presences which would go into the house often appearing as shadowy creatures were human spirits called "astral projections" or "astrals".

In occult groups, individuals are taught by the aide of other spirits, meditative practices, as well as with altered states of consciousness, how to separate their spirit from their body. It is a practice now widely taught and propagated in New Age and Eastern Arts circles as a way of going on “The Astral Planes or higher planes of consciousness.” Not every individual partaking in this knows they are utilizing deceptive spiritual powers to help them leave their body, while the spirit possesses your body as other spirits take them around on the astral planes. The place in which they go may appear as though it is filled with total unity, oneness and connectivity to it all. Yet another experiencer might be an intentional left hand practitioner guiding their way through The Planes with black majik bearing markers of death. The second heavens dimensional domain in which they travel is one that has been cut off as a protective and blessed gift until the time Yahweh’s restoration makes all things new.

The Planes are the dimensional battlegrounds where fallen ones are engaged with those righteous heavenly host, and it is not a place for mankind to dwell. Experiencers and practitioners regularly report angels of light possessing their body or an ascended master leading them to secret knowledge hidden in the libraries of Thoth. They are experiencing real events of travel through galaxies and other dimensions; however, the spirits will show them things that all too often are cloaked in deception, ensuring the doctrine and practice spreads. Those who do know The Secrets of occult workings operate on this spiritual plane to curse, attack, or target individuals. My Family members, like many others in The Bloodline Families and Brotherhoods, are highly trained in this practice so they can learn intimate knowledge about their enemy’s curse or torment their targets.

If ever you have to encounter this, or a spirit, which appears to be a person that will not leave by The Authority of Jesus, you must pray somewhat differently. We first off pray that Yahweh would forgive the sins that empowered this person to go on the astral plane to remote view or spiritually come against us. Also, we would pray that He would send His holy angels to drive away the spirits that are accompanying this individual and escort them from our property. We ask Him to build an impenetrable hedge of protection around our property that no human or evil spirit can penetrate. Time and time again, my Family members would come against us in this way especially during high ritual days, and we would see real power in walking in The Father's authority to drive them away. The battles we fought during this time were not limited to outside influence but some came from within.

Chapter Twenty Nine

This is a War

Chelsea and I were just trying to endure the newness of sleepless nights and child-rearing as best as any new parents do. The trouble with babies, especially newborns, is that they tend to cry. The crying was like murder in my mind and would send me back to moments of madness when monsters masquerading as men caused little ones to scream in agony. I could not bear it when she would cry; even just the bit that comes with infanthood could send me into a spiral of memories too horrible to speak.

The first few months were the most brutal when the memories were raw and unfiltered. Like a fresh layer of seared skin burning when exposed to the air, so too did our souls blister having only recently experienced this world of life since their conception amidst death.

Chelsea did her best to buffer this, going above and beyond traditional motherhood and relentlessly sacrificing herself to take care of Naomi and keep her content. It was a pouring out of herself, which washed our heart in relief. I don't know how we could have survived those first few months without her relentless willingness to accommodate our "sensitivity." These sensitivities were not limited to babies' crying but also encompassed the rejection of our identity, personalities, and past.

When you are born into the shadowy Underworld, all you know is the blackened lens you are forced to believe is the reality. For so much of your life, you are told that speaking The Secrets and talking about your memories will cause people around you to fear you, hate you, reject you, and ultimately leave you. It is that fear which unfortunately is so readily reinforced by those in your community, family, and friends that overwhelms you when you begin to talk about these types of issues.

It is so vital how we each choose to respond to people when they talk about things they have been so ashamed of, secrets they were once too terrified ever to tell another soul. In that moment of sharing, those wounded ones are opening up a tender piece of their soul and permitting you to help them heal or to cause more egregious harm. Each of us is responsible for how we react and how we either bless or curse them.

Our words have more power than we've ever believed. The words we are speaking will always either give life to another or take it away. There is no neutrality in this life; no amount of ignorance, ambivalence, or apathy can keep you from this truth. You can only serve one master, and your words will either fuel the furnaces of hope, restoration and redemption, or they will empower the fear, doubt, despair, and self-hate. How we choose to treat those entrusted to us will bear out fruits of life or will ensure death's bounty grows among the living.

You must understand that there is a genuine war being waged in the spiritual realm day and night. It has defined boundaries and borders, and fortified strongholds. Two kingdoms, The Kingdom of Darkness and the Kingdom of Light are battling every day for the souls of the Kingdom of Mankind. It is the Kingdom of Mankind – a sort of middle earth – where we live our lives under the continual influence and impact of both the light and dark sides. It is in the hearts, minds, and souls of humanity that this great contest and battle is waged.

Many of us believe we are soldiers for Jesus, but the reality is that just because you are on the battlefield does not mean you are in the fight. Hundreds of millions of soldiers have gone to war and yet there are many who've never fought a battle. Just because you know something about spiritual warfare does not mean you've ever waged war on the darkness.

Nearly all of us are guilty of hiding from the front lines where the battle is the thickest. We have been lulled into a slumber, which has kept us off the war-torn sights of chaos and in the trenches instead. It is in these trenches where the highest numbers of losses are suffered. It is from these positions of illusionary peace we surrender our power and sacrifice the true warriors every day. We think the battles are over and the wars have been won just because fiery arrows are no longer reigning down on us. We'd prefer to circle the wagons in our congregations where we can shove our comfortable heads back into the sands of ignorance.

The majority of soldiers have found themselves comfortable in their trench life and see no need to stand up and risk being shot. It is only on the rarest occasions that someone overcomes their fear with courage and rises from the complacent trench. From the tops of the lines they bellow out words of conviction, truth, and hope. It is these precious few overcomers who ignite those beacons of hope, which call to us, who have been trapped on the other side, showing us there is courage in The Kingdom of Light. Those beacons reminder us why we should all want that freedom to be our own.

Those courageous few often suffer the deadliest wounds and heaviest losses. They will be the first ones targeted by The Enemy to be savaged with relentless ferocity. If only those fiery bullets came from The Enemy's side. The insidious nature of this world is that those who stand up from the trenches will get shot most by soldiers on their side. The Enemy is quick to use friendly fire to destroy the efforts of redemption, freedom, and hope. No matter the source of the fiery arrows, they still help to light the way to those trapped in the darkness making the perilous journey from behind enemy lines.

The spiritual realities of our lives cannot be ignored, and they are most noticeable when someone is making the most harrowing journey of their lives as they enter The No Man's Land separating The Kingdom of Darkness from the Kingdom of Light. Those of us Survivors who were born behind enemy lines make a harrowing decision when we choose to leave our shackles and run for redemption. When we decide to make that run, the fire comes raining down upon us from both sides.

When a prisoner makes a break for it, enemy fire is always expected. What is not expected is the spotlight of fellow "believers" pointing on our chests, so they can aim for our hurting hearts as they seek to tear us apart. The doctrines of men have driven so much deception into the church at large, and it causes them to see those who are coming out of the darkness as The Enemy instead of as the reason we were all redeemed.

We were made to bring freedom to the captives, not shoot at our wounded. We were made to be a united front of furious forgiveness, passion, and faith who did not run and hide from The Enemy, but instead took prisoner Pan's Labyrinth, Mt. Hermon and those gates of Hades. (Matt. 16) We are to be Followers of The Way, and The Captain of The Heavenly Host is supposed to be our leader, not the pastors, priests, or seeker-friendly sermons we hear at Sunday morning mass. He did not call us out of the darkness and into the light for us to be passive but instead to allow us time to heal, grow, and mature so that we would go and join our Captain's fight in The War of The Ages.

Chelsea and I learned quickly the dangers waiting for us in No Man's Land. We'd expected the spiritual and physical wars waged against us as we left The Family. What we'd never expected was the viciousness of Christians and those who called themselves followers of Jesus. The reality is that each of us is a walking spiritual conduit and our hearts are designed to have a spiritual occupant. Are not our bodies supposed to be tabernacles of The Prince of Peace? If we live our lives by following His ways, the homes of our heart can be filled to overflowing with The Holy Spirit, which will produce in our lives the fruits of His presence. If, however, we have left open the doors of our heart to The Enemy, we can traffic his spirits and ideologies instead.

When we have doors open to The Enemy, we will allow ourselves to be used by The Enemy to wound, hurt, and steal the hope of others. These doors can be opened through secret sins, rebellious acts of pride, bitterness, hatred or un-forgiveness. If we continue to resist The Father's redemptive work in our life, the Enemy can build up for himself strongholds. Like the Tower of Babel, they are built brick by brick with our rebellious rejection of obedience to The Scriptures and by running from the conviction of The Holy Spirit. In a sense, The Enemy builds his fortresses within our camp. This allows The Enemy to use believers as double agents who strike out at the ones who need The Father's love, patience, and kindness most. It makes us wound the ones we love and those who need understanding, compassion, and joy. It keeps us from walking in the fullness of our faith. Instead, these strongholds become cancer in our joints, tumors of torment that prevent us from uniting The Body of Messiah into the soldiers for salvation we were made to be. This infiltration of The Enemy allows him to strike out against those who've fled his Kingdom from within.

The Prince of Darkness is not omniscient, but his counterfeit to the absolute infinite intelligence of The Creator comes through his supernatural intelligence array. He is fed information from his spidery web of principalities, elementals, thrones, rulers, dominions, devils, and demons who are continually monitoring the Kingdom of Men and their chosen targets. It allows The Enemy to send precise devastating blows against believers should they ever rise from their trenches.

They are already well aware of our insecurities, fears, doubts, and regrets. The specific spirits assigned to us know the ways to craft lures of temptation to entice each of us back to our habitual sins. If we can resist his direct attacks, he will shift tactics to target us from other believers who have doors propped wide open to being under the influence of another spirit. We must not be unaware of our Enemy and his tactics. (1 & 2 Corinthians) Understanding this networked information can help followers of The Way begin to pray for the confusion of The Enemy, a breaking of the power of satanic surveillance and every assignment of The Evil One, or the blinding of the eyes of the Enemy, as the angels did in Genesis 19:11.

Chelsea and I tried spending time with people but even as we did, they would make insensitive comments about us or the situation we were going through. At times they would attack the ways we were choosing to live our lives. People would make inappropriate sexual jokes about rape or incest directed at me or someone else in the room. The comments had direct connections to something we were inwardly struggling with at the time. It was the oddest thing, and Chelsea and I had no frame of reference at first to understand why when we would walk into the room, our warmest people would shift from compassionate to cold and wounding. We would never have thought the people we trusted most could be turned into such vicious persecutors until we stepped into No Man's Land.

The more Chelsea and I sought after a life lived in total submission to The Father's will, the greater the frequency of these attacks became. Some were quick to make jabs about our need to "just get over it," or making sure we knew they never wanted us to talk to them about our past. Those who do not guard their mind and renew it so that it becomes like that of Jesus can be left to be sifted like Peter who renounced The Messiah or to be manipulated by fellow Christians to target the wounded.

Chelsea and I thought we could find safe places where people would be patient with us and not condemn us for the way we'd chosen to separate ties from our Family but our places of refuge grew to be less and less. Even the church we'd been going to at the time, which had so graciously paid for portions of our counseling sessions, became an unsafe place.

My Family, mostly my father, targeted my church with relentless bombarding of the leadership and pastors. He employed other Family-controlled pastors who tried to convince our church to turn us over to them and to cut us off, but thankfully they had discernment enough not to give in to their manipulative demands fully. When this tactic did not work, he began to drive hundreds of miles each week and show up at the church services. His presence there and attempts to re-engage control of me was initially a blow to our peace and a stumbling block for our healing.

His obsession to reactivate and control us again forced us to make a decision. We could continue to try going to church and risk him getting access to Naomi, or we could stay in the safety of our home. Chelsea and I decided it would be best to stay home and start having "church on the pillow" where we could listen to teachings like Dr. Michael Lake's Biblical Life Seminary: Understanding The Kingdom Series, or watch The Virtual House Church with Rob Skiba, and worship in unabashed joy.

Thankfully, The Father used that which The Enemy intended for significant harm and the destruction of our lives for our salvation instead. If not for those fiery missiles fired from within the church, Chelsea and I would never have become who we were made to be. To find our new identity, we had to leave behind the popular place of worship and head to the desert. Like the Israelites leaving the practices and traditions of Egypt, we too would have to go into The Wilderness to receive the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob's revelations, understanding, and explosively powerful Instructions.

PART 8

Chapter Thirty

Into the Wilderness

No matter where Chelsea and I turned, we fought opposition and resistance. We could not abide in our usual places of comfort, so instead we stopped fighting The Deliverer and yielded to His call to the wild, uncharted desert, the place where most believers refuse to go, the narrow Way where sustenance comes only from the Bread which falls from Heaven and from waters which shoot forth from The Rock. Chelsea and I did not want to go where He was leading us, but we knew He had never failed us and we could trust Him no matter where He led us. He led us out of our churches, our jobs, our families and friends. He led us out to the place where we could hear Him and meet with Him. It was there that He revealed the joy found in keeping His Commandments. It wasn't going to start with a long list, just Ten Instructions.

It was during this season that we began to come to know and love the rest that came from keeping the seventh day Sabbath as He said to do. One of The Ten Commandments that our doctrine of men inspired churches so quickly dismiss and instead obey the Universal Catholic doctrines of lawlessness, turned out to be one of the most powerful of them all.

We did our best with what we understood after simply reading His Word and seeking to obey it. So rather then wait around for someone else to tell us what to do, we obeyed Him and set apart one twenty four hour period on the seventh day to give to Him. As the sun set on Friday nights, we prayed as a family, often turning on worship music, and the three of us had our fellowship with The Father at home. Then we opened our Bibles and studied together. Chelsea – being raised in church her whole life – had never read through the entire Bible, so we started there. We began by reading it as a family and found blessings begin to flow. It was The Way of the called-out disciples of Yahweh and Yeshua for thousands of years, and it needed to be ours as well.

In all my life I have never felt the peace and the real presence of God come into a space like I do when we welcome The Father to be with us on Sabbath. The holy presence of The Creator would invade our home, and soon Chelsea and I would begin weeping and praying with words inexpressible. Although Naomi was often fussy and needing continual attention, she would suddenly grow still and completely content. Chelsea would dance with Naomi resting on her chest, tears freely flowing down her cheeks experiencing peace, safety, and relief. I could not contain myself and would fall on my face weeping uncontrollably, feeling the complete set-apartness of the Lord Our Righteousness in the presence of my own sin. It was as if I was a putrid decaying odor in a room, which had only ever been filled with the fragrance of a thousand orchids blooming out the purity of the heavenly kind.

I could not fathom why He would choose to be in our midst. Even as we felt the desperate wretchedness of our cursed flesh, we would be enveloped in a peace of forgiveness, love, and warmth. Our God is a consuming fire, and His presence was not cold, icy, and numbing, but it raised the temperature of the room in a moment and drove away our doubt and despair. He does not need to absorb energy when He comes to meet with us; instead, His presence fills our own with life itself. We soaked up His presence, longing for a thousand hours more but He lifted from us and left us with a rest no paid time off or vacation could provide. This and so much more was what was waiting for us every Sabbath.

How could this secret have been kept from us all our lives? Why would we not be partaking of this harvest waiting for each of us? We found the greatest of joys waiting when we surrendered to Him 24 hours of our lives, and when we showed our love for Him by obeying His Instructions. This shifted our focus from this world to His, from our wills being done to His being completed in us and through us.

Unlike the Jews of the House of Judah and the Lost Sheep of the House of Israel living during the first years after Messiah's resurrection, I did not have an understanding of these truths and I'd not been taught how to walk in His ways. I did not yet know about Tzitzis, mixed fabrics or calendar debates, but I knew we could at least start by obeying the Ten Commandments. We started there and found our souls being satisfied and filled with the substance of things we'd always hoped for. It was finally a way our faith could find freedom in works done not out of obligation or legalistic despair but in love, excitement, and joy.

It was as if on The Sabbath The Father was closer to us, almost like The King would come down onto the battlefield and give out rest, insight, battle plans, and understanding needed for the week to come. There was no greater time for revelation on things once veiled and concealed. It was during this day we would pray and see prayers answered in miraculous ways, or read The Scriptures and see it come alive with insights, perspectives, and revelations once hidden from our sight. It was joy inexpressible and something my wife and I can't imagine going a week without.

There is no better place to start to see for yourself what can happen when you obey His Instructions. Don't panic and become legalistic, just start by opening His Word and following The Way Jesus lived from Genesis to His final Revelation. The first thing in all of creation that was ever set apart, ever called holy, was not a man, the seas, or even wondrous women. We are not the center of creation like we've been taught to believe. The first thing ever called holy was The Sabbath.

The Father encoded it into creation, into our literal DNA, so that day of rest would restore our body, spirit, and soul, bringing us lost sheep of The House of Israel closer to Him. It is the knitting together the torn and tattered threads of prodigals' coverings into restored robes of righteousness which mark us as His beloved, set apart sons and daughters.

Walking The Way The Great Redeemer taught makes us set apart from this world to where we finally look like the image bearers of Yahweh we were made to be. Eating the Way He ate, celebrating the Way He celebrated His Father and resting the Way He rested were the foundations of our new way of living. These principles though are not ones experienced on "The Broad Way," but instead, they are learned in The Wilderness.

We experienced the hard way that you cannot drag other proclaimed believers down this walk with you. As excited and passionate as Chelsea and I were about the blessings we were discovering in our new way of life, we experienced ambivalence and ignorance from those we tried to share this with.

We learned that many are not ready to receive this understanding and it is not our responsibility how people respond to truth. But we are responsible for how we go about introducing truth to others. If they choose not to join us on this path, we must still be able to maintain the fruits of The Set-Apart Spirit in how we treat others who do not agree with us. After all, each of us is responsible for walking The Way of our Messiah, and often this means that we will have to leave the ones we once loved to have a higher love and intimacy with our Creator instead. (Matt. 10)

Eating foods He told us to eat and observing The Sabbath is where we started. We did not know what it meant to follow The Loving Instructions of God, His Torah, fully, or what the Hebrew Roots or Messianic Movement was all about. We knew there were likely to be pitfalls, false sheep, and deceptions among many of the things some people in those movements were saying, but we also knew there was so much freedom and blessing in learning His Word and beginning to obey His Instructions. Because of this, we spent countless hours starting to test and examine the things we'd been raised to believe were true. I had to undo much of the lies I'd been raised to believe but so too did Chelsea.

Growing up all her life in mainstream corporate Christianity, Chelsea wrestled for so long with breaking out of the traditions she'd been raised to believe were good or what God wanted. The more she examined and studied the source of these practices and traditions, the more she learned how they were rooted in Egyptian and Babylonian paganism and were utterly at odds with the way God told us to worship Him. (Exodus 32, Leviticus 23, John 14:15) The most noticeable of these corrupt and deceitful traditions of men is The Sabbath and holidays.

Even a cursory basic testing to the doctrine of Sun Day worship will reveal it is based in the Egyptian and Babylonian mystery religions. The pagan origins and further endorsements came not from Yahweh but by the leaders of the same Roman Empire, which murdered Jesus and built a universal religion to seductively swallow up puritans and pagans alike.

Dedicated Sun Day worship came well before the formalization of this doctrine into "Catholic Law" with Constantine, The Council of Laodicea, and later again at The Council of Trent. This is because Sun Day was reserved as a day of worship to Tammuz or "the cross bearing Mithra" the so-called sun of god. It will reveal the origins are firmly rooted in disobedience and deception those two markers of The Dragon's forked tongue and not The Word who became flesh. Even today worshiping on Sunday is an open marker of a church who has submitted itself to The Catholic Church.

Though The Protestants may have protested many heresy's of Universal theology, they failed to protest enough. In many ways they chose not to actually guard The Body from all doctrines of disobedience. They did not choose to follow and obey The Messiah they claim as Lord. Martin Luther along with other key leaders of The Protestant's infancy refused to obey The Scriptures on this doctrine. Instead they vehemently demanded people obey the doctrines of Catholicism and worship on the day the orgiastic, pedophilic pope Leo X, a Chosen One from The Medici Bloodline, said to worship rather than the day Yahweh set-apart.

By the same means our Universal Catholic and Christian churches had only ever taught us to celebrate the holidays of Easter (Ishtar) with the female fertility goddess's rabbits and eggs, or to worship the birth of the sun god Ra/Nimrod on Christmas, convincing the sheep these were all about Jesus. (Jeremiah, Ezekiel, James, Ephesians) Even though most pastors when pressed as to the origins of these holidays admit that they are wholly rooted in Babylonian and Egyptian worship to other gods, they still justify their practice to Christians and adherence to them for all. Doing this robs The Body of Messiah of the blessings that come from worshiping God not the way we want to but rather in The Way He instructed us to. Instead, this earns us the ability to live our lives under a curse. Read the book of Genesis, Exodus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua and Judges to understand just how The Father feels about us worshiping Him in ways He specifically forbids. If you are truly hungry to learn about our Redeemer, Psalm 119 is a quicker overview of understanding His Way.

Our priests and pastors never told us how to celebrate Yahweh's Feast Days which are our way of practicing the prophetic fulfillment of Jesus's first coming in The Spring Feasts like the exact day Jesus was impaled on the cursed tree during Passover and resurrected fulfilling the Feast of First Fruits. Keeping The Fall Feasts will help prepare us for His Second Coming. For the blessed fulfillment of the Great Days of Tribulation which will draw to a close and the final trumpet will blow, and then we will be resurrected and made to reign with our King forever after He throws the final Enemy Death into his place of eternal judgment. The Feasts are furthermore used as timepieces in judgment as well as blessing. For a more in-depth, historical understanding of this I highly recommend Chad Schafer's preeminant book, "The World in The Bondage of Egypt...Under the Triumphal Arch of Titus"

Learning about The Sabbath, eating the food He told us to, and celebrating The Feasts of Yahweh are a great place to start for all those who are trying to follow Jesus and walk The Way He walked. To learn how to be set apart and holy takes time. The beautiful thing is that this is what our lives are supposed to be about. They are supposed to be about us learning His ways, learning how to love Him and serve Him and fight for Him. There is so much to be learned when you begin to study these topics, and it can be overwhelming at first, but be patient with the process. There are so many things to learn but trust that The Father will help you learn what is most important first. Like the council in Acts 15, there are some fundamentals that need to be adhered to first, then as you study The Prophets, The Writings, and The Instructions of Yahweh, you will mature in your walk and apply more and more of His Ways to your own life. This process is nothing less than what it really should be when we claim to be born again, to be birthed into a new Way of living.

The truth is that there were changes of identity occurring every day of my life: changes from a murderer to merciful, from a son of Belial to a son of The Living God. Some of those changes came quickly, but others did not. There is only One who can change a leopard's spots or can make a wolf into a lamb. He alone could change the fabric of my being and with it change my future. The work He was doing in our wounded hearts was writing hope upon the canvas of despair. Without His Holy Hand pressing the Word to the fabric of our hearts we could never have known the pen would be mightier than the sword.

Chapter Thirty One

Leap of Faith

The upheaval Chelsea and I experienced invaded every area of our lives. Coming to grips with the reality of my past began to give me joy and freedom in ways I'd never known. I found an understanding of my identity being made new and whole.

Now I wake up next to a woman who loves every part of me. I can look over at them napping on a Sabbath snooze and see she is sleeping soundly, Naomi along with her. Chelsea holds her close as she should, and does not let her get far from her side. Their bond grows every day, and I see my wife finding herself content.

Chelsea had spent so much of her life growing bored and dissatisfied in her work as an RN, longing for a different purpose, a greater fulfillment to satisfy her soul. It was not until manipulative measures for vaccines were enforced at the hospitals that her passions for truth were kindled. Once they were, Chelsea could not help but seek out the reasons for the corruption and control being implemented in the big Pharma so called "Health Care System." Over time Chelsea's desires for the ways of the worldly system faded and she began to deeply desire a peculiar and set-apart life. Even before we were pregnant with Naomi, Chelsea had wanted to leave the workforce and to fully pursue the fun and challenges of being a mother and wife. In many ways though I hindered my wife's pursuit of her calling. I allowed fear into my marriage and our finances for many years. I had not developed child like faith that God would provide. I had feared for so long what would happen the day we lost her income, but sitting here now, watching her hold Naomi all my fears melt away.

I had spent so long worrying about where the money would come from. The loss of her income was far more than double what I could make in the mental health field, but I had faith The Father would somehow provide. We were eager to obey The Father's Instructions on how the family unit was supposed to be set up, and Chelsea had grown tired of working within the modern medical field, where the emphasis was on big business sick care and not cures, treatment, or remedies.

My employer granted me the ability to take two weeks of paternity leave, and just as it was drawing to an end, my work held a meeting informing us that many people were going to be losing their jobs. Promises were made that those who were in the room had secure jobs. I left excited I'd be heading back to work shortly. Two days later, my phone rang. The CEO of the company called to say he was going to be letting me go. For reasons I won't yet go into there was much more Family retribution and meddling involved. It was the last thing I'd expected, but I trusted that if The Father had allowed me to go into this situation, I had faith He would see us through.

As I write this, I find myself wanting to sugar coat what our lives looked like at that moment in time. I want to try to paint a prettier picture than what reality was. Rather than try to save face for the sake of my pride, I'll be honest with you all in a way that makes me nervous.

The truth is that aspects of my personalities, which had always performed our jobs and did the working, were not yet being aided by the increase of healing sessions we'd been going through. I no longer could compartmentalize my trauma into the different personalities like I'd done my whole life. Even while I was going through the restoration process over the previous six months, I could switch from the parts of my personality who were dealing with the pain, the trauma, the hurt, and the anger to my worker personality and do what I needed to do. However, once one begins the process of integration and restoration, the ability to continue to do this diminishes.

No longer did I have the "freedom" of having my traumas stuffed into the various compartments of my soul. Instead, the memories were present regardless of which personality was up. The grief of loss would be present when I woke up and leave me weeping for hours at a time. I was reliving torments no person should have to endure; though the emotions were buffered, they still flowed freely. The sensitivity and vulnerability I was experiencing left me in a messy state. I couldn't function – not like an average person.

The retribution of my family was at its highest, the spiritual wars were constant, and it took everything I had just to get up and face the day, knowing the challenges we'd meet. It is in this season of healing and integration where survivors are most often abandoned, forced to quit and turn back to the old ways to endure. Old addictions and old patterns of destructive behaviors can claw their way back in as the support system they had begins to crumble.

I understand messy people are not the most pleasant to be around. I know it is exhausting and hard to hear about people's traumas or abuse, but if you are someone who is entrusted with one of these most precious individuals, it is for an extraordinary purpose. To feel safe or loved enough even to be willing to deal with the trauma is a mountain of a battle. For someone to finally be willing to talk about their experiences or abuse is tremendous. Once they begin to do this, it is so critical that people establish healthy and appropriate boundaries of support for them.

I am not suggesting that everyone become a therapist, a counselor, or anchor of support to each survivor. What I am suggesting is that you prayerfully consider what the ways are that you can be part of the answer to this wounded one's needs. Would you be able to commit to praying every other day for this person or their family? Would you be able to meet with them once a week, taking them to get lunch, reminding them you care about them and are there for them? Would you be willing to help support them financially if they are unable to work? Could you pay for one of their counseling sessions or buy them some groceries so they can eat? Maybe you can help them research their past in order to help them understand more of what happened to them. One of the best things you can do is listening, caring, and choosing not to run from them. Do not run from them or hide from them when they are as vulnerable as this. This is the time to reinforce their support system, not pick it apart. The challenges survivors face during this first and most intense portion of healing are the most critical. For excellent information on this topic see David and Donna Carrico's book From Victims to Victors Through the Cross of Jesus Christ or their website www.ritualabusefree.org

The retribution they are facing for being "offline" with their handler, controllers, or former families is at its most intense. The support system becomes the target of these individuals because they know that if they can convince people to leave the Survivor, to abandon them, it will in most cases cause them to re-engage and reconnect with the puppet masters of their past. My Family eradicated so much of our support system during this time and once my job was taken, so too was our ability to survive apart from the generosity and blessing of others.

This is the part I want to skip over, the part where I was in some ways a mess, barely able to walk, go to the store, or pick up the ringing phone. It was a time when I knew I could not go and provide for my family. At the same time, Naomi got sick. She had a digestion problem that did not allow her the ability to break down Chelsea's breast milk. Naomi was miserable, fussy and unable to be comforted unless she was moving. In order to help keep her from crying or to try to get her some sleep, Chelsea consoled her by nursing her and holding her day and night. Many, many tears were shed during this time: hers, Naomi's, and my own. The spiritual oppression peaked as we neared the unholy high days surrounding Halloween.

Some friends of ours we'd met at the Hear The Watchmen conference had been tremendously supporting us by giving us a 0% interest loan so we could pay off our high interest credit card debt and by enabling much of our move to a single income. With my job taken, I was forced to try and use that money towards food, mortgage, and utilities. This was not really in line with the reasons for the agreement we'd had with them, and it was clear they were not comfortable with this. We could never have endured so much of that early season of healing without their support, but without the continuity of the money, Chelsea and I were left without other options.

I'd like to tell you I mustered up my strength, I pulled on my bootstraps, and just got it done. I want to say I went and started working three jobs and did what I needed to do to pay for my sick daughter and wife to survive. I'd like to tell you I wasn't tempted to slip back into The Underworld and "earn my keep." I would like to say that somehow, I was better than I was. But I wasn't. I knew my weaknesses, and Chelsea helped me to trust in Yahweh during this time even when familiar fear came crawling up my spine.

I chose to have belief in my Creator. Even when the Familial offers of prostituted redemption came in, I chose to say no. I chose to have my wife, daughter, and me be free from controllers whose money dripped with blood. I chose poverty instead of plenty, and I knew the little we had in freedom and love would be more delicious than abundance earned through thieving, manipulation, and deceit. (Prov. 17) The truth is that we saw The Lord God provide for His children. We saw that there is a greater family than the one I'd forsaken; it comes not through manipulation but through choice and humility. Over the next few months, we got to see Him help stir up other people around us who intervened and became living miracles.

No one we knew and trusted had the ability or willingness just to pay all our bills, but no part of The Body was ever meant to serve all its functions. We had some pay our mortgage one month, and we had others bring over bags of groceries with hugs and laughter. It was not the wealthy who had multiple six or seven-figure earning jobs who stepped in, but instead, it was a passionate man who lived in a van who shared a meal in our home and left an envelope of cash as he went, and a middle-aged over worked teacher who paid our mortgage.

It was so hard for me to live like this. I had to unlearn much of the ways I'd once used to survive, one of the greatest of which was hiding the truth of our situation from outsider's eyes. To help me learn to be free, The Redeemer would help me to learn to be vulnerable with people and be willing to show the truth of our brokenness and need. As bills pressed upon us like nooses on our necks, I finally relented and humbled myself enough to ask our church for help. It was not an easy conversation, and the application process was tremendous, as our church had many steps to walk through before relief was offered, but in one fell swoop of generosity, they paid every bill we had that month. It was a tapestry of miracles woven with prayers answered by manna, water from the rocks, and clothing, which didn't wear out.

Chelsea and I were wandering in The Wilderness, but The Most High God provided what we needed. It was not more than we needed; some bills were left unpaid, the food we'd prepared for the end of the world became dinner on our plates and breakfasts in the morning. We sold anything we could: Chelsea found things at the thrift store and flipped them on eBay to pay our insurance bill one month and groceries for a week. I took knives I'd spent hours customizing with holsters, and survival equipment I'd used for expeditions, and sold them to keep our water and electricity on for thirty days. All of this bought us the freedom to go through a more intense and accelerated path to integration and healing. It also gave us the ability to start ministering to others who were in need.

Soon I was able to start connecting with other survivors who were just beginning to come out of the cults and covens they'd become ensnared by. This led to more intense spiritual warfare and other assassination attempts on Chelsea and me, but it also led to greater freedom for beloved wounded ones. It was the craziest and most intense time of our lives. Chelsea and I weren't sure it was ever going to end. There was no way to know where the next month's money was going to come from, but we did learn one place it was not. After the interview process with our church, they made sure to make it abundantly clear that they would only help people out in this way one time. They had instituted corporate policies to keep from becoming continual providers to the needy. As such they were going to be able to provide us no further assistance.

We did not have other people to turn to or ask, so with no other options, I humbled myself again and went and stood in the government benefits line. I joined the ranks of people who for their reasons stood in line with their needy hands extended. There was not a church for me to turn to, there was no fleshly kinsman redeemer in my life, so I did what I needed to and made sure my wife and daughter were fed. The benefits provided to us would give us four months: four months of food, four months of mortgage and utilities paid, but that would be it. It was a miracle still that we did not earn, and for that we were grateful. It was the first time Chelsea and I had ever gone on benefits, but I suppose that's why they are there. I can't sit here now and complain for pages and pages on how this is supposed to be where The Church provides but the reality is they can't.

Our churches have not taught their congregations how to manage money, how to be entrepreneurs and critical thinkers, or how to be debt free. Our pastors are often in more debt than most of the congregation because the buildings, property, and their lack of financial independence have swept the real legs of support right out from under them.

As its been written,

"The borrower is always a slave to the lender." (Prov. 22)

God's economy as outlined in His Instructions was not to be built on debt, slavery, and wage work, but upon an entirely different system of labor and freedom. God had even worked into His Feasts one in which the tithe or the offerings of the body were to be given wholly unto the poor, the orphans, and the widows. (Deut. 16) Another part was meant to be kept, meant for us to enjoy and fund our celebration of The Biblical celebrations and Feasts. The business-minded and corporately controlled church though does not have the freedom to give their tithes away; the expenses must be covered first before the needy can get their help.

It is because of this that the needy are forced to look to government systems, which have their own cost to provide for their needs. They must turn to the same government who seals their private, Family owned promissory debtors notes with Osiris's All Seeing Eye. It is a broken system, one which has a tremendous cost. Without it, though, I'm not sure what Chelsea and I would have done. We were in need, and they became part of the answer to coming out of bondage and into freedom instead.

Chelsea and I were able to take care of Naomi, and with this consistent money coming in; I was able to focus more on my healing. Over those next few months, I began to have an invigorating passion, empowering peace, and restoration. Soon the only thing left lingering keeping me from fully functioning was my physical body pain and Naomi's sickness.

Into this moment came a blessing that would change the path of Chelsea's and my future. With it would come freedom from pain, healing for our daughter, and financial freedom, which did not require a 9-to-5 job.

Chapter Thirty Two

When Passover Provides

Just a few weeks before most families are getting ready to celebrate Easter, Chelsea and I decided it was time we did our best to celebrate our first Biblical Feast, Passover. Passover is one feast, which hallmarks the most crucial moment in our faith. It offered us the joy of celebrating the Passover Lamb who was slain and resurrected, purchasing for us all the redemption we so desperately needed. Two things happened just before we began our celebration, which would test our faith. One would drive fear and dread into our hearts, while the other would show us the blessings in store for us when we choose not to stray from His Ways.

One of the things, which had been providing our needs during this time, was the unemployment benefits for Chelsea. With just a few weeks to go until Passover, Chelsea received a letter notifying us that her former employer was contesting the payment of the benefits. A hearing to determine her case had been scheduled to occur on Passover. In no uncertain terms, they threatened to not only stop the payment of future benefits, but also require us to pay back the entire prior issued funds. Reading those words brought on a sickening feeling of hopelessness and despair we could hardly shake. Over the next few weeks, we took that letter and laid it on the floor as we prayed. Knowing this was something, which was entirely out of our hands, we wanted to choose to have faith in our Heavenly Father's favor in this matter. (2 Kings 20, Book of Susannah)

While the hearing drew closer and closer, the unimaginable dread would do its best to settle over our home. We did not have a way out from the financial repercussions ahead; the destroyer of our peace and hope was crouching at the door. Even as we felt its dark presence, we grabbed onto the promises God gave us that we did not need to fear destruction but know He would fight for us. Our faith had grown and matured, and we were beginning to walk not by earthly sight but by His Holy might.

The morning of Passover, Chelsea and I were walking around the house, putting the final things together for our feast. Looking at the clock, we saw it was time to make a phone call to determine our fate. Naomi clutched around her mother's neck as we huddled together in the kitchen and prayed. We prayed to the God of The Impossible, knowing this was the day thousands of years ago when death passed over His people, a day when the whole of the might of Egypt's armies, gods, and princes could not stand against the people of The Promise. We thanked Him for His faithfulness to us and the miracle, which gave each of us the power to place the Lamb's perfect blood over our spiritual doors. Comfort became our cover as a feeling of peace washed over us no fleshly tongue could be worthy to describe. Chelsea headed up to our bedroom where she shut the door. Her faith had moved mountains of fear far from her, and she picked up the phone and dialed.

Twenty minutes later, I saw my wife coming down the stairs. This was the woman who had held my shaking hands, kissed my quivering lips, and loved me while the world sought to tear us apart. I saw tears upon her cheeks as she drew near and threw her arms around my neck. Weeping, she stumbled out the words, "They withdrew their appeal and all future appeals, and instead they reinstated our benefits to their full amounts. Our God is so good to us."

We held each other for moments, which turned to minutes, as we saw for ourselves a miracle of the heavenly kind. It was a miracle which reminded a poor family in the mountains that The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob still answers the cries of the needy, poor, and orphaned in their days of distress. Our God is a strong deliverer; He is the calmer of raging seas and the shaker of the pillars of the earth. He is the God who set fire to the mountains of Sinai and stood as a pillar of fire between the armies of killers and His people at the Red Sea. He still moves with miracles and provides for you and me. We have seen the God of miracles with our tear stained eyes. He came to show us that on Passover, He will provide. He provided us all the guiltless Lamb to cover our once wounded hearts with hope, to cover our guilt, shame, and fear with forgiveness, robes of righteousness, and faith in their place. He purchased for us redemption at the foot of that cursed tree.

When the sun had set, Chelsea and I gathered around borrowed tables and newly purchased chairs with friends and family. We gathered and broke the unleavened bread and drank home brewed Kombucha from plastic cups as the wine of remembrance. We shared with others the story of the first Passover in Egypt and its extraordinary fulfillment thousands of years later. When the perfect Passover Lamb cried out “It is finished,” at the same moment, the high priest stood at the temple sacrificing the lamb without spot or blemish, speaking those same three words.

Finally the one and only perfect Red Hefer sacrifice was offered. Now Azazel that fallen Watcher angel, who all sin would finally be ascribed too, watched the sinless offering for the redemption of all bear forth-eternal fruit. (Leviticus 16, 1 Enoch 12-16, Jude, 2 Peter) After reading these stories and that of the first great Exodus we uncovered the mystery of the bread and the wine, then washed each other’s feet and poured out blessings and prayers to each other.

Our God is a deliverer to His people. He does not grow weary, and He does not change. He loves to remind His sons and daughters that He still moves in power, mercy, and strength. He is not interested in our perfection, our legalism, or our checklists of doing what is right. He is interested in hearts that yearn for Him, long for Him to be their all-consuming love. He is not slow to answer but says to us all, “Call upon Me in your day of trouble and I will deliver you.” (Psalm 50:15)

Chelsea and Naomi and I started a new Reynolds tradition that day. We began to observe The Feasts of Yahweh as entrusted to The Israelites in The Wilderness so long ago. He gave us those feasts days to be observed forever so that we would practice and prepare for their fulfillment in days to come. (Exo. 12:14, Lev. 23:41) As well as to help guard ourselves from being deceived.

The Israelites were observing those first spring feasts of Passover, Unleavened Bread, and First Fruits in the days of Messiah’s first coming. Some of the people saw the prophetic fulfillment with their own eyes. Some were there to bear witness to the moment when the leaven of our sins was taken away as the body of our Redeemer was broken for you and for me. Some looked upon the First Fruits of the Resurrection as tombs were opened and the dead walked out of the hollows of the earth in Sheol and ultimately out of their graves. Even a greater mixed multitude of The Lost Sheep of The House of Israel were present when The fire of The Holy Spirit fell upon the people during Pentecost, just as the fire of Yahweh descended during the first Pentecost at Mt. Sinai that same day thousands of years before.

Our Father longs for His people to remember His miracles and His prophecies fulfilled, and to practice our dress rehearsals for Messiah’s second arrival, The Great Revelation of our King of Kings in the Fall Feasts and at the final trumpet blast heralding our King’s Second arrival. May we be found practicing His holy tradition by keeping His Instructions and celebrating The Feasts of Yahweh. May we be found obeying His Loving Instructions when He arrives.

Might we show the world a better tradition that was given to us so long ago, a tradition not perpetually poisoned by its pagan roots, which will always give honor and glory to The Rebellious King Nimrod, and his mother, and wife Ishtar. May we instead worship our God in the way He tells us to worship Him. May we celebrate the miracles of His provision by blessing our friends and family with a feast to our Redeemer and King. Might we teach our children The Ways of our Messiah's Kingdom and not the ways of this world.

The Family I was born into taught me to defile, curse, and destroy the Holy Days of Yahweh, but now Naomi was born into a family, which will guide her to bless, honor, and cherish His Feasts. She will be raised under the covering of my home where we delight ourselves in The Loving Instructions of our God. She will be shown the narrow Way of The Messiah, and in time she will be given her opportunity to choose to walk with us into the heart of darkness where we seek to set captives free, or she can choose to rebel and join the ways of this world and the Enemy's camp of beautified bondage. I will not force her to follow my way, just as The Father does not force us to choose His.

I will not manipulate her, control her, or deceive her into doing my will. Naomi Grace, I love you enough to let you have free will to know the power of choosing. I pray you will choose The Narrow Way of life instead of the broad way of destruction. (Matt. 7:13-14, Luke 13:24, 2 Cor. 6:17) I pray you will choose to be set apart, to be holy unto our Elohim. I pray you decide to leave the deception of this world to the blinded and deceived sheep, and not embrace its seduction or fear its threats. You were made for mighty deeds, my beloved daughter. Things this world cannot fathom will be fulfilled as you pray with truth, authority, faith, and love.

To all you sons and daughters: I warn you now that the forces of evil will hunt you in the night. They will stalk you in your sleep and hunger for your flesh. They will long to destroy you and sift you as wheat. Know this: I will fight for you with every breath in my lungs and with every drop of blood in my body. With sword drawn, I will stand between you and those cowardly serpents. Naomi, I will lay my life down in defense for you, that you might see your dad is no longer a murderer, addict, or feign, but now is a warrior of Yahweh Elohim. I am not willing to see you thrown into the perverse pits or made to pass through the black fires. You will be free, my daughter, to live in the abundance of Abba's love, joy, and grace.

I pray you, dear reader, will remember these words. I pray as the temptation stalks your thoughts, remember our Redeemer fights for you and fights with you in this great War of The Ages. I hope you look upon your fingers and know He gave them to you to work towards the redemption of the lost sheep and ravenous wolves alike. May The Good Shepherd of our souls remind you of all these things. May He breathe upon you a fresh anointing of His Spirit to strengthen you and empower you to walk in His ways. May He kindle in you a holy flame that burns brightly for the entire world to see. I pray you burn with furious hope, relentless passion, and unceasing determination to fulfill His great call.

This was the first of two things Passover provided us that month. The second brought with it changes to our hurting bodies and release from our financial bondage.

Chapter Thirty Three

Family Relief

Many of the difficulties Chelsea and I faced over those first two years of restoration were stuck in dealing with my bodily pain as well as Naomi's digestion and health. There was no way I could get around the burdens and baggage my body had carried. For years it had been deprived of the opportunity to heal and be at rest. Due to our lack of consistent income, Chelsea and I became resourceful in finding ways to supplement our lack of health insurance, standard "job securities" and medical care by turning to natures medicines.

We spent years studying, researching, and testing the things we learned about how diet, exercise, water, and real food make in how our bodies function. For years we had lived in continual states of lethargy. There were constant battles with the inflammation in my joints, which had been damaged through many Family dealings. Chelsea and I first started by modifying our water, instead of the fluoridated, and pharmaceutical laden tap water we found a local spring, which dumped onto the rocks and began to drink our fill. Within a few months of drinking the natural water our attentiveness, clarity of thought, and energy began to improve.

Slowly, but surely Chelsea and I implemented new approaches to our diet including moving away from the highly processed and genetically modified products being labeled as food. Towards ones that were natural and still full of the energy packed substance our bodies craved. Financially, this decision to not shop based on price but the quality was difficult. However, we found ways of giving up more convinces like trash service, smartphones, and other digital subscriptions helped to offset the cost and drastically improve our quality of life. We soon found that eating more organic, plant-based, with organic lean meats and eggs to satisfy our bodies with energy and sustenance.

Even still there were some significant problems with Naomi's body and my own. Chelsea and I continued to try to learn about better natural eating principles when we stumbled on a YouTube Show called Biblical Health-with Chris and Liz Bailey. The information this passionate and unbelievably well-studied couple put forth challenged, convicted, and encouraged Chelsea and me to decide to pursue a more set-apart way of eating. After starting Naomi on their Core Health Products, Digestive Enzyme we saw the first marked improvement of her digestion.

However, as our financial situation changed, I could no longer afford their companies supplements. After Liz Bailey heard about us, she voluntarily donated the products to a family in need thousands of miles away. Chris and Liz embodied the love and provision of The Father to my family and reminded me of how Yahweh's Kingdom is supposed to operate. They helped to meet our needs in any way they could, and years later we would grow to become dear Truth-seeking friends and family from afar. Check out (www.corehealthproducts.com) to connect, bless, or be blessed by the faithful Bailey family.

The blessings for walking in The Way were only beginning, and soon more opportunities for relief would come when we least expected it.

While we set about getting ready for Passover, Chelsea told me we were going to need some folding chairs to accommodate the other guests. Looking on craigslist late one night, I stumbled on an ad for some black wooden chairs being sold. A few days later, I headed up to meet the man from the ad. Pulling up the driveway, I was greeted by a barrel-chested young man who said, "Hello." Inviting me inside, he said his wife was on a call.

We started talking and I learned that his wife had a coffee business, and he offered me a free cup. Excited to try free coffee, I wholeheartedly agreed. After making me a cup, we started talking some more, and I shared some of the passion Chelsea and I have for being debt free. I told him how we were called to travel around the country in an RV and sharing a testimony of encouragement to those coming out of deception, be it manipulators' hands or miserable Monday mornings. In walked his wife, who greeted me with a warm smile and passion.

She shared with me more about the coffee I was drinking and how there was a health benefit stirred right in. I thought the coffee tasted great, but at that moment I was too caught up in my world to listen to what she had to say that night. She mentioned, as I was getting ready to leave that there may be a way for Chelsea and me to use the coffee to raise funds on the road. Intrigued, I made an appointment for her to call me the following morning and see what I thought of the coffee's taste and how it made me feel. Her husband helped me load the chairs in my car, and I began my drive down south.

The physical pain I'd been battling had gotten more severe over the previous few months and a simple hour drive often left me crippled for a day. Twenty minutes into my trip, I felt something I'd forgotten was possible. I felt relief. I felt the pain in my body just turn down. I can't say it disappeared or anything like that but I noticed the sensitivity and nerves in my spine and shoulders was finally calm. I had no idea what was going on but I began to weep. I hadn't felt relief in so long. The pain, which wrecked my body, had been out of control and my refusal to rely on deadly pharmaceuticals had heightened so much of this battle. I had given up hope that I could ever feel better and had grown to accept the realities of living in chronic pain. Drinking that cup of coffee gave me a glimmer of hope that maybe things could be different.

The next morning, as Casey had promised, she gave me a call and I told her I needed to meet with her again and get more of the coffee to see if it could help me find relief. She agreed and we met at a Starbucks where Casey explained to me why their coffee was different. It was not the coffee itself that made me feel better but a food called Ganoderma Lucidum. She told me about this super food that was the most anti-inflammatory and alkaline food on the earth. I had spent a great deal of time learning about inflammation’s role in our bodies’ perception of pain as well as cognitive and digestion issues, and began to listen more closely. Chelsea had also been doing studies of natural remedies for thyroid issues, and our bodies’ increased ability to fight off diseases, cancers, and sicknesses when in an alkaline balanced PH level. We had already been blown away by how much better we felt since eating food in accordance with The Fathers Instructions as well as an organic diet.

Casey explained the ways people for thousands of years had used this herb to bring changes to an extraordinary number of health challenges. She told me testimonials others had experienced over the last eight years, finding their bodies restored from all kinds of ailments. She also showed me the opportunity of how it could provide us the income we needed to replace while having the freedom to recover still and get the healing we were requiring. As she was talking, I could feel a skeptical voice prickling my ears that this was too good to be true. Rather than dismiss something before testing it myself, I decided I would go and do my research and test this out. I agreed with Casey that I would try it for a few weeks and see what it could to for Chelsea, Naomi, and me.

As I began to drink the “King of coffee,” I found within just two weeks the flares of pain continually coursing through my body hushed down to a whisper. The arthritic pain I’d had in my right hand from an injury finally disappeared, and I was able to use it without the pins and needles I'd felt for years. I lay down without wincing and found my energy bloomed. To those that have not dealt with chronic pain, it can be so hard to understand this. When I finally woke up without pain, I felt like my brain turned back on. So much of my mind had been devoted to managing the pain, and when those mental resources were finally freed up, the clarity and focus I'd once contained were free to work again.

I could not believe how much better I felt. Soon Chelsea tried the teas and the insomnia she'd had for months disappeared. I was excited beyond belief, knowing that this may be the thing we'd been waiting for to help us be able to get back to functioning and to work for our family. Chelsea with her traditional nursing background wanted to spend more time going through hundreds of peer-reviewed articles on PubMed about Ganoderma Lucidum and after she did, she too was convinced this was something we needed to be a part of.

We got Naomi started on the Organic Spore Powder supplement, and in a couple of weeks, she was finally able to reset her digestion system and could sleep in peace. It was a blessing beyond belief to see our daughter finally freed from the cramps, bloating, and sickness. She could finally develop normally, and soon she began to crawl and babble to our great delight.

We knew we'd found what The Father had for us, and over the next few months, I poured my passion into learning about the business, the industry as a whole, and leading a team. Within that time, Chelsea got to stay at home with Naomi and raise our now healthy and growing daughter with joy. I began to drink the body management shakes and lost nineteen pounds in the first thirty days, and more importantly kept off the weight. It gave my body the energy boost and vitality I needed to get back to work. It took some time but I was relentless in my willingness to go and talk to anybody about this coffee and tea that changed our lives.

Just as our government benefits ran out, our business began to replace the income we'd lost. It was one of the most encouraging and exciting things to see, to know there was a way of providing for my family that did not require a nine-to-five job. I knew I'd found a way of working that worked for us, for our unique situation, and for our goals and dreams. It has granted Chelsea and me the freedom of changing people's lives, whether financial or spiritual. We now are armed with tools that can bring encouragement to the many different areas of people's lives.

Working the business granted me the insurmountable joy of working with business partners who pour their own passion and excitement into fighting for their financial freedoms. To each of you who has granted me the honor of working with you since I first began my business, I thank you.

Hope had come flooding into our home, but another predator was stalking at the edges of our peace ready to destroy it all. I could never have known this blessing without those Passover chairs, and I thank God every day for that craigslist ad and someone who was willing to share a cup of Black Coffee with a long-haired hurting man late one spring night.

I'd hoped that with those changes would come abundance, blessings, and peace. I hoped my healing would be accelerated and I would not need to deal with much of the remainder of the issues from my past. I made an internal agreement that I would place much of my healing on pause while I went and learned about business and sought a way to get us out of this hole of debt we'd been plunged into. This may have worked for a while but soon the lion, which stalked in the darkness, would strike another devastating blow. Death would return to my home, innocent blood would be spilled, and this time it would be that of my beloved daughter.

Chapter Thirty Four

When Death Calls

My phone wouldn't stop ringing. I'd flipped it to silent, but still it buzzed over and over again in my pocket. I was annoyed that someone would be interrupting me in such a critical moment. The business was just starting to have some traction, and I was meeting with some new business partners, having what I thought was one of the most important conversations of my life. Buzzzzz, buzzzz, buzzzz. On and on, it wouldn't stop. Finally, I glanced down at my phone and saw that I had seven missed calls from Chelsea. Before I could swipe my keys, she called again.

I answered an expensive phone call; the cost would be the life of a friend who'd never abandoned me, a friend who held me while I wept, screamed, and grieved for the countless lives lost before my eyes. He'd been with me as I'd explored tunnels in the mountains and when I'd made my way through the halls of hell that marked my past. He'd never mocked me or called me crazy. He let me weep when I needed to and swam at my side when I dove into the depths of water for the first time in four years. He'd kept my heart beating on nights when I thought it would burst. He'd kept our bodies warm when Chelsea and I shivered against the alpine cold. He'd reminded me there was still joy in the mourning, and there was yet a story of rescue waiting for us all. His name was Ruger; he was my best friend, and he was my dog.

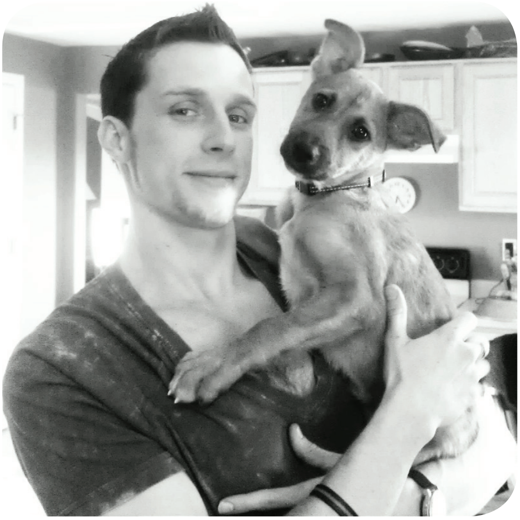
Ruger came into Chelsea's and my life just about the time that the "Switch" occurred from Nate to Nathan. Chelsea knew how badly I'd wanted a dog and she thought it was time we got one. I spent a few months researching before I decided on a few breeds that were ideal. The choices narrowed down by our budget as we began to go and check out different puppies in the area. Soon one option would rise above the others.

Ruger came to Chelsea and me from an island in the Bahamas called Turks and Caicos. Although we had never been to the island, we heard that there was a problem with the overpopulation of feral dogs. Most of the dogs are friendly scavengers who are a wide blend of breeds and sizes from shepherds to corgis. The dogs earn their name from begging for food, which the locals prepare in large pots. After cooking and later reheating beans and peas in the same pot, a thick burned cake is left behind. This pot cake is then fed to the dogs. This is why Ruger is a Royal Bahamian Potcake. Potcakes' character traits vary but most are known for two things: intelligence and intense loyalty. Because of this, they are beloved by their owners who can acquire one through a person couriering them back to the US where they are disseminated through various agencies.

Ruger came to the United States as a four-month-old puppy in the worst shape. He was emaciated with health issues ranging from giardia to an extremely weak, damaged hip. Chelsea and I went to look at him over at a home that fostered dogs waiting to find their home. We saw Ruger for the first time trotting in from the backyard where he was playing with his other Potcake brother. When he came inside, he saw us strangers and skirted to the edge of the house, watching us with fixed trepidation. Only after a few minutes of him seeing how the other dogs were content with our presence did he come and allow us our first greeting. We had spent many months researching how to select a dog and though Ruger was a mix of breeds I was more than eager to own, his initial personality was not quite what I was hoping for.

As we spent more time testing Ruger and him testing us, the Lord moved me in my spirit that this was the dog he had for Chelsea and me. Wanting confirmation, I pulled Chelsea aside and as we spoke, it became abundantly clear that she was discerning the same thing. We told the owner our thoughts, and we all agreed to welcome him into our family. We placed Ruger in his little kennel and drove him to his new home.

Ruger's arrival in our house was met with excitement and also a dedication I had not had for any dog. I was determined to train, bond, and cultivate a companionship with him. I was free to pour my passion into this dog. I would spend hours watching training videos, reading books, and then putting into practice what I had learned.



His initial welcome into our house was met with trepidation of the most extreme degree. He spent his first day shaking in his kennel, too unsure to come out. Ruger later ever so cautiously emerged and began to explore his home for the first time in his life. It was a real home for him. It took a few more days, but as he became more confident of his surroundings, he began to show his prowess.

Ruger was by far the most intelligent dog I had ever worked with, and he learned everything I could throw at him as quickly as I could figure out how to teach it to him. With only two potty incidents inside, I thought I couldn't have received a more wonderful dog. But Ruger would not turn out to be an easy dog; instead, he would be the dog Chelsea and I needed.

Just as we thought Ruger was coming into his own, two large dogs smashed into him at the dog park. The impact further damaged Ruger's already weakened hip and led to him being crippled. Here was the dog I had waited all my life for, but what I had thought would be the perfect guardian and backpacking companion dog for Chelsea and me was a crippled, growth stunted, 33lb mess of a dog. His messiness drove me to continually ask Abba, "Why? Why would this have been the dog You chose for us?" Over and over, He was silent in His response to my fervent prayers until one day His voice rang through my frustration, "I entrusted him to you." That was all He said but that was everything. In five words, The Living God was generous enough to share with me a perspective that only He can give. God chose not to provide me with a perfectly healthy and expertly trained dog. Instead, he entrusted me with a broken, messy animal that needed one thing more than any other: commitment.

Ruger required owners that were willing to do whatever it took to give him every chance for a fulfilled existence on this earth. Ruger is a dog, I know this, and he will always be a dog, but as any person who has put the time, dedication, and sacrifice into really raising a superb dog can tell you, there is so much more there when you have a relationship with a great dog than when you merely own a pet. Ruger spent months of his first year of life barely able to walk, and pooping colors and textures I don't even want to try to describe.

Unfortunately for Ruger, and more so for us, his problems stemmed not merely from his physical health but also from his overall wellness. Ruger – like most dogs who are rescued from severe abuse or neglect cases – had baggage. More than a busted hip, Ruger lived out of fear. His interactions with Chelsea and me that first moment we laid eyes on him were powerful indicators of this. Though the Lord's words calmed my reservations regarding this, the fear in Ruger was the subtle enemy of the bond with a great dog I had so desperately sought.

It first came to notice on our second walk with Ruger. His first had gone so well I was nearly beside myself with joy. But then the honeymoon phase ended, and the fullness of Ruger's baggage came out as we walked by his first terror: a trash can. To Ruger, the black trashcans parked on the side of the curb caused terror in his emaciated little body. He would urinate on himself, shaking from head to tail on his short leash. I could see in him a single emotion: terror. Ruger knew terror because he had been terrorized.

At the hands of human beings, Ruger was taught fear. He was made to know its nature and to understand its most detailed intricacies. Ruger's fear was not limited to trashcans but it included keys, large men, things covering his head, bags hanging off people, and cords. Ruger's seemingly unconnected sets of random stuff in my house and in my neighborhood caused terror in him. Ruger feared that which had harmed him. This is the fruit of evil. People had abused my dog.

He had been taught to fear. He had been taught an evil thing. Now thousands of miles away from those abusers, on his second walk in my neighborhood, Ruger saw one of those same trashcans he had been taught to fear. No wonder my dog had fears. Evil had gotten its mark on my dog. And so I was faced with that beautiful word again: entrusted.

This dog is whom God entrusted to Chelsea and me. This was the greatest of blessings I could have ever known. For as Chelsea and I would encounter one of Ruger's fears, we would teach him a new word: faith. It was not kindness, compassion, or gentleness; it was faith, which inoculated my dog to the most potent form of evil.

Ruger needed to know that he could trust me. He needed to know I was not one of those abusive people. He needed to know that his pack leader was good. He needed to know his leader would feed him, shelter him, and meet his basic needs first.

Once Ruger learned he would have those needs met, he was freed to learn that I would always protect him, love him, and be kind to him. He needed to believe I would be patient, compassionate, and gentle. As Ruger came to know these truths, he was freed to learn that the rope in his pack leader's hands was safe because he could trust his pack leader. This was the process for Chelsea and me to teach Ruger the things he once feared no longer had to keep him terrorized.

We met Ruger's needs. We studied, we researched, we got help, and we learned how to be the right owners to Ruger. We believed Ruger needed to be made well, and Chelsea and I were given the opportunity be the answer to that problem. We were able to be faithful and steadfast in that call, and because of it, we were able to see just what God can do when we are obedient. I could not have known what God was going to do to our lives through having an abused dog in our home, but as always when we step into the thing we fear, Yahweh shows us just how powerful His Ways are.

Yahweh knew what was coming in the years ahead. He knew the handlers of my personality were going to park outside my driveway and trigger me with their words because my "services" were going to be demanded again. More importantly, Yahweh knew I was going to need a companion for the journey into The Wilderness of remembering and learning the truth. That harrowing call, which interrupted my meeting rang through with words that would devour this love of mine. Before I can tell you the end I must tell you about a choice, which changed me forever. It will lead us back to the days before Naomi graced us with her arrival. A time when the mountains became my retreat and my dog kept me breathing.

Chapter Thirty Five

Falling in Love Again

The first steps into the wild were weighed down with backpacks. I cinched Ruger's pack down on his back as Chelsea and I prepared to step onto the trail. We headed through mountain meadows and up forested hills. The hours passed as we saw the wonders hidden away for those who are willing to leave the comforts of civilizations and perfectly paved roads. We hiked over waterfalls and bedded down that night by a glacial lake. I went to sleep happier than I'd been in a long time.

The hunger for the hunt and for the lonely places, and the need to prepare for battle was building every day. The discontentment I felt with my life had never been higher. I was eager to come and put my skills and training to the test. I'd spent months preparing for that trip, carefully researching and selecting every piece of equipment and taking the time to make sure they were the best.

That first night we slept in a single-walled tent used for expeditions up Everest. It was small and lightweight, just big enough for the two of us. As we prepared to go to bed, the temperature plummeted to well below freezing, and Chelsea insisted we bring Ruger in from the cold. Relenting, I brought him into the tent where he bedded down at our feet. For a moment frozen in time, I felt complete.

My wife was lying next to me bundled up in wool and down feathers I'd helped to supply. I smelled mountain chamomile and wood smoke in the air. I could taste the fresh meal I'd carried up the mountainside. The perpetual restlessness in my soul, which had bid me to be ready to flee, escape, and evade, faded and I was free for a moment from its shackles and confines.

The air was crisp the next morning, and promises of peace washed down with every breath. I had my favorite customized pistol and tools for mountain expeditions strapped to my chest, and my backpack was loaded up. I looked over to see my wife smiling and my dog sniffing out chipmunks just beyond my reach. Ruger was loyal, and though he was off leash, he never wandered. He was happier on the trail than at any other time.

Soon Chelsea and I realized this was the place we wanted to be. We wanted to get up to the mountains and explore the wonders waiting on the trails. What was waiting back in civilization was frustration, but Ruger helped to provide me an outlet, ensuring I would survive the months to come.

Each week I would go to work, and as soon as possible, I would head home, throw on our packs, and head off to hike. I could be me on the trails within just minutes. Out there I didn't have to hide the skills I'd learned or the tools of the trade. Out on the way of the wild, I was free to carry my pistols to fend off bears and show off my blades. I could carve notches in branches, feather sticks for tinder, and help my wife build a temporary shelter against the wind and rain. I could start fires with flint and steel, and teach others to do the same. In the wild, I could hunt for the perfect spot to spend the night and not have to think about the dreams: the hauntings of memories clawing their way through my soul.

Nate may have dated and fallen in love with Chelsea by taking her to spots in the city. But Nathan and the rest of us fell in love with her in the flowery meadows ten thousand feet above sea level and running from Bigfoot spirit creatures down back country trails. I found my joy renewed in the places where I could pick through patches of wild raspberries and find springs of fresh water bubbling out of rocks.

Emmaline Trailhea

It was the summer after we got Ruger that Chelsea and I bonded for the first time. While I pumped water through a filter from a glacial stream, I saw in her what I am sure Nate saw in her too. I saw in her a woman who loved me even as I was. I saw in her a treasure and a delight. I saw her as she could be when freed from the shackles of her job and mundane Monday through Friday life. It was in that tiny tent with Ruger sleeping at our feet where we talked and listened and once again became one. Ruger was always there no matter where we went, except for the time a black bear approached our tent. He barked and growled to warn me, but then he hid by his momma while I went gleefully stalking into my familiar darkness with a flashlight and pistol to chase it off. That dog grew to be my best friend. He helped me remember that the joys in this life are still possible.

Over the next few years, Chelsea, Ruger, and I hiked hundreds of miles. When the winters set in, Ruger and I would explore the thousands of acres of trails along The Front Range, giving us a taste of the freedom we longed for day and night. While the horrors of my past and present began to scream to the front of my mind, Ruger was who I grabbed, and we'd head to the mountains for an appointment with The Creator of our hiding place. Ruger would sit at my side while I wrote in my journal, wept, and screamed out the insanities that had happened to me. He would sit on the rock next to me as I overlooked valleys that stretched out for miles, begging The Father to restore the broken one I'd become.

Ruger was fiercely loyal, but he was not whole. The damage to his hip from the days in the Bahamas was severe. Soon it became evident that the dysplasia he had on his joint had gotten worse. Within just three years of his arrival, his hip was nearly shot. The hikes became shorter and fewer in number. We took to calling him Chicken Wing after the goofy way he learned to move.

As time went on, the pain he was in became more evident, and he could only manage one or two walks a week. The restless energy he had drove him to misbehave, and soon my ideal companion dog lost his honed edge. But before he lost it entirely, Ruger would save Naomi's and my life, and remind me why one must trust and obey The Father no matter what He says.

Chapter Thirty Six

A Man and His Dog

We continued to take him on walks with us after Naomi was born and did our best to keep him occupied, but it was not ideal. Just before Naomi was seven months old, I thought I would help Chelsea get some rest, so I took Naomi and Ruger for a walk around the lake. I usually never kept Ruger on a leash, but the park ranger had been hounding people who didn't, so I did that day. Naomi was sleeping on my chest, her little legs dangling out of the baby carrier, happy as she could be. We finished our first lap around the lake, and I heard in my spirit that I needed to turn back and head home. I tried to dismiss the thought and justify it away. I thought to myself, "Naomi never lets Chelsea rest and she deserves a longer nap than this," so I walked on. Again, I felt a troubling in my spirit, but I shoved it down.

The trail around the lake is about twenty feet above the shoreline and fifty feet from the water. I saw up ahead a woman and two well-muscled men standing by the water, throwing sticks for their three pit-bulls to retrieve. The dogs were enjoying the game and just as we went to pass by, one of them looked up and saw us. I felt the intent of his gaze turn from curious to aggressive all at once. He let out a guttural bark and growl as he tore up the embankment towards us. I reached for my weapon but it was buried under Naomi, and I could not get my backups. The owner suddenly saw us and screamed "NO!!!" This alerted the other dogs, who begin thrashing their way out of the water and towards their pack mate.

The pit-bull was on us in less than two seconds. I did my best to turn Naomi away as the dog plowed into the three of us. Snarling teeth began to chop at the air as Ruger swung on his harness between the pit-bull and me. Soon his legs got entangled in his leash, and he couldn't fight back. I pulled Ruger off the ground, trying to release his strap, but I couldn't get my hands on it. The dog's teeth clacked together as I heard the owners screaming, "OH, GOD, NO, STOP IT"!! Naomi was awake now, and her screams rose above the chaos. For a brief moment, I feared her dangling legs had been bitten, but then she went silent and still.

I did my best to keep my body between the attacking dogs but all of a sudden the second pit-bull – teeth barred – slammed into us, and we began to stumble around. I saw Ruger step in between us and the dog's teeth tore into his leg. The smell of animal secretions, fear, and blood was now in the air. The woman on the shoreline just kept screaming, "God, no!!!" A frenzy of chaos ensued.

I used the only weapons I could and began to deliver strikes to the dog with boots, elbows, and leash handles crashing into ribs, skulls, and spines of the attackers. But then what sent icy tendrils down my neck was that the dogs didn't seem to mind a bit. Suddenly, I saw one of the pit-bull go flying off the ground as its owner grabbed onto it and threw it back down the embankment. Just then Ruger broke off his fight with the second pit-bull, and we tried to run down the other side of the embankment and away from the attack. Before we got a few feet down the side, the third pit-bull came barreling down after us. I was finally about to get Ruger's tangled harness released when the second man jumped down and slammed onto his dog, smothering him to the ground. "RUN!" he screamed at us, and we did.

Sprinting back towards our house, I began to examine Naomi, who was still silent, and miraculously, she was unharmed. There were streaks of blood and hair all over my legs, and I didn't think any of it came from me. I could see flesh missing from Ruger's leg and hair missing from spots on his chest and back and face. I left him in the backyard briefly and ran into the house, where I woke Chelsea up with one of the worst feelings of her life.

Veterinary care was out of the question as we could hardly afford to eat. Though Ruger's leg took the brunt of the damage, I knew with our care it would eventually heal. By the time I went back to try to confront the owners, they were long gone. It's probably best I didn't find them.

I learned a lot from the excruciating experience, and none of it was pleasant. I learned how dangerous it is to ignore those promptings in our spirit; that gut check out of nowhere should not be overlooked. Since then we have learned to pay attention and obey the promptings in our spirit any time our peace is taken. Ruger may have saved our lives but it came at a terrible cost.

He would never recover from the attack. Physically, he did as the puncture wounds closed up and scars took the places of bloody wounds like they do. After the morning around the lake, Ruger was more aggressive with other dogs, and he got to a point where I had to keep him on a leash on our walks. He was anxious, and the pain from his hip was worse than ever. There were still glimpses of Chicken Wing, my best friend, but they became fewer and fewer still. That is when Death came to betray a man and his best friend.

Chapter Thirty Seven

Best Friend Betrayal

Buzz…. Buzz…. Buzz..

I answered the phone.

Chelsea’s voice, filled with betrayal, bellowed out, “Ruger just bit Naomi in the face!”

“Ruger mauled Naomi in the kitchen, and there is blood all over.” A thousand pounds of dread sank through my soul.

Chelsea and Naomi had gone to the store; Ruger, as usual, accompanied them on the trip. Upon their return, Chelsea set Naomi down in the middle of the kitchen so she could watch her unload the groceries. Ruger howled in pain getting out of the trunk of the car; his hip was getting unbearable now. Inside the house, Ruger had gotten a drink of water and then went into the living room. Soon he went back into the kitchen, and before Chelsea knew what was happening, he was snarling and biting Naomi in the face, knocking her down onto the floor. Chelsea stepped in immediately as Ruger backed off and ran into the other room. Blood started pouring off Naomi's face as Chelsea snatched her off the floor. Soon her training as a nurse kicked in as she triaged the wounds. That is when she called me.

Chelsea did her best to clean and treat the wounds. The strength of my wife shone through what was the most traumatic experience of her life. She was able to get the wounds patched up and see that they could over time heal on their own. Soon we started applying Organic Spore Powder and natural vitamin E directly to the wounds and saw what a difference they made for her swelling, and they also reduced scarring. Once the injuries were finally addressed, Chelsea and I sat down and debriefed what had happened.

The horrors of seeing your child get hurt are bad enough, but when the creature you've loved like a child is the inflictor of those wounds, it tears out your heart. Chelsea and I wept together that night on the couch, knowing we had to do something none of us wanted to do. I promised her 24 hours, and within 24 hours if I couldn't find him an appropriate home, I would make sure he was never back in the house.

Chelsea wrestled with her heart-wrenching agony at home, her fears for Naomi, and her sorrow over the marking of her once flawless flesh. In a moment, The Father showed her a glimpse of the future of Naomi standing as a teenager. In this vision, the sky was filled with rumblings of dangers. Blackened smoke wafted in the air as a city burned in the distance. Naomi gazed out, her eyes fixed upon her surroundings. Her jaw was set like flint. She was immeasurably strong, a warrior made ready for the days of chaos unleashing themselves. Naomi was a warrior, and every warrior carries their scars. The faintest of white lines stitched itself across the bridge of her nose, the mark from a dog she may never remember. The mark came from a dog who helped her mother overcome her fears and helped her father find the courage to face down Death.

Chelsea saw the glimpse and knew these wounds and scars will not define her; they will be a part of her as we each carry our own scars. Naomi was not born for peace but for war. Chelsea may have grown up insulated from the chaos, but now it was rumbling in her heart. She chose not to run but to stand upon The Rock of Redemption. Chelsea was being made into a humble and wise woman who can raise her daughter up and prepare her to stand firm when the winds of terror blow.

I loved Ruger; I loved him more than pretty much all humans I'd ever known. He'd never lied to me, manipulated me, or made do evil. He'd never betrayed my trust until he did. I couldn't trust him anymore: not around my child, not around strangers, or around another owner's pets. I did my best to find him a new home in that twenty-four hours, but once a dog bites a child, it is a zero-tolerance policy with most adoption agencies. I was not willing to give Ruger with his ravaged hip to someone else so he could do more harm. I knew what needed to be done, but I had no idea if I could do it.

We kept him in the kennel that night, and I could tell from the look on his face that he knew life was never going to be the same. The next day I headed up north to meet with a client, and on the way there I wept, praying for wisdom to know what to do. Nobody wants to do what came next. There was no personality in my soul that wanted to end the life of the dog that had saved mine. I called friends and asked them if they would help me put down my dog, but they too had grown close to Ruger on our hikes in the mountains and didn't want to carry the burden of death. I didn't want to drag him into a veterinarian's office reeking of fear and suffering; he hated those places. I couldn't bear to see him have to be shackled to a table while they stab him with needles. It was just too much.

Oh God, I didn't want to take another life, let alone that of one I loved so much. Every other life I had taken had been because of manipulation, control, and the following of Orders. I had never freely chosen to do what came next. I had killed so many in my life, and I know so few will understand this but killing dogs had been some of the worst things I'd ever been made to do. It had broken pieces of my soul loose that were still rattling around: The Names and The List came back to me during that day of death. I was weeping and weeping, "My God, I can't do this." The tears still flow just writing about it.

But I wasn't writing that day; I was living it. I was breathing in the familiar taste of death on the sunset's red horizon. It was then that He, The Good Shepherd, the overseer of my weary and ravaged soul, spoke to me. He told me,

"Nathan, it is time you bring The Names up the mountain, and The Lists too. It's time you bring me your death and you entrust them with Me; you need to give Me your death if you want to be free."

Even as He spoke, I saw them. I saw the faces, those death masks before they passed from this world to the next. So many people had perished in my midst. Too many to bear. Their names came flooding through one after the next: Jeremiah, Andrew, Sam, Joshua, Elizabeth, Zach, Elliot, and on and on they went. I could see them piling up this weight upon my shoulders, a burden I'd carried all my life, a load I'd tried to surrender hundreds of times.

How do you let go of the faces of death? How do you let go of the orphans and widows who don't know your name? The first one in the pit, an ax and a fist, the seventh one a cord around carotid arteries weakening fingers grasping against my skin. How do you carry the endless agony of killing your best friend?

The words of My Redeemer echoed through the chambers of my soul. On those whispers came winds of courage and strength. It was not mine but His; a great exchange of His life for more death. He'd done it before, and I knew He would do it again. Just then my phone rang and Chelsea was on the other line.

"Nathan, I need to tell you what just happened. I was driving out of our neighborhood, and I saw in the middle of the road the biggest hawk I'd ever seen. It was just sitting there, and as I got closer, it tried to fly away but fell back down. I wasn't sure what was going on, but I saw its claw was stuck in the carcass of this dead rabbit. It kept trying to fly away and be free but it couldn't. By the time I pulled up, he suddenly shifted his body and took off, leaving the rabbit behind."

The Father's words echoed through my soul,

"You need to bring me your death if you want to be free."

I knew then that this was what I needed to do. We took Ruger for his last hike as a family, snapping pictures and filming tiny snippets along the way. We cried together as we pushed Naomi in the stroller while Ruger trotted on up ahead. A final snapshot of our family together marked the end of our walks with the dog we called Chicken Wing.

Chelsea said goodbye to Ruger as I loaded him into my car. I threw on my boonie hat and loaded up our packs. I drove him far into the mountains, to the place where we'd taken one of our first hikes together. Walking up the mountain with my dog, I said their Names and prayed for them all, their families who I didn't know and the ones who I never knew. I prayed for forgiveness for the thousandth time. I surrendered the hatred I had for those who killed them, the ones who at times made me do it: at the times I felt like I deserved the bullet, not the man holding the ledger of secrets or the wrong place wrong time loose ends. I carried on my shoulders the burdens of death. I took up with me a lifetime of wounds, bloodshed, and tears.

My best friend walked up the mountain, and he helped to carry the load. His pack held a list of their Names, and he brought it all the way to the top. I unloaded his burden as I found just the right spot, one that would give him a good view of the mountains stretching on for hundreds of miles. We shared his favorite snack together of homemade organic jerky as I told him how thankful I was for all that he'd done. I thanked him for helping me survive the heartache, bitterness, and pain at night. I told him he was a good boy and I was sorry for what I had to do. I filmed a final moment as a thunderstorm rolled over the top of us. I held my dog for one last time before I put him down for his final sleep.

I screamed and screamed and screamed some more. I screamed out at the top of my lungs until something in my soul tore loose and scattered into the winds now blowing with fury. I screamed until the thunder drowned me out and exploded across the darkening mountainside. I knew then my Elohim screamed too. He thundered out His reply. He had heard me and accepted this dead man's cry.

While the sky rent open and the waters fell from above, The Burden Bearer came and took my death and gave me life instead. He bought my misery and sorrows and gave me hope. I laughed with Him, knowing He would make it matter. Somehow He would take this once cursed life of mine and use it for blessings. At that moment on the side of a mountain, a dying restless man of murder found peace and life.

Some of you are carrying those burdens no soul can bear. Some of you are holding on to the names or faces of monsters who took from you innocence, virginity, sons or daughters lost in the pink mist. Some of you are holding on to anger at our Creator, blaming Him for the things He never did. Others are carrying insecurities from the lies spoken over you when you were just kids. Every one of you reading this has your list, your burdens which are breaking your back and keeping you from freedom, purpose, and truth. Are you ready to surrender the shackles and chains? It's time you face down the guilt, lust, and shame. It is time you find that The Burden Bearer is waiting at the top of the mountain where you can leave it all behind.

Yahweh entrusted Ruger to us for four years. He only had enough joint in that hip to get him through it and to the top of that mountain. It was just the right amount for him to fulfill his purpose in my life. Without him, I think I'd still be that hawk with claws stuck in death, trying desperately to get free. Without him, I would still be wondering what I could be. He helped me hike up that mountain and changed me forever.

It is time we find out whose burdens we were made to help carry. Someone woke up today who needs you to hold their hands and pray with them. Someone woke up feeling depressed and miserable and needs you to tell them they still matter no matter what they've been through. A man is staring in the mirror looking at a stranger needing to be told there is healing for even internal brokenness. There are veterans of life, war, and misery who are shoving needles in their arms, desperate to escape the nightmares, who need you to show them you still care for them. A child is screaming out in the night and needs someone who will not sell them for another trick but instead make sure they sleep soundly.

Some of you may be limping, barely holding on, but the healing you are crying out for is waiting when you bandage someone else's wounds instead of worrying about your own. The bitterness you're holding on to is what's keeping you in prison, not the one who hurt you. The keys to forgiveness are in the hands of The Healer who will restore what they took. Come and see that His goodness is forever and His mercy is endless. He will make right the wrongs of this world. He will bring justice that will be perfect and relentless. Come to Him now while there is still time.

Come to Him, who holds the hands of the hurting and gives them relief. Come to The One who knit you together no matter what kind of a womb you came from, whose offspring you were made by; He knows your innermost parts. Come to The Redeemer of bitter men and wounded women. Come to The Guardian of Eternities Hope and see that He has reserved a place for you.

Chapter Thirty Eight

Student Teacher Interlude

I am going to offer you a window into the hidden world of healing for a broken soul. The process of healing can bring with it a flurry of dreams. Often this is the place pieces of my soul are able to express impossible emotions free of accusation, fear, and threats. Like all of us whose sleep filled dreams can take on the expression of our innermost struggles and fears, so too with those who are in the process of restoration.

Contained in this dream was a challenge and request for help to all those teachers, counselors, principles, and school staff who spend so much of their life around children. More often than not you will be the only point of reference for children raised in worlds like my own. You have an opportunity to make a difference that is bigger than you know. To help you understand that, I let the student in my soul share their words with you now.

In the dream, I was transported back in time where I was sitting in a classroom like so many of the thousands I have sat in over the years of my life. There were grainy white chairs with laminated desks attached. They were lined up in rows seven deep by eight wide. There were students peppered across the class; they all looked to be around thirteen years old. I was sitting in the back right corner in order to keep my back to the wall and remain confident that no one can sneak up on me.

Sitting just a few chairs ahead of me was Shane. He was one of my better friends, and he and I had been in Boy Scouts together for a few years. He was wearing his uniform, tucked in at the waist; PACK 72 in white letters on a red background was pressed onto his shoulder. P.P.C was stitched onto the handkerchief he wore around his collar. I saw all over the room the rest of my pack mates, each one dressed in his uniform and looking as if we were just about to head out for another camping trip or Jamboree.

The class began. Our regular teacher was out for the day and had left a lesson plan for the substitute to go over. Though the material was standard and I'd heard it hundreds of times, the day was about to be very different. The woman began to teach us at the front of the room. She picked up her dry erase marker and wrote her name on the board. My mind drifted into a place that was no longer in the present. Noises turned to sounds, which inevitably combined into those words and phrases I didn't want to hear. "Take out your vocab books and turn to page twenty-three," yet another moment of mundane misery to mutilate my mind.

The students dutifully obeyed her command as I looked up at the ceiling and allowed the memories to draw me into dissociative dreams. Minutes passed, and the droning went on as I wondered the halls of hell within my charred soul. My stupor was suddenly silenced when the teacher called out to me.

"Nate, will you please use 'persuasion' for us in a sentence?"

I ground the gears of my mind to a halt and prepared to regurgitate the indoctrinating bile that was written on page twenty-three. I waited. She watched. I waited some more. My classmates grew confused and one, then two, then by threes and fours they began to turn in my direction.

"Nate, will you please use 'persuasion' for us in a sentence like the one on page twenty-three."

I watched her and looked beyond the board at the end of the room, and into a moment in time she couldn't see. I faded back into a real life memory.

The memory transported me to a time and place far away. I saw Shane and myself setting out on a hiking trail in The Rocky Mountains. We had backpacks loaded down with changes of socks, tents, sleeping bags, food, and water. My pack mates were just about to set off as well; Josh was bent over on the tailgate of his dad's fire-engine red Ford Ranger, and he was picking a chunk of gravel out from behind his heel. Matt with his thick glasses and unbelievable intellect was making mental calculations that would take him twenty minutes to articulate. Jeff wasn't sure what was taking so long, but he was joking with one of the other guys about something I couldn't hear.

I let the memory accelerate through time until we were a mile down the trail and stopped for a four-minute rest. Snacks were pulled out of zippered pockets. They peeled through plastic seals revealing caloric treasures waiting inside. I was watching my pack mates as in just a few months I would be leading them on a fifty-mile trip through the backcountry of New Mexico's mountains. I was observing each of them carefully, examining how they managed their time, the weight on their shoulders, and the poles in their hands. I was making small calculations on where they should be in my line, on who would be able to help share the loads, and who would carry the map on each section of the trail.

Other kids' dads were colluding in the corner of the trail a few yards away, each of them trying hard to hide just how out of breath they were. For a rare moment, I was happy. I could see the trail would take me to a place I desperately wanted to go, where lush grassy meadows would envelop me in sleep and upon sunrise, the morning birds would wake me.

I did not want to come back down the trail we came on to the torment of what waited at my home or in classrooms like this one. I knew I wouldn't stay out here forever, where Shane, Jeff, and I were still friends, and they wouldn't make fun of me behind my back like all the other kids. My God, how I wanted them to like me and think of me as their best friend instead of their cruel joke. It was shallow at best, but the rivers of my soul ran deep, and even just a few inches of appreciation and friendship could carry me for miles.

The kids in my class and in my pack didn't know what waited for me when I walked in the door many miles away. They didn't know the sound of papa's pedophilic Family members. They didn't have to feel the plunge of a dagger as it worked its way past skin, fat, tendons, and bone. They wouldn't see the scabs that would come from my razor's edge as it tortuously tempted me to feel something other than apathy and indifference.

The memory stopped and I was back in the classroom.

"Nate, will you please use 'persuasion' for us in a sentence; there is an example on page 23 in your vocab book."

By now the classes attention was entirely fixed on me. I looked at the teacher again and told her my story of the hike. I told her about the place I'd rather be, the mountains of meadows, and the sound of the creek forty feet from my tent. I told her about the smell of vanilla pinesap oozing from a tree I buried my nose in, and the whispers of hope wafting over my withered wounds. I told her of the screams in the night, and of the millions of tears I had cried.

I answered her with a boldness that frightened many sitting nearby.

"I don't want to tell you the sentence from page twenty-three. I want you to listen and care about me. I want to matter more than this stupid book. I am not a question waiting to be answered; I'm not a score on your test. I am a thirteen-year-old boy who has survived incest. I want to feel something other than this, but I don't know what to do except crawl into a ball so most people won't find me.

No mom is waiting for me back home. She went and moved far away where Guests are attended to but children are forgotten and used as cheap labor instead. I want to eat food baked with care instead of this crap; my robot dad packed my lunch with this morning. But don't worry, miss substitute teacher, I'll soon be out of your hair, and you can run on to someone else; it's not like you care. Last night, I held a knife to my chest, wishing I could just plunge it in, but don't worry, the programming against premature suicide is thoroughly locked in."

The class once silent and motionless began to murmur. Seats creaked as students adjusted their bodies with the weight of what I'd just shared. The accusations exploded from my chest about the failure of the teachers who should have done something. I screamed them at the teacher, demanding a response.

"Why didn't you ask me where the bruises came from, the bloody noses and scars? Why didn't you stop them from tearing me apart? Where is the person who gives a crap about the kid sitting in front of you two hundred and eighty days in the year? When will I matter more than this silly book, I ask you and demand that you tell me, you apathetic crook!? I am not an answer, a statistic, or a score; I am a child who was ruined by monsters in this world of deceit. I carry the burdens of a thousand men's shoulders. Where is the person who will share my crushing load? I've yet to meet them in one of these rooms, and I know it's not the woman standing in front of me now. You'll forget all about me in two days time when you have to substitute for another classroom that's bigger than mine.

Go ahead and read for us whatever's in this stupid book; it doesn't matter anyway; it never really does. I will wake up from this hell someday where you won't be, where there are people who love and care about me. Until that time, I am persuaded that none of this counts. Not the grade you'll give me or the ink on the board. You'll wipe it away at the end of today, just like this piece of my soul you'll throw in the trash as you look past my bleeding heart and on to the next. Goodbye, miss substitute teacher, I'll go ahead and dig in the rubbish bin once you've moved on."

The teacher began to justify like they always do. She muttered on about state requirements, licensure, and aptitude scores, which don't mean crap. Federal funding. licensure hours, and money is all that matters, and a place where children are indoctrinated with lies to make sure they become good worker bees who love their servitude and defend it with venom. She could tell the classroom was getting angry as others students began to agree.

The students' shouts ring out as the wounded ones are given a voice.

"Why is it you care about these vocab words more than you care about me? Why don't we matter more than you say? Why don't you give us the time of day?"

She was writing on the whiteboard a bunch of words, value charts, and statistics to prove her clinically approved method. Tears were pooling in the bottom of my eyes as she tried to get the classroom back on her side. She demanded we each raise our hands if we want to speak, so thirty hands shot up, and she looked so bleak. Just at this moment, my teacher walked in.

He had been hiding in the corner in the back of the room. He stepped to the teacher and said, "Class dismissed." We found our ways back to the halls where the bullies await, the jabs about my body, the kicks at my heels with their cool kids' uniform bought at the mall of tomorrow's trends.

The next morning found me making my way back into the room. My teacher walked up to me but didn't say a word. He taped a piece of paper on the wall by my desk. He looked at me for the first time in nearly a year and saw the shattered soul who'd been there all along. He nodded to the paper and headed back to his desk.

The paper had his handwriting on it, and this is what it said:

To: Nate Reynolds

"I present this letter to you for reminding us what we need to do. You told us a story, and it had no name. You shared a shard of your soul once written with blood. Nate, you persuaded a tired teacher that his job was not done. In a thousand words or less, you told the schools what we really must do: abandon the broad ways of teaching we've been forced into. Share our lives with our students and help them through life, so that we might equip them to survive the madness at night, and let them remember that there is still hope, even if it means the answers are not going to be on vocab page number twenty-three."

I looked at the paper and began to cry an ocean of emotions always held inside. I let the tears fall wherever they may because for a single moment in time, the burden was not mine alone. The endless agony crushing my soul was given its first reprieve. I had been seen, maybe even understood, for the first time in too many years. It was not the end of the horrors; I had many more to go. But it gave me the opportunity to remember why I was still alive.

I knew as I wrote down that dream and poured over my journals from those years those words could be written. I knew there would come a day when I would be able to share this with a teacher and save a student's life. On that day I would know it was all worth it: the scabs on my arms, the beatings, and the bruises. The slices of sorrow, which slid through my soul, could find healing and wholeness I'd never known. I am not sorry for what I've been through; I'm only sorry I didn't say so sooner. When you see the student hiding in the back of the room, causing a ruckus or keeping you from finishing your plan, remember this story, and maybe you can save someone's future from the bottom of a bottle, an abuser's lust, or from their mother's absence. You might just be the one who reminded a broken human being they mattered more than the next test.

Chapter Thirty Nine

A Wilderness Confession

Before I conclude this book, I must confess to you, my reader, a weakness and a truth. I have an innate flesh nature to be inwardly angry towards so many aspects of the Catholic Church. Trust me, I've written hundreds of thousands of words on it, and much has been tied to my abuse perpetrated within the pews of those stained-glass cathedrals and tempestuous tunnels beneath their prestigious parishes. Even as I've gone through great healing and finding Yahweh's freedom to forgive, lingering angst can fill my heart when contending with those who are subjects of Catholicism, especially Jesuits and Knights. I have seen Catholicism devour so many amazing people, and it breaks my heart. I burn with a similar fury at times when contending with the deception within the corporate Christian church and the countless sheep being led astray. The reason I must apologize to you is because of a stranger named Matthew, a man I've never met.

He sent me an email after watching one of the YouTube interviews I had done with David & Donna Carrico and Jon Pounders, some of the phenomenal folks over at Now You See TV and FOJC Radio. In Matthew's message, he shared his journey of coming out of the Catholic church and finding the fullness of freedom in Messiah and walking in His Way. His story is not mine to share, but it gave me a perspective I so desperately needed.

Since I began to speak out publically in 2017, I have read hundreds of people's testimonies. I have heard from people who were born into multi-generational Luciferian cults, Bible-thumping Baptist churches, and pagan temples. No matter its exterior mask, deception is a highly contagious spiritual infection of the most dangerous kind. Deception slides a threadbare veil of truth over our eyes as it plunders our minds of their logic, reason, and understanding. Reading Matthew's testimony brought tears to my eyes, laughter at times too, but mostly tears of recognition. In his story, I heard the words of a child of The Redeemer whose shed blood rent the veil once and for all. I saw a man who has come to learn the power of persecution and wilderness wanderings.

Stepping out of the comfort zone of your religion be it a Muslim, a Christian, a scientist, a Hindu, or a Jew for the sake of The Messiah Jesus often sends you directly into the desert of wonderings. I do not deny it: I am calling people to come out of the traditions of men and the doctrines of deception, and to prepare for and fight in The War of The Ages. The place of preparation will always be in The Wilderness. Read about the life of David, Moses, Joseph, Jacob, and Jesus. Before people were brought into the fullness of their purpose, they were led to the wondering places of The Wilderness.

The desert can be a lonely place to those who do not see the cloud of His providence, nor feel the heat of His pillar of fire watching over them at night. Though we may be lonely, we will never be alone for we are with our Creator. Many fear The Wilderness, thinking it is only a dry and weary place, unable to see the miracles of freedom from their seductive shackles and comfortable chains. The Wilderness is where slaves are taught how to walk without shackles, and dance without fear or shame. It is the place where we are given The Instructions so we can learn to walk in His ways. Some will heed His call, but many will not. It is in The Wilderness that The Father taught me to lay down my hate to find forgiveness and love sprouting up in its place.

Though my flesh bids me to rage against those who are subtly leading and deceiving the masses, I must remember: have we not all once been enemies of Yahweh? (Col. 1:21) Have we not all fearfully sown in the flesh time and time again? But the goodness of our Creator is that He sees good seed hiding in the thistles, thorns, and tares. Concealed in those cathedrals, those witch covens and convenience store check out lines, is the greatest Remnant army this world has ever known. Amidst those tattered weary souls is a holy restlessness drawing them to Messiah. It calls to them in their sleep as they dream of a life where the misery fades, and joy is possible.

It is in The Wilderness He made the children of bondage into men and women who were prepared to go into The Promised Land filled with physical and spiritual giants of monstrous size, power, and strength. He sent them into the lands where the blood of the innocent had flown for far too long. It is because hidden among those tares were righteous wheat waiting for rescue. Amidst the walls of Jericho, a stronghold of ancient wickedness was Rahab, once a whore who would be found wholly faithful, a blessed servant and ancestor of our Redeemer. Amidst the walls of these deceit filled temples and churches of our modern day are sorrow-filled souls waiting for someone to show them that boldness and courage still abide in the Body of Messiah. Do not be afraid, dear reader, but remember what Yahweh said to Joshua the day before they set out on an impossible campaign.

“Now it came about after the death of Moses the servant of the LORD, that the LORD spoke to Joshua the son of Nun, Moses’ servant, saying, Moses My servant is dead; now therefore arise, cross this Jordan, you and all this people, to the land which I am giving to them, to the sons of Israel. Every place on which the sole of your foot treads, I have given it to you, just as I spoke to Moses.

From the wilderness and this Lebanon, even as far as the great river the river Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites, and as far as the Great Sea toward the setting of the sun will be your territory. No man will be able to stand before you all the days of your life. Just as I have been with Moses, I will be with you; I will not fail you or forsake you. Be strong and courageous, for you shall give this people possession of the land, which I swore to their fathers to give them. Only be strong and very courageous; be careful to do according to all the Law which Moses My servant commanded you: do not turn from it to the right or to the left, so that you may have success wherever you go. This book of the law shall not depart from your mouth, but you shall meditate on it day and night, so that you may be careful to do according to all that is written in it; for then you will make your way prosperous, and then you will have success. Have I not commanded you? Be strong and courageous! Do not tremble or be dismayed, for the LORD your God is with you wherever you go." -Joshua Yahweh told Joshua three times to be strong and courageous because he was a person just like you and me. He was a man who had the flesh, which screamed at him to be quiet, just shut up, or they'll think you're nuts! We've all shared those same fears of rejections, fears of what men will think of us. You are not alone, but that is what The Wilderness is for. It is to burn away our former selves, to let us leave the man of flesh impaled on a stake where our Savior took our guilt, shame, and fears away. Walk boldly on the narrow Way for you will never walk alone.

Your days of wandering in The Wilderness will not last forever. Like every tree planted near streams of water, they will bear fruit, in their season. (Psalm 1) Let the Vinedresser prune back your flesh so that you can bear a greater harvest as He leads you over the Jordan and into The Promised Land.

The Wilderness is where He gives us His Instructions so that when we are called into the abundance of purpose, we do not wander from His ways. The Wilderness wanderings may be shorter, like the forty days of Jesus, or they may be like the forty years of Moses and David, or even like those of The Lost Sheep of the House of Israel who have been in The Wilderness for thousands of years. No matter what, the miracles you will see, the prayers answered, and the blooming of your faith will make it worth it. Without those days in The Wilderness, Chelsea and I never could have found a miracle waiting for the right time.

Chapter Forty

Even for Just One

Chelsea and I were in the wilderness for nearly four years. We'd grown so tired of the lonely wanderings and prayed month after month for authentic fellowship. We prayed for families who were aware of the truths about our devilishly orchestrated society and walked on the narrow Way. We did not see those prayers answered for months, then years but our faith bid us to continue. Amidst the depths of our greatest hours of suffering, we did not have hands to hold us as the forces of evil pounded on our doors; we had only the abundance of His mercy, power, and strength. But The Mighty God harkens unto the cries of His people and do you know how Yahweh answered that prayer? It was through a man I'd never met who had a conversation with his wife.

Their names were Kyle and Rebecca. They'd woken up through humility and revelation to so many truths surrounding corporate Christianity. They had discovered demonically inspired doctrines and Brotherhoods had been openly and greedily welcomed into the same megachurch we'd left and begun to walk quietly in The Way. They'd been attending a Bible study for a few years with many folks from that megachurch.

Kyle was given an opportunity to pick the next topic of study, and wanted to do 119 Ministries' series about our lost Hebraic identity and being followers of the whole Bible, rather than the parts, which fill up the pews, pocketbooks or pleasures of sins. This was a risky decision. Most of us who begin to learn about conspiracies, electronic control states, or the deceptions in our churches, do so behind closed doors. Often because we are scared someone might think we are nuts. But Kyle was willing to come out of the closets of cowardice for the sake of truth as this new Way of following Messiah was all about forsaking the broad road. (See the informative film titled The Way: A Documentary at https://www.thewaydoc.com for more information.)

Kyle stood with Rebecca in their room, where they looked at each other as they battled the familiar fears of what people will think. The thoughts of the inevitable persecution and mocking they would suffer came boiling to the surface. Kyle looked at her, and he said something each of us must never forget. Looking into the eyes of the woman who has followed him onto this narrow road, Kyle said to her,

"But it would all be worth it if just one woke up. If just one person sees The Truth and gets set free, it would all be worth it."

The words Kyle spoke in his room carried the weight of truth. They carried upon them power, understanding, wisdom, and hope. Kyle had become a new man because his identity wasn't trapped in the depths of deception but had been raised with our Messiah. Kyle was right about the words he spoke as the group did mock him and scoff at him, and their entire church where they'd been prominently serving on stage for more than 12 years turned their apathetic backs upon them. No more phone calls or "Hey, how are you?" Like vapors in the wind, they disappeared and no one seemed to notice their leaving, but one man in that Bible study saw that The Way of Messiah was not just in Paul's writings, or in Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John.

One man saw the painful Light of Truth and did not look away from its brilliant eternal promise. He kept His eyes on Yeshua, the author and perfector of our faith. Because of this, Jeremy found his way to a congregation where six months later, Jeremy became the man who answered our prayers.

Jeremy, this one called-out sheep answered an e-mail my wife meant to send to someone else, and connected us to people we'd been praying for four years to know as our own: a group of people where we are free to fellowship and ask questions as we all learn together things that are foreign and new to us, as we all try to understand this new Way of being, this promised identity as Israel.

It may not be about your identity; it may not be about a lifetime of boredom, misery, or abuse. Your story is yours and is potentially no less important or influential than any others. The real power available to us all comes when we step into The Wilderness of the unknown where our faith is no longer a "get out of hell free" card in our back pocket but is life and death.

Would it all be worth it if just one person found The Way? What if your sister who you've been praying for could come to see the truth so carefully hidden from her eyes? What if your boss has for the first time in their lives contemplated a relationship with Jesus, and needs you to be open about your faith and trust in Him? What if the beggar whose hands are clutched around cardboard signs of help is waiting for you to be the one who provides to him that night? What if the conversation you have been dreading with that person is the one where you can help be the hands that snatch a burning stick from the flames?

These are not hypothetical questions anymore; these are the flesh and blood realities of our perishing world. For every day you hide your Light of Truth in your closets of cowardice, you give ground to The Enemy to take those curious, lonely, and thirsty souls for his own Kingdom. Every day you linger, every day you wait, the darkness grows.

Kyle and Rebecca painfully suffered the loss of friends and family but into that void came Jeremy. Their faith-filled hands reached into the fires of persecution and snatched one stick from the flames. Jeremy's new life has multiplied and turned into dozens and will become hundreds more. I hope you remember this when your flesh whispers pride-filled lies and man-based fears. You have a testimony so many others need to hear. No matter your concern, know our King specializes in using cowards who find His courage will become their own. For Yahweh has not given us a spirit of fear, but of power, love, and a sound mind. (2 Timothy 1:7)

I pray each of you will remember that The Enemy is not defeated by our bullets, blades, or our left or right wing politicians but,

*"By The Blood of the Lamb and the words of our testimonies and not loving our lives even unto death."(*Rev. 12:11)

Now is the time for us to boldly step out of the shadows. Now is the time for us to wage the spiritual wars and take back the promised lands of men and women whose hearts have been trapped in the walls of deception. Now is the time for us to confess our sins leave our worldly ways behind us, and see the power of forgiveness, redemption, and truth. We must stand with feet planted in the soils of this earth and overflow with uncompromising obedience to His holy and peculiar ways.

Every day we wait, The Enemy grows stronger, adding new sheered sheep to his forsaken flock. Every day we linger, waiting to step out of the boat and onto the roaring waters, tens of thousands are lost. Now is the time for you who have The Secrets to speak them out. Now is the time for the world to see and hear the impossible, unspeakable truths. Come then and answer this clarion call. Come out of the darkness and ignite your candles of hope. Come and set fires to the pillars of perversion, corruption, and chaos. Let us set ourselves ablaze with passion, love, and faith.

It is not an easy journey but one filled with putrifying pits and seductive snares. Along the walk of this life, there will be challenges, and there is a way of being we all are prone to. It bids us who have been free to run back to shackles. It is time we discuss why it's easier to run than to abide.

Chapter Forty One

Chained: Even When You're Free

There was no way I could have known what to expect. The healing path I'd set my feet upon was uncharted territory. There was jungle all around me, filled with vipers, jackals, and lions waiting to tear me apart. I had made an assumption when I started out on this journey. It was a false expectation, which grew to be a mighty hindrance on my path. I assumed my path of wholeness and integration would be one that could be accomplished quickly and without significant disruption. The truth I will not hide from any of you is this: if you have suffered a lifetime of abuse, pain, neglect, and bondage, those wounds need time to heal, and they can't be dealt with all at once. One of the deepest of wounds is the loss of identity, identity only slaves can know.

The slavery of my life did not openly look like the days of whips, chains, and hours grinding cotton or grain, but it was slavery all the same. The truth is if you've never known the way of living as a slave, it so hard to imagine or understand. Many of us are insulated from this idea of slavery as our modern creature comforts ensure our ignorance. More people woke up today as slaves than at any other time in the history of the world. All too often it does not look like children in sweatshops in a third world country but like the people in the line at the grocery store who you bumped into last week.

Modern slavery is more than a way of living; it is an identity – it is quite literally who you are. It is what begins to make up the essence of your self. Who you are when you look in the mirror is not a person of choice but a person bound by manipulation, submission, and mental shackles. The world of free thought and self-determination is as foreign to you as being born in a distant country with another culture, skin color, and native tongue. You cannot imagine what it is like to be them, to be one of the free.

Many have read stories of slaves or victims of abuse who return to their pimps and dealers or their masters and perpetrators and allow the collar of control to be once again synched down tight. These stories are maddening and frustrating to those who read it and have not tasted of this torment. What you cannot understand is that slavery and bondage become familiar, and freedom is foreign.

Freedom is a dialect you've never heard. It is an ideology estranged and confusing. It is a way of being even harder to learn and receive when those around you are often terrified by the mere mention of your past shackles. You feel the fish out of water relates to you best. The world of thinking and choosing people are the searing sun on your scales and air in your gills. They are not of you; they are unknown, distant relatives of a species you do not recognize.

What does it feel like to wake up and decide what to do with your "free time"? What does it mean to have the ability to say no? How do you answer someone's question when you don't know? Ignorance in The Underworld of The Families and our silvery servitude is the single most punishable problem. Many mental and physical lashes are doled out indoctrinating you into an absolute dread of not knowing. So then how do you think when you are given back a mind that's never known free thought? Some may handle it better than others, but honestly more often than not, you get sick. It is a sickness, which grows as you realize you are outside of the familiar mental shackles.

There is no better way for me to describe The Sickness to you than nausea, an ache, or the strain of muscle tugging your newly growing peace out of place. It is a pull within you; a lure sunk into your soul, which tugs you back towards the familiar world you've known. It clings to the cracks and crevices where you split to survive. The Family is familiar: the hunt at night, the smell of sulfur and copper as blood flows, and the diamond-encrusted wires of regret. All you've ever known is their orders and commands; their words have always defined you.

No one ever warned me about The Sickness. I don't know if I could have done it if I had known how hard it would be just to be free. I know it hurt Chelsea to see me struggle and weep, not understanding how to be free, safe, and understood. How do you explain to someone something as bizarre as this? How do you articulate your grieving over the shackles of your former life? How can I admit to people I wept over my loosened chains?

I wanted freedom. I needed it, but I did not know it. I woke up every day and saw the reminders of the shackles. When I looked in the mirror, I saw their marks, the places of perversion where pieces of my soul had rent from the hurt. There were marks like the two white scars on my stomach where a knife slid in, or the dozens of track marks where stitches pieced my face back together after the creature nearly tore it off. There were the claws of madmen upon my scalp and between my ears. I wanted to break free, and I wanted to be whole, but what would it be like? Would I be happy if I made my own decisions? Would I be content? I had so much fear when I thought these things; it was not until my faith began to bloom in my heart that I saw the truth, which set me free.

The truth all of us need to learn is that we are all slaves. None of us were born free. We were enslaved to the nature of sin, the fallen state of our flesh, which wages a perpetual war against The Spirit of Yahweh. We are enslaved into the corporately controlled conspirators of civilization who've shaped it into the form of the Fallen One's Kingdom. Its desires do not abide in His Word, nor hunger for righteous and holy living. They long for the poisons that corrupt our character and soil our soul.

There is an active war against living in obedience to Yahweh's Commandments, and its casualties pile higher every day. It is The Sickness of us all. The shackles I wore were literal; they were cushioned cuffs to ankles and straps in vices. They were psychological, biologically, and mechanically seductive and more powerful than you can fathom. They ensnared me like a wolf in a trap. My spirit was born again the day I chose to cling to The Rock of Salvation, Yeshua The Redeemer. My spirit longed to be a man of righteous living who was known by His Savior. I wanted to have The Face of Yahweh shine upon me and I wanted Him to incline His ear to me. I ached to prostrate myself before The King of Glory and be in His courts day and night. I hungered for the incorruptible immortality promised to me. (1 Cor. 15:52) I longed for His wisdom, truth, and hope. And yet the familiar world of slavery called me back. The familiar shape of tunnels, seducing shadows, and the promised relief those addictive chemicals offered me kept luring me back.

The Sickness calls us all. We who have become traitors to this world and The Kingdom of Darkness are their greatest enemies and deadliest foes. The Enemy and his ministers, apostles, evangelists, teachers, prophets, and priests utterly hates us who choose to follow The Way, and he is a masterful expert at baiting the hooks to lure us back to our familiar abodes. There is only one way to be freed from those shackles forever. What it takes is something that is not appreciated nor endorsed in comfortable corporate Christianity.

The cure for this Sickness is to fear Yahweh more than anything or anyone else. The absolute unapproachable holiness of our Great Creator must be a consuming fire in our bones. It must burn away The Sickness, doubt, and lingering longing for a life of tempting touches and familiar feelings. (Judges, 1,2,3 Maccabees) The fear of Yahweh is the beginning of wisdom, and it is the source of freedom from shackles and lies. (Prov. 1:7, 9:10, Ps. 111:10)

It is not mere reverence, respect, or trust; it is absolute fear. When you come into the actual presence of The Holy One, you will never be the same. You will experience teeth chattering, pleas for mercy, and forgiveness while the purest sense of peace engulfs your soul and clothes you in love. It is the understanding of The Holy One in the presence of an unholy being. It is The One who formed us all that we must honor, respect, and surrender to.

He who made the mouth we use to speak can anoint it for greater things than we ever thought possible. He who gave us ears to listen and minds to comprehend can provide us with more understanding than a million books and thousand lifetimes of "sacred knowledge" can hope to divine. The one who set the sun and moon on their circuits can also set our feet on the narrow path of providence and hope.

The fear of The Holy One utterly destroys the lying lures and collars around our throats. It invades our shattered souls and cleanses us with the truth about who we are for we are no longer children scattered abroad and lost in the world. Our identity is not a church or denomination, and it is not the blood in our veins, the position on our resume, or the bills left to be paid; we who come to Messiah are the people called Israel.

We are the redeemed sons and daughters of The Living and Holy God. We are rescued, loved, and adored. We are not like this world; we are not its slaves; we are a chosen peculiar people, a royal priesthood. (1 Peter 2:9) We are to be like Aaron, who stood in the presence of The Holy One and made offerings of praise, prayer, intercession, and sacrifice. He was anointed for his calling, and we too must be set apart. We must be the intercessors who stand in the gap between the living and the dead. We must be like Abraham and Samuel, who were called out and set apart unto El-Shaddai.

Abba Yahweh becomes our Father the day we choose to surrender and forsake this Kingdom of Darkness and leave the Kingdom of Men behind. It happens on the day we become traitors to this world we no longer love and enter instead into a covenant with The Just One. On that day, we choose to be sojourners who live set apart from the sinfully changing standards of this world and instead look like the Messiah. It cures our cowardice and gives us a greater love than our masters, pills, or porn could ever provide. The cure to these bondages does not come from a twelve-step program, special software on our computers, or accountability partners. It will not come from another church retreat, family workshop, or community group.

It comes from fearing our Father, getting to know Him, and walking in covenant with Him. It is as we walk with Him that He changes us to become like Him. It comes from surrender and obedience to His ways and not our own. It comes from fixing our eyes upon the one and only true rabbi, Jesus the Messiah, and from walking the way He walked. Freedom comes when cowards become courageous enough to give up and surrender to His Instructions and quit giving into the fickle emotions and feelings, which rule our lives.

Freedom does not come easily, and it will not happen overnight. I would like to tell you The Sickness will never come back but I will not sugar coat the truth for the sake of your feelings or my own. Like each of you with your familiar sins and fleshly comforts, the well-dressed counterfeit lion, the Father of Lies, is always waiting at the door, knocking and enticing us to return. He does not look like a red devil with horns, but like the warm relief we'd feel from just one drink, one click, or one extra glance. The Enemy looks like the “innocent” flirtation with a co-worker or the text message to an ex-partner at night. The Enemy's lures are beautiful, elegant, and enticing. They are custom-made, candy-coated razorblades, which taste delightful but can spend years gestating before they bleed us to death.

The Prince of Darkness can transform himself into an angel of light, and his ministers, teachers, followers, and slaves are like him. When I made deals with devils, they rarely if ever looked like the Hollywood versions of the demonic or like a haunting red-eyed nightmare of dread. They are more intelligent then you can imagine, as they have spent thousands of years studying, manipulating, and controlling their hosts. All too often the restless shape shifting spirits looked like men of power and prestige or ageless beings of splendor and light.

They knew me so very well. They knew how to entice me and offer me things I'd only privately dreamed of. They knew my secrets and where my heart hid hopes I'd never spoken aloud. They provided me a temporary escape, and they offered me power and invincibility if only I let them in, gave them permission, or gave over my will. It was an exchange of goods, a transfer of services, but it was free will for shackles and joy for misery. They are leeches on people's body, spirit, or souls. They are spirit born vampires of hope and health draining their hosts down to despair and death.

You don't have to do a black magic ritual or sign a contract with your blood; it may just be that you are willing to do "whatever it takes to make it" in whatever arena you wish to conquer. You need only to come into agreement with them or give them permission to enter the tabernacle of your heart and take your goods. (Mark 3:27) What is it they offer you? What are the secret transgressions that control you and keep you from being free? Why do you let them stay in the darkness where they rule you and keep you as their own? How much longer will The Father of Lies seduce you, while The Father of Truth is looking into the distance, waiting for His child to return? Come to Messiah; come to Him with your bloody hands, corrupt character, compromised ethics, and shady dealings. Come to Him with the deeds of devils and hopeless despair. Come to Him with your cowardice and grief. Come to Him with the rusting lures of The Enemy buried in your flesh and see that The Great Physician specializes in healing wounds just like yours.

Do not let the familiar feelings of slavery draw you back. The grumbling and complaining Israelites in the wilderness longed for the bondage of Egypt, the food of their familiar master's table. (Num. 11:5) We are just like them, but let us instead be like the children of the Israelites who were born in The Wilderness, who saw The All-Consuming Fire of Yahweh in their midst, who were fed and nourished by the daily bread, who kept The Instructions of The Father and drank of His living waters that flowed from The Rock, which was Jesus. (1 Cor. 11:5) Once they were fed and fueled, they were made ready for war. They understood their identity was not in the land they came from but where they were one day going to be. They knew they were passing from this wandering place to the place of The Pilgrims Promise. We too must learn our Promised Land is waiting on His narrow path to life.

Those Israelites grew strong in their identity and authority. They became those who were bold and courageous enough to step into occupied enemy territory and take back their inheritance. They were children born for such a time as this, and so too were you. We too have been the wanderers, those without homes who were trafficked from church to church, parish to parish, denomination to denomination, waiting to find a place where our restlessness would relent, and our heart would tell us to abide. We too have been born into generations of death, murder, and abuse. We also have been the ones who keep trying to convince ourselves if we just made a little more money, had that other guy's job, or were famous like that lady, we would finally feel peace. Do not believe the lies of impotence, monotony, and failure. You are yet to know the fullness of freedom found in a day lived as a co-laborer with the Prince of Israel.

The narrow Way He calls us to will not be familiar but foreign. The lands of the living are a mystery to the dead. This is why we too must die to this world; we must impale this flesh on the stake as He did and let His resurrected power rule in our hearts. We must no longer be children who walk in darkness but sons and daughters of The Light. (John 1) It will not be instant; it will not come overnight. If, like James, the brother of Jesus, told us, we endure these trials with all our strength and heart and mind being fixed upon our Redeemer, after it is all over then we too will receive the prize of salvation and a greater crown of glory.

Though it is so much less now, the days still come when I feel the pull, when I feel a familiar lure tugging on my heart, calling me back to the feeling of stalking monsters in the night. The echo of bullets fired in vengeance, retribution for the deeds they did in the darkness, I think I can bring to light. The need to see justice brought by my hands and not another lingers still. Instead of hiding this hunger, I deny it its power by speaking the truth. I tell Chelsea or trustworthy others, and I trust them to help me understand and remind me what fruit is born in The Underworld, the curses, and condemnation along with the loss of my free will.

They don't look at me with condemnation when I tell them of the hunger for even destructive things. They cut through me with compassion, patience, and The Living Scriptures. Eyes fixed forward, I forsake my fallen gaze and set my jaw like flint towards the narrow path of hope. For as I follow The Way, my Messiah leads me on, and He prepares me a place in the presence of my enemies; He anoints my head with His priestly oil. He leads me beside still waters; He restores my soul; it is His rod and staff, which protect me and comfort me. (Ps. 23) He makes my fingers ready for battle and my hands ready for war. (Ps. 144:1) He calls me His beloved son and friend. He gives me new desires so that I hunger and thirst for righteousness; He makes my heart yearn for His ways and not my own. Let us each choose whom and what we will serve. (Josh. 24:15)

It is not for any of us to have our feet in two worlds. We cannot be children of the grey; we will all be children of Light or Darkness. The Father will spit out of His mouth all those who abide in the space in between; the fence sitters and their children will suffer tremendously for their lack of commitment. Instead, I learned to wake up and choose each day whom I will serve. Who will you serve today: the familiar feelings or The Father of Redemption? (Deut. 30:15-20)

The reason I speak these Secrets and am willing to suffer the consequences for what I have done and was made to do is because a truth was revealed to me which I can never forget. I knew no matter how much power, weaponry, wealth or women I could have through my Family Rites, or Familiar spirits; I had become and would always be their vampiric slave. I also learned my Familiars were just as enslaved to their fallen masters who themselves were enslaved to The Dragon. Even That Serpent of Old is not his own master but all the heavenly host both the holy and reviled are still legally bound to fulfill The Instructions, prophecy, and commandments of Yahweh.

No one not even the purest of Bloodlines can wholly serve two masters or twenty handlers. It is because of these revealed truths I freely decided to renounce my spiritual and physical agreements with my Family Oaths, Guardians and Familiars and by Yeshua's Authority they were cast out of me and those agreements were destroyed and will never return so long as I choose not to come back into agreement with The Kingdom of Darkness. Now I know I am already a dead man marked by the same wicked and wounded wolves who raised me but I am honored to be dead to this world because I have been raised to a new life with The Conqueror of Death, Jesus of Nazareth.

Chapter Forty Two

The Hunger

The words "The End" tortuously tease my mind as I sit here contemplating the conclusion. I have written conclusions of this book more than once. Each time the ending only started another chapter on this journey through life. How do I leave you, dear readers? In what nest of words will I leave you to abide? I don't think I'll ever be able to conclude this story and I am sure the other volumes I've written beyond this book will come out soon. The future will not wait for the endings of our lives; it will surely press forward into the misty mountains of tomorrow.

May we look to those stormy days, those hulking behemoths of the unknown tomorrows, and remember one thing. May we all remember that hiding in the mist are treasures waiting to be found, waiting to be seen, held, protected, cherished, and understood. Peppered through your paths of life are overlooked sapphires, rubies, and garnet passed over by millions who have needed your eyes to find them.

Each of you is a treasure. Some are polished stones, refined by The Good Potter's hands, while others are still sitting in the discard pile of tragedy, monotony, and failure. If you have awaited the one who would stumble upon you and see you for what you are, know this: He, who formed your marvelous facets before the foundations of the earth were fixed, has never lost sight of you. No matter where you are on the day you read or hear this, I pray you remember you have a purpose this world could never hope to possess.

We all have rough edges waiting to be buffed down and cleaned. I hope you all become willing to step into the tumbling of refinement of our Creator's redeeming ways. His truth has buffeted me; His conviction has knocked me, and I have been washed by His living waters. It does not mean I am yet shining with brilliance or glowing with opulent facets, but I am on my way. I hope you will hear this last story and know the flint of my heart is being turned into His precious living stone.

Chelsea stared at me in disbelief. The look on her face was full of frustration and annoyance; unable to understand why I was like this. I was standing over the sink, scooping piles of moldy food she'd thrown away into a bowl to eat. She was so tired of telling me that I didn't have to do this but how could I not? We hotly discussed it for nearly an hour. She was so exhausted, so tired of all this. We'd been on this chapter of our healing journey for almost two years. Though we had been married six years prior, only now had she been given some of the many missing puzzle pieces to understand my "quirks."

As long as she'd known me, I would have these oddities, these weird behaviors or fears. She had no frame of reference to understand them. Some bordered on compulsions, while others were anger-laced twitches of my body away from her touch. At the beginning of our marriage when it was only Nate, they were less noticeable. I hated having my neck, back, or butt touched. I would get beet red in the face when someone tussled my hair and had to breathe out the emotions flooding through me.

I am very rarely angry; normally it takes a mountain of madness to move me towards anger. But when someone grabbed the back of my neck or slapped my butt – even Chelsea in a playful way – I would freak out screaming at them, "Never touch me like that!"

Even when I was dating a girl long before Chelsea, I'd been laying on my stomach, and she'd tried to massage my shoulders. I reflexively kicked my heels up and nearly hit her in the back. She'd not understood why I was edgy at times and neither had Chelsea until I'd told her about the abuse, the sufferings, and the unwanted touch.

After I would go through a memory or a healing session, so many times these fears or phobias would disappear. I used to get sick and dry heave uncontrollably when someone used lotion even just in the same room, let alone tried to put it on me. Chelsea had patiently worked with me over the first few years of our marriage, helping me to get to a place where I could allow it to be near me and then carefully applied to my dry, cracked hands.

After I finally understood that the fear and pain came from my abusers using lotion to facilitate the abuse, I was able to allow The Messiah's new understanding and peace to wash these painful wounds clean. He gave me His perspective on as odd as it may seem to you, lotion. Literally, in a moment when I got healing from the memory, it gave me the ability to use it without any fear or gagging. The trauma pocket was alleviated of its burden and with it came peace.

On and on this would go: Chelsea would notice that I was suddenly sad beyond belief. A dark cloud would come over me in a moment, and I would sulk around the house, sometimes for hours and at other times for days. She learned to point this out in a compassionate way and encourage me to do some healing or address the Little that was in need of restoration. Many times, I responded to this feedback and got healing for a Little who had been triggered by someone who looked like one of our abusers at the grocery store, which flooded our mind. After the healing, I would be restored, but sometimes the grief of the new memory integrated into my mind would weigh upon me. Though my Little had found freedom from his torment, the rest of my soul had to come to an understanding about this painful chapter in our past.

The grief was the most debilitating, along with the body pain of wounds born during the abuse and missions. The physical pain would accompany many of the memories. Heartache and heartbreak are very real things, which do leave the strongest of people down on their knees. I would be in agony, curled up on the floor, sobbing and wailing to the point of death, clutching Ruger's furry neck, praying for peace. Chelsea would help me the best she could by making me Challah, my favorite sweet bread, or allowing me time to go up into the mountains to find some quiet space to be.

She gave me what I needed, which could vary moment by moment. At times I would need to go and tinker in my little workshop for hours, tumbling rocks from Nate's Beach, making holsters, knives or gear for our Kit, or melting down metals to make jewelry or improvised tools. Each portion of my personality had their passions and things they'd wanted to do for so long, things The Family never allowed me to pursue or express. Now finally, I could find the freedom to do it. We honored them the best we could. We let those that wanted to see the cold fresh water springs we'd found in the mountains go and drink their fill while we wept with relief. Other personalities got to take Naomi for a walk around the lake and see Ruger run along the shore, kicking up mud with glee.

As for me and my house, We shall serve

JEWSBURY & BROWN
MANCHESTER ENGLAND

Some Littles would want to sit with Chelsea or other trusted people and talk. They would tell her what happened or ask her questions about what “normal” is. She was gracious with them, weeping with them at times, being angry at others, empathizing when she could and hurting for us when she couldn’t.

A roller coaster could not compare to the ups and downs; a balloon in a hurricane might better capture it. In the center of the storm was our refuge and hiding place, The Most High God, His Son, and The Great Comforter. Some days we would be flung through a category five fury, which left me collapsed in the store and Chelsea having to carry me out. Once the memory was understood, the pain would lift, and we would be restored until the next winds blew. The most noticeable for Chelsea was my irritability or my lack of patience with small problems and issues. I could be full of faith and confident in The Father’s provision for us one moment and then terrified that we would starve the next.

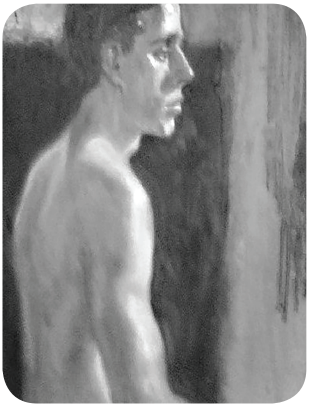
My irritability would often build to the point that I was unbearable for her to be around. She was patient with me more times then I deserved, but sometimes the emotional irregularities with new personalities drove her beyond her compassion and patience. We would argue, and I wouldn’t always be the kindest but nor would she. It was not anything beyond marital challenges, but these small pebbles tossed into my waters could be a tsunami flooding over the banks and filling our home with pain. It was exhausting day in and day out wondering when I would be “better.” We did not get a timeline for healing, and neither of us had thought there would be so much there waiting beneath the surface.

It was like living with ten different husbands – Chelsea’s own 50 Shades of Huz – some of whom were mature and had tremendous amounts of life experience, while others were still just trying to have a new experience since they last saw this cruel world. Having discussions about finances or even planning a trip to the store could be overwhelming and would lead me to near panic.

It was a brutal process, but over time Chelsea and I had to learn how to communicate more clearly. When I was not capable of engaging in regular talk because I had Littles up who just wanted to be able to experience a world of safety, laughter, and peace, agreements would be made about when these discussions could continue when Nate or Nathan could come and hold up the normal duties of the home. During those interims, while we were still figuring it out, a great strain was placed on Chelsea, and praise be to God, she stayed with me, honoring her covenantal vows and sticking with me in my greatest sickness and horrible health.

Some days I was better at it than others. Some of my quirks would be present and linger beyond a healing session. The most persistent of them all was The Hunger. The Families use food and hunger as a weapon all its own. It's a point of leverage in their fulcrum of control. It forces you to compromise your ethics, learning to steal, lie, or manipulate to satisfy your needs. It forces you to think critically even when your body is deprived and in need of nourishment. It is a powerful tool used for deplorable ends.

One of the ways I survived the pains of hunger in my belly was to sneak into the kitchen and eat moldy or rotting food out of the fridge or what had been thrown in the trash. It allowed me to escape their notice or accusations of disobedience. Other times, I was stealing other kids' food like I did in 1st grade when I took a bag of Lay's plain potato chips from a boy named John in my class. I was caught and dragged to the principal's office and sent home with a pink slip of punishment. The real punishment at home occurred for the negative attention it drew on a boy who was supposed to be a ghost.



Even after the carefully controlled scarcity left, The Hunger was something I had to rely on to survive. The first profession I turned to in college was one The Family had taught me to believe was normal, so I undressed for "Artists" who paid me well. Unable to bear this continual emotional burden, I got a job at Old Chicago's bus-sing tables. At work I would line my apron with Ziploc bags and aluminum foil, scraping customers' scraps into them to be eaten later at my apartment. At the close of the shift, I would sneak into the walk-in freezer and take the expiring ingredients to assemble a meal.

I was working three jobs at the time while going to school full time, and paying my rent was hard enough for me to do let alone buying more than $50 of groceries each month. It made me resourceful as hunger and lack will do. While on campus, I would sneak into the back of lecture halls where speakers had advertised free pizza for those who attended. I would grab a whole box and walk out the door. I played it off with laughter and jokes, but the need to fill my stomach was deep and insatiable.

Many in our megachurch's community group would get together after Sunday night service ended and go to Chili's for dinner. I would walk around with a massive plate as people were eating and asked for donations to "The Nate Plate." My church friends would laugh and drop a few fries or a chicken wing onto the plate, and by the end of the night, I had enough leftovers to eat for four meals. I would ration off these tiny treasures and do what I did best, survive.

I learned to live off the least amount possible; I hedged my bets against the hunger and rationed food into pockets and secret stashes in bags or pouches. As a child, I would take pieces of candy I got in class or ones I'd traded for shiny rocks I'd found at recess and hide them under the carpet in my room. In preparation for these treasures, I'd slit a hole big enough to protect a few jolly ranchers or gob stoppers at a time. Like a fiend looking for a fix, I would allow myself a single piece when the pain was the worst, and I needed relief. I would savor it and make it last for as long as possible, refusing to bite or break off a piece. I let the flavors flood over my every taste bud and savored them with the delicacies of a connoisseur. When there were no snacks or candy to be found, I would chew plastic, tree sap, old rubber, rocks, or whatever I could to satisfy the need to eat or feel food in my belly.

When Chelsea and I were married, we started out making enough to afford plenty of groceries. Even still, I could not bring myself to stop these habits. Chelsea nicknamed it “rat-holing” when she would catch me doing it. She never shamed me but laughed along like all the rest. She would give me two pieces of a sandwich, and I would immediately hide one of the halves back in its wrapper and stash it away. It was not until, while on a date, I took leftover food boxes abandoned on someone else’s table, that she confronted me. I had such a hard time articulating my need never to let food go to waste. I felt so much shame and the pain was too much to express. I would have to restrain myself from doing it again, knowing it was not accepted.

For years, though, I could not hold it back. We could have a fridge full of food, and I would still eat the oldest things first, ignoring the fresh and targeting the rotten instead. How could I let such precious things go to waste? When the food was beyond my ability to eat, I would need to leave it in the front yard for the birds, foxes, stray animals, or rabbits to eat. I just needed to let something or someone benefit even from the crumbs.

I did not know how to satisfy this hunger in my heart despite the healings and connecting with Littles who’d only ever known starvation and the pains of seeing other kids eat lunches filled with food they wanted while I had eaten the mystery plate at three in the morning the night before.

Friends would have Chelsea and me over to dinner, and I would eat enough to last me three days. I could not stop the fear of there not being enough tomorrow. Those who knew me best were so kind to make extra of my favorite delicacies when I came over, knowing how much joy and satisfaction it brought me to eat my fill. The joy would bubble out with abundance when I felt known and understood by someone noticing this and blessing me in such a kind way. They would send me home with an extra bag of fresh-baked snickerdoodle cookies or servings of Sesame Chicken. I was careful with my portions and able to ration them another week.

My rat-holing did not embarrass me, but some days it would drive Chelsea over the edge. She would catch me pulling food out of the trash she'd pitched the night before and often felt hurt, thinking it was unnecessary as we had plenty of food in the house. She felt as though it was personal and reflected on our living situation, but it never was. I think this was the one quirk she struggled with the most. It was so prevalent and did not go away like the others. Even as I write this, I am more puzzled to imagine how people could leave their dwellings without snacks stuffed into secret compartments in their clothing or emergency food in laptop bags and glove boxes.

I know many of you who are reading this can laugh as it strikes cords in your soul. In some ways, it is comical until it's not. When it's not about someone doing something odd and no one ever noticing, it suddenly becomes about someone finally being seen. I tell you this so that maybe you would not laugh the next time you notice a quirk in someone around you. Perhaps some of those church friends of mine should have bought me dinner instead of loading me with their scraps week after week or bought me groceries instead. Maybe one of my teachers should have looked closer and noticed the kid who eats many times the usual amount when free food is offered but otherwise hardly eats at all. Maybe they shouldn't have. I no longer hold it against them in any way.

Maybe it's better now they didn't so I could help you see this truth. It is not always going to be food, hunger, or leftovers pulled out of trash. It's all about looking closer than a cursory or dismissive glance. Before you blow someone off who is having a panicky reaction to something mundane, maybe ask a question. Ask why they might be that way. Maybe they've never felt safe enough to tell someone they'd been hurt by someone who had the same shirt on, or maybe they'd nearly been drowned by family members during a teenage prank. Perhaps we could all learn to be a little more intentional with our friends and family, and not so quick to dismiss a cry for help hidden by a laugh or self-deprecating joke. Hundreds of people throughout my life saw me digging through trashcans and the backs of fridges and pulling foil lined snacks out of pockets, and hardly ever did they look closer or ask a heartfelt question.

Maybe instead of your next tithe check getting dropped into an offering plate or donation box, it needs to go to your neighbor, your co-worker, or a family friend. It is time we looked closer instead of looking away. Maybe some of those preparations you've stockpiled for the end of the world could help feed a family this week. Or perhaps the hours you spend watching Netflix could be spent talking to someone who needs your attention and time.

Intentional ignorance will be accounted unto you in the days to come. Hunger is eating so many people alive. Some are starved for attention, never knowing the feel of lustless eyes upon their flesh. Some are hungry for friendship that is not tainted by manipulation and control. Others are drowning in debt because no one taught them how to manage money while they were making them work "The Trade" instead.

We need to be the answers, not the problems. We need to look closely enough to feel the breath of their sobs on our cheeks. We need to hold the hurting and tell them, "It's ok. You are safe now." We need to wrap our arms around the Survivors and weep with those who weep. We need to linger and not run away from the horrible stories they need to tell. We need to build a hedge of protection around them as they leave their Families, masters, pastors, or pimps. We need to be the empowering arms of grace enfolding them in provision, protection, and love.

I did not need more food to fix the hunger in my heart. What I needed was someone who cared about me more than the food on my plate or the lack thereof. What Survivors need does not come in prepackaged cases located on aisle seven of our grocery stores. There is not enough food in the world to satisfy the need I see in a wounded one's eyes. When I look into the eyes of these Survivors, I hear their hearts moaning with a hunger that transcends our flesh and blood bodies. It lingers in the depths of our souls.

Who can satisfy the need to be held and comforted? Who can screen our calls when our former handlers call and try to manipulate us back into their hands? Who is willing to pay our mortgage so we can get counseling and restoration from the brutality of a lifetime lived in pain? Who will pay attention when they see a little kid flinch at the pastor’s movement? Child Protective Services and other corrupt corporations are not the answer and never will be. The Followers of The Way need to be.

We need to be the answer to this. We need to have safe houses and underground railroads where Survivors can be shuttled out of their physical or spiritual cages and into a new life of peace. We need to open up our once-a-week church buildings to be living quarters for the homeless, the addicts, and the deranged. The hospitals for the weary should never close their doors. We need to let the fears of the ex-cons and felons fade away. Those cultural taboos of different races, beliefs, and traditions need to be covered by our truth and love. It is time we raise up the decaying stones from the miry clay. Now is the time we leave this world without accusations of our ambivalence and powerless claims of greasy godless grace.

Those who are coming out of these Families are going to be able to make a difference so few ever could. Once restored, these individuals are capable of things fewer still can fathom. The wounded ones were wounded for a reason. The Enemy knows how to harm its deadliest foes, and he does it early. The Enemy spends too much time teaching its slaves his subtle and crafty ways. Without knowing it, many of these Survivors have been trained to destroy their captors’ dungeons, palaces, and watery graves.

There are many things The Family and Trade taught me, one of which is how to make someone disappear. What do you do with the knowledge of evading detection and blending into shadows and black-market trades of identities and places to live, when you grow weary from wickedness and choose to give and not take? What if those of you who know The Trade became double agents and served The Redeemer instead? What if the agents of The Underworld built a railroad of redemption for those still trapped in its chains? What if you made duplicate copies and stole away the incriminating evidence, which shows the world just what builds the empires above the streets?

What if those who once slipped children into hotel rooms for "paying guests" instead used those minds to plot out escapes for the little ones and their moms? What if instead of smuggling flash drives of kiddie porn and prescription drugs in your Ultra-lite air plain, you smuggled Survivors who broke out of The Families' grasp? What if those secret drives and the names of their pedophilic photographers and producers instead found their way into the hands of those who knew how to execute real justice and were not tied by statues of limitations, compromised judges, or Oath keeping justices?

What if those who had the financial resources and insulated Trusts or Foundations bought up hotel chains, houses, and apartments and used them to shuttle people to freedom instead of as a place of torment, blackmail, and pedophilia? What if we bought children, mothers, and fathers out of the tunnels and The Underworld and funded their complete restoration at private places of refuge? What if we hired holy ministers and deliverers out of their 9-5 jobs and offered them beneficiaries who met their financial needs? None of this can happen until we decide not to look away from these dark realities but choose to face them instead.

The complete exposure of these crimes needs to be played in an endless stream before the world so they can't blink it away or minimize the screens of reality. We need to broadcast it on every station, every suggested video, and trending link. It is time we use our black hats of hacking for great good, instead of planting blackmail evidence on unruly Brothers, Sisters, Knights, or Family and State dissidents. Some of you architected agents of anarchy and chaos know of what I speak; hear me now so that The Secrets of The Underworld will stay hidden no longer.

Dig into the digital closets of our high-ranking officials, leaders, and magistrates, and you will see that there are more than just skeletons hiding in those closets. There is more than just the skeletons of affairs, drug habits, and corrupt contracts. Those skeletons had names like Jesse, Alex, Julie, Katrina, Samuel, Jared, and Penelope. I know their names, and I've not forgotten, and neither should you. They will be remembered, and they are the ones whom we should never forget: The Faceless Fallen who built the bloody pillars of the empire where our cities, capitals, and cathedrals abide.

The Hunger Games is not a work of fiction but a maddening reality to those birthed into The Families and made to pass through these Brotherhoods. When will days of luxury and comfortable living be enough? I know many of you are compromised – company-controlled private back rooms at The Family party saw to that – but speak The Secrets and show the truth before the child whose body you used to climb to power speaks it for you, and you burn for your crime.

There is time for redemption; there is a time for all kinds of immunity and justice. The hunger in our hearts demands it; it calls to us in the night. In the stillness, while the world sleeps, we Survivors see them: the faces of torment, pain, and betrayal. We see the Brutes, the politicians, priests, and the police who partook of our bodies or drank of our friends.

They will not leave us; they linger and cling to our soul. We bit down on our tongues to hold back the hurt, to prevent the dam from breaking loose and showering this world with our dark Underworld. The cracks are showing, and the inky waters of The Abyss are leaking to the surface, and soon they will come upon you in a torrent, an unstoppable force of exposure. If only you would see us and hear us before it breaks loose.

Will you look closer? Will you pay attention next time you go out to the bars or restaurants late at night and see the young girls working the corner of your high-end downtown? Will you see the "eighteen-year-old" we all know is only thirteen but turning tricks for her well-dressed upper-class confidence man? Will you see the homeless man begging for a meal on the corner and know that his story could just as easily have been like mine? Will you wonder and find out why no one puts a stop to the madness, why they bust the outer rings of pedophiles but never the inner circle of presidents and popes? Will you dig into our Underworld and see what makes it pulse with perversion and pain? Will you forsake your fears and hold the hands of a former slave who faced down unimaginable horrors to break out of her controller's grip?

We are not all going to be pretty or well dressed. Some of us woke up in a pool of vomit, trying to survive another night by escaping from the memories in glass bottles marked 120 proof. Some of us have sold our body to anyone who was willing to buy us a drink or take us out for a meal. Others are working full-time jobs and living well, but the nine prescription bottles in their bathroom tell you how they are really doing. They are surviving, but with the right kind of support and understanding, they could be thriving.

Survivors once set free can become the most courageous, bold, and impactful people who have ever lived. They are not born with the fear of darkness as most are. They do not fear the death of their bodies, the pain of torture, imprisonment, or rape. They have known these horrors, and yet they still breathe. They do not fear the character assassinations or the mocking and betrayal. They are warriors; they are heroes who deserve our thanks. They will be the ones who run back into the fires and snatch those burning bodies from the flames. They will be the ones charging into the depths of Families' Estates and setting the captives free. They will stand together in the face of impossible odds because they know, "One could put 100 to flight and two could put 10,000 to flight." (Deut. 32:30) It is because they know whose they are that they will not run; they will press through the fear, the pain, and the hunger and never let go when the trembling hand reaches out for help.

The hunger in my chest is never satisfied, and it likely never will be. As long as I am given breath in these lungs, it will linger. In contrast to all the quirks of mine, which have been relieved, this one Yahweh has entrusted to me for good. It is the longing for justice, the need to save just one more. It is a burning need to go back out on those downtown streets and document The Rings operating in my cities and my state, praying and awaiting the day when those running the justice system don't continue to hinder the revelation of their secret Trade. The Hunger drives me to prayerfully intercede in my city's high places and examine the thousands of miles of tunnel systems where the covens operate and defile our lands. It is a thirst that drives me to pray for the conversion of corrupt officials and blinded oath keeping officers who enable these wicked practices and for their victims too.

The hunger in my heart is not most satiated when I'm eating a free meal at a friend's house but when I hold the hands of a man who is dressed in a thousand-dollar suit as he weeps for the first time, confessing his need for redemption from his misery and self-hate. It comes when I hear the testimony of a Survivor like Mary Lou Lake and Donna Carrico whose burning hands were washed in the living waters of our King.

There is a hunger in every one of you. It is a missing piece of our make-up that The God of Mercy holds on to. It is to drive us towards the finish line, towards more jewels to build our crown of glory we can cast at The Messiah's feet. Yahweh says that He holds a white stone for every single person with a name written on it that we alone will someday understand. (Rev. 2:17) Maybe once this name is read or spoken aloud, it finally satisfies The Hunger and gives us His eternity's rest. Until then, The Hunger is there to drive us out of our comfort zones of complacency and into our purpose. The fears you once held do not need to linger; only surrender them to The Messiah. By His redemption, they can become your greatest strength. Take those talents and use them for great good and the saving of many lives.

Don't be lulled into passivity but let The Hunger drive you towards deliverance, provision, and hope. Not all of you need to infiltrate luxurious cabins in the mountains where they hide incriminating hard drives in plain sight, but some of you do. Not all of you need to exploit the back doors of the Underground Trade market, but some of you do. Every one of you so-called pastors and shepherds out there needs to repent of ever allowing and endorsing deceived or willful oath keeping cowards into your flocks or into your own homes. It is time like the days of Charles Finney we utterly drive out the Brother and Sisterhoods of deception from our most precious families.

Find the way you can satisfy the hunger of the hurting. Find a way to be the answer to this insufferable problem. Clothe the naked, give water to the thirsty, and give shelter to the homeless. It is not hard, but that does not mean it's going to be easy. Following The Way of Messiah is not going to come naturally – not at first – but as you yield to His Instructions, you will see that His yoke is infinitely easy and His burden is light. (Matt. 11:30) There is no greater joy in the world than seeing a captive boy go free or a formerly shackled woman laugh unhindered for the first time in her life. I pray you grow hungry and the food in your fridge or pocket will not satisfy you until the day you surrender to your true purpose and higher calling.

I will yield to the hunger and to the ache in my belly at night. I will lay my life down before this mad world and crawl back into the cupboards of chaos I was born into. I will seek the lost. I will set fires to the beacons of redemption and let the world burn my body for the sake of the perishing. May they know that there are those of courage and faith willing to stand in the gap so that just one more burning stick can be snatched from the blackened flames.

To you who are crying out for help, crying out for justice, He has heard you and sent The Rescuer. He is not afraid of your handlers, worshipful masters, Council of 13, generals, popes, or priests. He does not fear their teams of assassins, astral projecting spirits, or poisoned meals. He does not tremble at the summoning of dark principalities but, hear me, they do tremble before Him. I have seen The Ancient Ones flee at the sound of His Name. I have seen those who cut the palms and speak the oaths fall flat on their faces under the weight of His presence. I have witnessed salvation in the eyes of the perishing when they surrendered to His ways.

May you know that liars, murderers, and thieves pierced through the only Hand, which can ever heal you. The upper class conspirators of society crucified The King of Glory; do not doubt that they will try to do it to His followers too. They hate freed slaves; they hate men of courage, faith, and strength who do not run from the battle but steel themselves for combat. They fear men who gird up their loins and face down their fleshly fears and nail them to His execution stake. They fear women who know their identity and surrender to The Word of Yahweh Elohim. The guilty cowards can't stand to be in the room with those who have The Kingdom of Truth burning in their chest. They will not be able to stand against you, and The Almighty Creator who is standing with you. Once more I call to you who are listening, reading along, or tuning in. I pray now you will answer this call.

My beloved friend from afar, I beg you come to Him. You matter more than you know. You are loved and treasured and adored. I am a man on a mission of redemption, and I ask you this day: will you join me? Will you link arms with a wounded warrior and let him lead you into enemy territory, where you can help rescue the souls crying in the night, begging someone to bring them The Light. Will you wash the feet of prostitutes and hold the shaking marked hands of felons? Will you forsake your mediocrity and wage war on resentment, fear, and regret? Come with me as I run into the arms of evil and snatch those burning sticks from the flames.

I know so many of you believe the lies and do not think you're special or that you could be anything but ordinary. I assure you of this: Yahweh hardly ever sought out the worldly champions to wage His most important wars, but rather children who were the least important and quickest to be passed over. He chose prostitutes condemned to die; he called out death dwelling men possessed with legions of demons to go and bear His witness to the nations. He chose the overlooked elderly whose wombs were withered and for whom hopes of meaning had dried up. He chose the blue-collar workers who couldn't read or write, throwing nets into the waters, and taught them to fish for the immortal souls of mankind. He took the outcasts, those running from debt collectors, and felons in hiding, and while in The Wilderness, turned them into the Mighty Gibborim men of David, the most exceptional warriors this world has ever known. (2 Sam. 22, 23 1 Chronicles 11:10-47) Our God makes the ordinary become extraordinary and befuddles the Enemy's elite warriors and ordained ministers of deceit.

I invite you, dear warrior, to stand. I urge you to rise up from the failures, lies, and regret and stand upon The Truth. (Eph. 6:10-19) Stand now while the battle lines are drawn, while the last of the Survivors come crawling out of their cages, addictions, and withdrawals. Stand firm when they persecute you, mock you, and call you insane. Do not relent but know that the fires of persecution should be burning against us all. We are soldiers for The Great Redeemer, and the cares of this world need to grow dim in the Light of His Glorious Face. (2 Tim. 2:3-4, Deut. 3:22) Suit up and arm yourself with The Living Word of God; obedience to it will build a hedge of impenetrable protection no power can stand against. No matter the amount of persecution and attack, you too will see that The King of Glory reigns.

It is because of my great love for you that I poured this still bleeding heart upon these pages and ask you to do the same. I urge you to pick up the dangerous pen and speak The Secrets, write the words of forgiveness, and leave the darkness behind. Join us as we light candles of hope against the darkness of despair.

With these words written, I offer you, dear reader, the torches to set this former assassin, addict, and dark wolf ablaze.

If He wills it to come to that, may the words of my testimony burn forever because great is my love for those wounded ones still perishing, lost in the internal maze. Even if it saves only one, I gladly lie upon the trembling tracks of public perception, corrupt judicial systems, and political power plays.

May those trapped in the tunnels of torture or Bloodlines see that there will always be someone who is willing to lay down his life for theirs. May the wounded ones see that a Survivor is willing to bleed for justice, righteousness, and truth. May you all know there is still yet meaning for your misery, madness, and despair.

Come and see The Redeemer of murderers, harlots, and keepers of occult ways. Come and see The God of Mercy is waiting for you to come home and find rest for your weary soul. May The God of All Comfort strengthen you in the innermost portion of your being. May He set your heart on fire with His passion, truth, and hope.

My name is Nathan Lok Reynolds and I have been Snatched From The Flames. I am a living witness against the darkest of nights. The fire in my chest will never be quenched for it burns with The All-Consuming Fire of Yahweh Elohim. To Him alone be the praise, glory, and the offering of my life now and forever.

MORNING PRAYER

Father, I declare that You are the One True God, the Most High God, the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. I ask You to forgive my sins and cleanse me of all unrighteousness, create in me a clean heart and renew a right spirit within me. I plead the blood of Jesus over my eyes and ears and over the eyes and ears of my family, so we can see and hear truth, and I ask You to shield us from all forms of mind control that can enter the eye gates and ear gates. I declare that we have access to the whole armor of God according to Ephesians 6; our loins are girt about with truth, and our feet are shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace. We have the breastplate of righteousness, the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation and the Sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God. As we commit our works unto You, our thoughts will be established according to Proverbs 16:3. Father, I ask You to apply the blood of Jesus to any doors that I have open to the enemy that I am unaware of, and I ask You to reveal these doors to me so they can be closed forever.

I take the authority that Jesus gave me over all the power of the enemy according to Luke 10:19. I stand upon Your Word in Matthew 16:19 that I have been given the keys to the Kingdom and what I bind on Earth will be bound in Heaven, and what I loose on Earth will be loosed in Heaven. I take authority over the kingdom of darkness in every plain of existence that has access to me, and I bind the power of the enemy to affect me or my family, and I loose the power of the Kingdom of God to form impenetrable shields in every dimension -- above, below and all around, in the name of Jesus.

I stand upon the promise in Your Word that says that no weapon formed against me shall prosper, according to Isaiah 54:17. I stand upon the 91st Psalm that no evil shall befall me, neither shall any plague come nigh my dwelling. The 91st Psalm also promises that Your holy angels have been given charge over me and my family to keep us in all our ways. Father, I ask You to send extra angels for reinforcement during times of spiritual warfare, in Jesus' name.

Father, I ask You to forgive the sins of all of my ancestors (and the ancestors of my children and grandchildren), and I plead the blood of Jesus over my DNA and the DNA of all of my descendants, which cleanses our bloodlines of all iniquity. I bind the power of any generational or familiar spirits to attach or influence us, and I loose the power of the Kingdom of God within us and around us as we keep Your commandments. I declare that our family is free to walk in the blessings of Deuteronomy 28.

I ask You to forgive the sins of all individuals being used by the enemy to combat our family (and ministry). I ask You to forgive the sins of all of their ancestors, and I plead the blood of Jesus over their bloodlines all the way to the DNA level, breaking the power of iniquity. I ask You to break all of their occult power to the highest levels, making it impossible for them to be used by the kingdom of darkness to harm anyone. I ask You to save their souls, deliver and heal them. I plead the blood of Jesus over every action and every word spoken against me and my family, nullifying the demonic power. I command any evil spirits sent on assignment against me and my family to return to the place they were sent from. I bind these spirits from harming those that sent them, but I pray that their defeat in their mission would serve as a testimony of Your greatness and the victory that Jesus won for believers, in Jesus' name. Father, I ask You to remove my DNA and the DNA of my family from any hair, blood or any other contact object in the hands of the enemy and break all conduits to our physical bodies, in Jesus' name.

Father, I ask You to forgive the sins that have allowed technology to be used as a weapon against Your creation. I ask You to place shields between me and my family and all broadcasts of the enemy through the airways, TVs, computers, phone lines, electric lines and satellites. I stand upon the promises in Your Word that You are our shield. I ask You to purify our air, water and food, in Jesus' name. Father, I ask You to forgive the sins done on the roadways, railroad tracks, and waterways. I ask You to forgive the sins of any individuals or groups that have adopted the roadways, and I ask You to break any occult connections that would give power to the kingdom of darkness. Father, I ask You to provide divine protection during any modes of transportation. I ask You to surround our vehicles with Your holy angels to insure safe travel, in Jesus' name. Father, lead me in paths of righteousness today and attune my ears to Your voice that I may follow You. I ask You to fill me with a hunger for your Word, that I may know You more. I give You all of my praise, my worship, the honor and the glory, in Jesus' name.

EVENING PRAYER

Father, I declare that You are the God of our evenings as well as our days. I stand upon Psalm 91:5, 6 -- Thou shalt not be afraid of the terror by night or the arrow that flieth by day; nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness; nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday. I plead the blood of Jesus over my family. I come into agreement with the promises in Your Word that my family is blessed physically, mentally, emotionally, and spiritually. I ask You to put impenetrable shields around our property, with armies of Your holy angels standing guard. I ask You to forgive the sins that have been done in the surrounding area, and I command the kingdom of darkness to clear our airways, grounds, and underneath, in Jesus' name. Father, I bind any demons from entering our property. I ask You to forgive the sins that have enabled astral travel and I ask You to block that activity. I ask You to place hedges of protection around our family that humans cannot penetrate, either physically or through astral projection. I loose the power of the Kingdom of God to break the power of satanic surveillance. Father, I ask You to send Your holy angels to roadblock any attacks from the enemy. Father, because of Your faithfulness, we can go to sleep with full assurance that You are watching over us through the night. We ask all of these things in the Mighty Name of Jesus.

PRAYER FOR RELEASE FROM GENERATIONAL CURSES

Father, I ask You to forgive all of the sins of our ancestors. I ask You to cover our bloodlines all the way to the DNA level with the blood of Jesus, and I ask You to send the blood of Jesus over the spiritual lines connecting us to those that we share DNA with, blocking any familiar spirits coming to us. We declare that Jesus paid the price for us to be free of every generational curse, and we take our authority over all the power of the enemy according to Luke 10:19 and stand upon Matthew 16:19 that what we bind on Earth will be bound in Heaven and what we loose on Earth will be loosed in Heaven. We bind every familiar spirit and generational spirit that has attached to our family because of the iniquity on our bloodlines, and we command them to leave us, in Jesus' name. We loose the power of the Kingdom of God within us and around us, and we ask for restoration of all that Satan has stolen through these generational doorways (including our health, resources, joy and peace), in Jesus' name. FREEMASONRY: I recommend visiting www.isaiah54.org/freemasonry.html for further prayers specifically designed for Freemasons and their descendants.

PRAYER FOR RELEASE FROM SOUL TIES

Father, I repent for every ungodly soul tie that I have made through sexual union. I apply the blood of Jesus to the soul tie that I made with ____________. I ask You to sever the cord connecting me to this person with the Sword of the Spirit. I bind any demonic attachments that came to me, and I command them to leave me, in Jesus' name. I loose the power of the Kingdom of God within me and around me to restore what was damaged by this soul tie. I ask You to seal the severed cord with the blood of Jesus, so it can never be connected again, and I ask You to remove any foreign DNA from my body, in Jesus' name. Father, I ask You to deliver every person from any spirits that were transferred to them from me, in Jesus' name.

PRAYER FOR VICTIMS OF TRAUMA AND FRAGMENTATION

Father, I submit myself to You, spirit, soul and body, and I am so grateful for the price that Jesus paid to make me whole. I ask You to forgive the sins of my abusers, and I ask You to sever all soul ties with them. I command any spirits that passed through the soul ties to leave me, in the name of Jesus, and I ask You to seal those severed cords with the blood of Jesus. As an act of my will, I choose to forgive every individual that has harmed me, in Jesus' name. I take authority over my mind, and I bind gatekeepers and watchers and break their power over me, in the name of Jesus. I loose the power of the Kingdom of God within me and around me, to overtake and override every plot and scheme of the enemy to hold me captive, in Jesus' name. Father, I ask You to impart to me the anointing that destroys every yoke of bondage. I thank You for the promise of a sound mind in 2 Timothy 1:7.

Father, I ask You to forgive the sins done to me that defiled Your Name, Your Word, and Your House, and I ask You to restore the truth of who You are to every part of my being. Father, I ask You to judge every demonic force that has been a part of my captivity since I was a child and deliver me. I plead the blood of Jesus over every ritual performed and every oath, vow, contract and covenant made connecting me to the kingdom of darkness, and I ask You to set me free and bring me under the protection of Your Kingdom. Father, when I was a child I was taken against my will, but I now have authority through Jesus over my tormentors, and I command them to let me go, in Jesus' name. According to Psalm 142:7, I pray: Bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise thy name.

Father, I ask You to make every doorway to blocked memories one-way doors, and I plead the blood of Jesus into every area of my mind. I ask You to override any mind control programming that has been used as a weapon against me, as I stand upon Your Word in Isaiah 54:17 that no weapon formed against me shall prosper. I ask You to show me anything that I need to see to be free, but I ask that the overwhelming emotions would be buffered, to allow me to come to grips with the truth without further trauma. I place my healing in Your hands, and I place my trust in You.

I bind any demons that are a part of my programming, and I loose the Spirit of Truth to counter and eradicate from my mind spirits of doubt and deception, in Jesus' name. I ask forgiveness for the sins that caused my mind to fragment, and I command the past to let me go. Because You fill all space and time, I ask You to pour anointing oil on every fragment of my mind at the time that the splitting occurred. I claim the manifested healing and deliverance at this present time, and I declare that I am not a child anymore; I am free to mature to my present age with restored peace and joy. I claim restoration of the years that Satan has stolen from me. I claim back my health, my resources, and my future, in Jesus' name.

I declare that I am a child of the King of the Universe, and I choose to follow the One True God and declare that I have been set free from the kingdom of darkness, in Jesus' name. I renounce all connections to Satanism, witchcraft, Druidism, and all other factions of the occult. Teach me Your ways so I can walk circumspectly before You each day, in Jesus' name. Father, I ask You to forgive every sin done by every fragment of my being, including involvement in the occult. I renounce these powers and bind Satan's ability to use me in any way. I loose the sanctifying power of the blood of Jesus to cover any gifts that You have given me, so I can flow in a pure stream of the Holy Spirit. Father, I repent for any forbidden activities, such as astral projection, and I take authority over my vessel and forbid any demons, humans, or mind control program to cause me to leave my body.

I ask You to forgive the sins of every individual that I have been connected to in the occult, and I ask You to sever all connections so that I can never be accessed again, in Jesus' name. I ask You to forgive the sins that allowed fragment exchanges between me and any other person, and I bind any demons connected to these exchanges. I ask You to block any humans with pernicious intent from contacting me. I ask You to hide any brain wave identification and block all satanic surveillance, in Jesus' name. Father, place hedges of protection around me and surround me with armies of Your holy angels to block all activity directed against me in the spiritual or physical realms, in Jesus' name. I take authority over and command every part of my being to stay within my physical body. Father, I place my sleep state in Your hands and trust You to keep me safe. Father, I ask You to reveal any additional information that is essential for my healing, in Jesus' name.

ANTIGRAVITY PROPULSION

"Paul LaViolette is one of the most interesting and innovative thinkers probing the limits and horizons of contemporary physics. In this book he takes up a challenge that many of us have thought about but could not document: the possibility of propulsion systems that practically defy gravity. His findings merit earnest consideration, debate, and discussion."

ANTIGRAVITY: FROM DREAM TO REALITY

1.1 TRAVELING TO THE STARS

Interstellar space travel has long captivated the imagination and longing of humankind. Indeed, we have penetrated the cosmos and walked on the moon, while breakthroughs in long-range exploration, such as the Hubble Space Telescope, bring the farthest reaches of space tantalizingly close, rekindling our desire to travel beyond our galaxy. As of yet, we are bound by the frustrating limits of conventional propulsion technology. Skeptics remind us that a spacecraft powered by even the most advanced chemical rockets would need to carry so much fuel that travel over interstellar distances would be out of the question. Alternatively, vehicles equipped with nuclear-powered ion thrusters would have a much greater range. However, the fuel requirements would be such as to make a journey of even a few light-years quite impractical—basic physics tells us that a rocket-powered spacecraft would need a fuel mass that would far exceed the mass of the vehicle itself.

Is there a way to free ourselves of this fuel problem, using a totally different means of propulsion, one that does not require large quantities of mass to be jettisoned rearward for the craft to move forward? Imagine a spaceship that could alter the ambient gravitational field, artificially producing a matter-attracting, gravity-potential well that was just beyond the ship's bow. The gravity well's attractive force would tug the ship forward just as if a very massive, planet-sized body had been placed ahead of it. The ship would begin to "fall" forward and, in doing so, would carry its self-generated gravity well along with it. The gravity well would continually draw the ship forward, while always staying ahead. Through such a carrot-and-stick effect, the ship could accelerate to nearly the speed of light, or maybe even beyond, with essentially no expenditure of energy other than that needed to generate the gravity well.

Is such gravity control possible? Would it be possible to construct a spaceship with small enough propulsion power requirements that interstellar travel could be achieved? The answer is yes. For the past several decades, highly classified aerospace programs in the United States and in several other countries have been developing aircraft capable of defying gravity. One form of this technology can loft a craft on matter-repelling energy beams. This exotic technology falls under the relatively obscure field of research known as electrogravitics.

The origins of electrogravitics can be traced back to the turn of the twentieth century, to Nikola Tesla's work with high-voltage shock discharges, and somewhat later to T. Townsend Brown's relatively unpublicized discovery that electrostatic and gravitational fields are closely intertwined. Unfortunately, the electrogravitic effect has for the most part been ignored by mainstream academics, because the phenomenon isn't anticipated by either classical electrostatics or general relativity, effectively preventing it from being taught in university courses such as physics and electrical engineering. Rather, to unlock the secrets of electrogravitics, one must delve into popular science articles, patents, and relatively obscure technical reports that once held a classified status. Perhaps the best place to begin is to review some of Brown's seminal work.

1.2 ■ THE BIRTH OF ELECTROGRAVITICS

The American physicist and inventor Thomas Townsend Brown was born in 1905 to a well-to-do Zanesville, Ohio, family. At an early age, he displayed a keen interest in space travel and dreamed of one day journeying into space himself. His discovery of the electrogravitic phenomenon occurred during his high school years, when his interest in space travel led him to toying with a Coolidge tube—a high-voltage X-ray-emitting vacuum tube similar to that found in modern dental X-ray machines. Brown had the insight to mount the tube on a delicate balance to investigate whether it might produce any thrust. To his surprise, the tube moved every time it was turned on. Ruling out X-rays as the cause of this mysterious force, he traced the effect to the high voltage he was applying to the tube's plates. He concluded that the tube had moved because its gravity field had somehow become affected by the plate's high-voltage charge.[1–4]

After additional experiments, Brown eventually developed an electric capacitor device that he termed a gravitator (or, alternately, gravitor). These units were very heavy. One version consisted of a wooden box, 2 feet long and 4 inches square, that contained a series of massive, electrically conductive plates made of lead and separated from one another by electrically insulating sheets of glass, which served as the capacitor's dielectric medium (a dielectric is a substance that does not conduct electric current). Another version used a dielectric molded from a mixture of lead monoxide and beeswax encased in Bakelite. The diagram in figure 1.2, which is reproduced from Brown's 1928 patent, shows yet another version made with aluminum plates and paraffin.

When energized with up to 150,000 volts of direct current (DC), Brown's gravitator developed a thrust in the direction of its positively charged end. One such gravitator, which weighed 10 kilograms, was observed to generate a maximum thrust of 0.1 kilogram (1 newton), a force equal to about 1 percent of its weight.[5,6] When oriented upright on a scale and energized, it proceeded to gain or lose that amount of weight depending upon how the charge polarity was applied. It became lighter when its positive end faced up and heavier when its negative end faced up.

Brown entered the California Institute of Technology in 1922. He spent a good part of his freshman year attempting to win the friendship of his professors and to convince them of his abilities as a first-class "lab man." However, when he began mentioning his ideas about electrogravity, no one would listen. At the end of the year, he had his laboratory equipment shipped from Ohio, set it up in his quarters, and sent invitations to several of his professors, including the renowned Dr. Robert Millikan, to witness a demonstration of the new force he had discovered. No one came. Some time later, one of Brown's friends tested Millikan by asking him whether he knew of anyone who had ever found a way of modifying or influencing the force of gravity. Millikan is said to have replied brusquely, "Of course not; such a thing is impossible and out of the question."

His feelings deeply hurt by the incident, Brown transferred to Kenyon College, in Gambier, Ohio, and the following year he transferred to Dennison University, in Granville, Ohio. One of his physics professors at Dennison, Dr. Paul A. Biefeld, had also been interested in the movement of electric capacitors. Brown had frequent conversations with Biefeld and came to refer to the electrogravitic phenomenon as the Biefeld-Brown effect, perhaps in respect to Biefeld's own interest in the subject. Still, it is not clear that Biefeld actively collaborated with Brown on his research.

For one of his experiments, Brown arranged a pair of gravitators, one at each end of an arm that was suspended from the laboratory ceiling by a long cord attached to the arm's central fulcrum (figure 1.3). When energized with between 75,000 and 300,000 volts DC, the connecting arm rotated as each gravitator moved in the direction of its positive pole. This force occurred in the same fashion even when the capacitor was immersed in a tank of oil, thereby ruling out the possibility that the effect was produced by a wind of electric ions. Brown's gravitators could produce this motion with a power input of just 1 watt. With each gravitator generating 100 grams of thrust, for a total thrust of 2 newtons, the thrust-to-power ratio of Brown's electrogravitic thrusters calculates to 2,000 newtons per kilowatt. This is 130 times the thrust-to-power ratio of a jet engine, or 10,000 times the thrust-to-power ratio of the space shuttle main engine.

Brown determined that the electrogravitic effect he observed depended on the amount of charge stored in his capacitors. As the applied voltage was increased and a greater amount of charge was stored, the capacitors would respond with a greater amount of electrogravitic force. Moreover, because the intensity of the effect depended upon the capacitor's mass, he concluded that the induced motion must be due to the capacitor's ability to generate a localized gravitational field.

After he left Dennison, Brown conducted astrophysics research for four years, from 1926 to 1930, working at a private laboratory in his hometown of Zanesville and also at Ohio's Swazey Observatory, where he was in contact with Dr. Biefeld. In a variation of his rotating gravitator experiment, Brown suspended a single gravitator from his laboratory ceiling by two wires (figure 1.4). The gravitator was hung so that it would stay immersed in a tank of oil, so as to reduce the production of ions. When energized, the pendulum would swing toward the gravitator's positive pole. Brown characterized this electrogravitic phenomenon as an impulse.[7] He noted that less than five seconds was required for the pendulum to reach the maximum amplitude of its swing, but then, even while he maintained the high-voltage potential, his pendulum would gradually return to its plumb position, taking from 30 to 80 seconds to return. He noted further that on its return from maximum deflection, his pendulum would hesitate at definite levels or steps, but repeated trials showed that there were no consistent positions to these steps.

Brown also noted that he would have to give his gravitator a rest after each test to see the effect repeat once again. He had to remove his charging potential for at least five minutes to allow his gravitator sufficient time to "recharge" itself so that it might regain its "former gravitic condition." He did not mention what might have been happening during this recharging process, probably because at that time he had no clear idea himself. He saw that when the duration of the gravitic impulse had been greater, more time was needed off-line to allow the gravitator to refresh itself.

We may gain an understanding of why his gravitator would not hold its initial gravitic force by analyzing what was happening inside its dielectric. Initially, before high voltage was applied, the dielectric would reside in an unpolarized state. With the application of voltage, current would begin to flow and the gravitator's plates would progressively charge up. The electric field between the plates would exert an electrostatic force on the dielectric's molecules, causing them to displace slightly—the positive molecular charges being tugged in the direction of the gravitator's negative pole and the negative molecular charges being tugged toward its positive pole. As a result, the dielectric would become polarized (see figure 1.5), its electric dipole moment pointing in a direction opposite to the direction of the applied electric field.

The dielectric does not polarize instantaneously in response to the applied voltage; it takes some time to reach full polarization. This time lag is a common property of dielectrics known as dielectric relaxation. It is analogous to the property of hysteresis observed when a transformer core is magnetically energized. Most capacitor dielectrics used today have very short dielectric relaxation times—less than microseconds. However, Brown's capacitor must have had a very slow relaxation time, probably because it was rather long from end to end and because of the nature of the wax-litharge mixture of which it was composed. The 30 to 80 seconds or so that the gravitator took to gradually return to its plumb position from its maximum deflection was likely the duration of its dielectric relaxation, the time required for its dielectric to become fully polarized.

During the first few seconds that the voltage was applied, the slowly responding dielectric, for the most part, would have remained unpolarized. Hence the applied electric field, along with its associated gravitic field effect, would have extended with full intensity throughout the gravitator, exerting a maximal gravitic thrust on the dielectric in the direction of the gravitator's positive pole. However, as the dielectric became increasingly polarized, its oppositely directed electric dipole moment field arising within the dielectric would have progressively increased in strength, progressively canceling out the gravitic effects induced by the externally applied electric field. Thus the thrust pushing the gravitator in the direction of its positive pole would have progressively subsided. Moreover, when the dielectric reached its fully polarized state with its opposed dipole moment field at its maximum, this thrust would have become almost entirely canceled out, leaving the gravitator to return to its plumb position.

As the dielectric became progressively polarized, the gravitator capacitor plates would have been able to hold an increasing amount of electric charge as an increasing number of polarized molecular charges moved adjacent to the plates to attract additional charges. As a result, throughout this polarization interval the gravitator would have been charging up and a current would have been flowing to its plates. Charge would have been accumulating most rapidly in the beginning and the charging rate would have progressively dropped off as the full charged state was approached. Similarly, the reverse gravitic thrust generated by the polarizing dielectric would have caused the overall gravitic thrust to decline most rapidly at the beginning of the pendulum's swing and to subside more slowly as the fully charged state was approached. The observation that the gravitic force subsided in steps may be an indication that the dielectric experienced a succession of abrupt mechanical shifts in its approach to the fully polarized state.

The need to recycle the gravitator between test runs, to discharge it and let it rest so as to "regain its former gravitic condition," is understandable if we realize that it was necessary to allow a sufficiently long rest period for the dielectric to completely depolarize. After the DC voltage supply is shut off, a residual charge will initially remain on the capacitor plates, kept there by the dielectric's residual polarization. Engineers refer to this remnant charge as dielectric absorption. It is particularly important in capacitors that are capable of storing a lot of charge. As the dielectric progressively relaxes, this charge is gradually released. Once the gravitator dielectric had relaxed to an unpolarized state, new charges would be able to rapidly accumulate on its electrodes during the next charging cycle. Once again, a steep gravity potential gradient would have been able to form across the gravitator and temporarily exert a net thrust on its massive dielectric until it was again opposed by the dielectric's progressively increasing dipole moment field.

1.3 ■ A THEORY OF ELECTROGRAVITICS

In August 1927, Brown filed for a British patent on his gravitator idea, which was issued to him in November 1928 (British patent 300,311). In the patent's text, Brown clearly proclaims that the propelling force he has discovered is of an unconventional nature:

> The invention also relates to machines or apparatus requiring electrical energy that control or influence the gravitational field or the energy of gravitation; also to machines or apparatus requiring electrical energy that exhibit a linear force or motion which is believed to be independent of all frames of reference save that which is at rest relative to the universe taken as a whole, and said linear force or motion is furthermore believed to have no equal and opposite reaction that can be observed by any method commonly known and accepted by the physical science to date.[8]

Here he describes his belief that electrogravitic force operates relative to a unique reference frame that is at rest in relation to the universe, an idea that challenges special relativity's notion that a force should operate in the same manner relative to any frame of reference. Moreover, he suggests that this force is reactionless when producing its forward thrust—that is, it produces its forward thrust without any back-directed recoil. He is in effect suggesting that it violates Newton's third law of motion—that every action should produce an equal and opposite reaction. Dr. Patrick Cornille, who repeated Brown's high-voltage pendulum experiment, came to the similar conclusion that Newton's third law of motion was indeed violated (see chapter 12).

On October 28, 1928, just prior to receiving his patent, Townsend submitted to the physics journal Physical Review a paper titled "Tapping Cosmic Energy," which described his gravitator experiments.

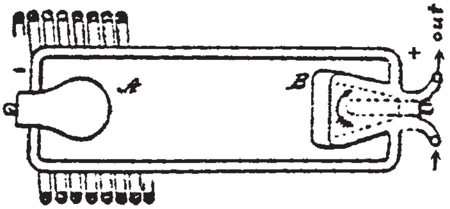

Figure 1.6. A gravitator configured within an evacuated envelope reproduced from Brown's patent. In this version, the negative electrode or cathode (left) is heated to incandescence, thereby encouraging the thermionic emission of electrons, whereas the positive electrode or anode (right) is cooled by circulating air or water. This configuration mimics many of the design features of an X-ray tube (or Coolidge tube), like the ones that Brown used when he first observed the electrogravitic phenomenon. (Brown, 1928)

Unfortunately, the journal rejected his paper, apparently because of its unconventional nature. For one thing, his ideas challenged Einstein's theory of gravitation, which had by then become staunchly accepted by the physics community. One year later, Brown published a less technical version of his findings in Science and Invention Magazine[9] and succeeded in impressing a large number of people with his work.

In 1930 one of Brown's colleagues wrote about the gravitator to Colonel Edward Deeds, who was one of Brown's longtime acquaintances. In his letter he wrote, "I have had a number of scientists view the gravitator and they have all been absolutely amazed at its action, frankly stating that whereas they see the results and the movements of the gravitator, it is absolutely unexplainable by any laws of physics that they know."[10]

At that time, Brown had no theory to explain electrogravity. It would not be until twenty years later that he sketched out a theory of sorts, which he made notes about in one of his lab notebooks. But a theoretical methodology that actually predicted charge-mass coupling and that could begin to make some sense out of electrogravitics in a unified-field-theory context did not begin to emerge until the late 1970s with the development of subquantum kinetics.[11–13] It is useful to review a bit about this theory here, as it will help us interpret the novel results that Brown was getting.

Subquantum kinetics offers an explanation for gravity that is substantially different from Einstein's relativity theory. Whereas general relativity postulates that masses exert an attractive gravitational force on other bodies by warping the space-time dimensional fabric around themselves, subquantum kinetics proposes that masses have no such effect on the geometry of space or time. Subquantum kinetics assumes that space is geometrically flat, or Euclidean; hence, it conforms to the geometrical rules most everyone learns in high school math class. It predicts that a mass creates a classical gravity potential field and that a gradient in such a field exerts a force on a remote body by affecting how that body's constituent subatomic particles regenerate their physical form. (Details of how potential fields are generated and how they accelerate material particles through form regeneration are further discussed in chapter 4.)

Subquantum kinetics also differs from general relativity in its prediction of gravitational field polarity. According to general relativity, masses only attract other masses, never repel them. Although Einstein did introduce the notion of a matter-repelling effect whose magnitude he symbolically represented by a quantity called the cosmological constant, this was not part of his general relativity theory, but was an ad hoc correction factor added to his field equations so that they would not predict a universe that was spontaneously contracting due to self-gravitation.

Einstein had attempted to expand his relativity theory to encompass both electromagnetism and gravitation, but he was unsuccessful. Relativity was unable to predict any connection between charge polarity and gravitational field polarity.

Subquantum kinetics, on the other hand, predicts that gravity should have two polarities. It permits the creation of either a matter-attracting gravity potential well or a matter-repelling gravity potential hill and predicts that these two gravity polarities should be directly correlated with electric charge polarity. That is, positively charged particles such as protons would generate gravity wells, whereas negatively charged particles such as electrons would generate gravity hills. When protons and electrons combine to compose electrically neutral atoms, the gravitational polarities of the protons and electrons for the most part would neutralize one another. However, because a proton's gravity well is theorized to marginally exceed an electron's gravity hill, electrically neutral matter would produce a small, residual matter-attracting gravity potential well, thereby generating the gravity we commonly experience pulling us to Earth.

Subquantum kinetics predicts that a matter-repelling gravity potential hill should form on the negatively charged side of a capacitor and that a matter-attracting gravity potential well forms on the positively charged side. The intervening gravity potential gradient would produce a gravitational force on the capacitor's massive dielectric that would act to pull it in the direction of the positively charged plate (figure 1.7). The more prominent the gravity hill and well, the steeper the gravity potential gradient and the stronger the produced gravitational thrust. While this force was present, the capacitor would behave as if it was being tugged forward by a very strong gravitational field emanating from an invisible planetary mass situated ahead of its positive pole and as if it was being pushed forward by an equally strong repulsive gravitational force emanating from behind its negative pole. If the capacitor was placed with its positive pole facing up and was energized such that it generated a sufficiently steep vertical gravity gradient, theoretically the downward pull of gravity could be entirely overcome. (For a more detailed mathematical analysis of how this electrogravitic force might be quantified, see the text box on pages 13–16.)

At present there is no easy way to check the prediction that an individual electron might have negative gravitational mass because any matter-repelling gravitational force it might produce would be greatly overpowered by its electrostatic force interactions with surrounding matter. That is, no one has found a way to screen out these electrostatic forces sufficiently to allow an accurate measurement of a single particle's gravitational mass. However, when large numbers of electrons and protons are differentially accumulated, as at the opposite poles of a charged capacitor, the cumulative effect of the negative gravitational potentials of the electrons appears to be great enough to produce an observable macroscopic force. That force is the electrogravitic effect that Brown observed.

Quantifying the Electrogravitic Effect

Subquantum kinetics, then, predicts that a charged body should generate a gravitational mass, m_g, that scales directly with the magnitude of its electrical charge. Their proportional equivalence is expressed by the following electrogravitic coupling relation:

[gravitational mass] IS PROPORTIONAL TO [electric charge]

or with symbols:

$$m_g \propto q, \qquad (1)$$

Thus, a body that has a fourfold increase in positive electric charge should produce a fourfold-greater positive gravitational mass. Also, a fourfold increase in negative electric charge should produce a fourfold-greater negative (mass-repelling) gravitational mass. Moreover, because electric charge comes in either a positive or negative polarity, ±q, gravitational mass would similarly be induced in either of two polarities correlated with the charge polarity.

The same electrogravitic rule holds when expressed in terms of electric charge density, ρ_e, and gravitational mass density, ρ_m, quantities that refer to the amount of charge or gravitational mass per unit volume. Their proportional equivalence is expressed as:

[gravitational mass density] IS PROPORTIONAL TO [electric charge density]

or with symbols:

$$\rho_m \propto \rho_e \qquad (2)$$

We may also express this charge–mass correspondence in terms of energy potentials or, to use another phrase, in terms of field potentials. For example, a positively charged body that is characterized by a positive charge density, ρ_e, would create a positive electric potential within itself. This elevated potential would create an electric potential field, $\varphi_e(r)$, that would appear as an electric potential hill having its maximum centered on the charged body and a magnitude that progressively declined with increasing radial distance r from that body. The parenthetical expression, (r), indicates that the field magnitude varies with distance r.

As noted in relation 2, a body having a positive electric charge density would produce a proportionate positive gravitational mass density, ρ_m, that would supplement its inherent natural mass density. This in turn would create a proportional negative gravity potential within the body supplementing its naturally produced negative gravity potential, which in turn would generate an extended gravity potential field $-\varphi_g(r)$. This gravity field would be configured as a gravity potential well centered on the charged body, its gravity potential progressively rising to more positive values with increasing radial distance r from that body.

In the case of a negative charge density, these field polarities would be reversed, resulting in an electric potential well centered on the body that in turn would produce a gravity potential hill. Note that when speaking of gravity fields, what we term a "positive mass" by convention is one that produces a matter-attracting gravity potential well. In the case of electric charge, on the other hand, by convention a positive charge would produce a positive electric potential hill.

The electrogravitic relations presented in (1) and (2) may be expressed in terms of field potentials as:

[gravity potential] IS PROPORTIONAL TO [negative electric potential]

or with symbols:

$$\varphi_g(r) \propto -\varphi_e(r). \tag{3}$$

Hence, an electric potential field gradient extending between the positive and negative plates of a capacitor would produce a proportional gravity potential field gradient of opposite sign across the capacitor's intervening dielectric; recall figure 1.5.

Also, Newton's second law tells us that a gravity potential field will generate a force on a body that is proportional to the magnitude of the field gradient multiplied by the body's inertial mass. This may be expressed mathematically by the equation:

where $\mathbf{F}_g(r)$ is the gravitational force acting on a body, G is the gravitational constant, m_o is the inertial mass of the affected body, and $\nabla\varphi_g(r)$ is the local gravity potential gradient that is sometimes alternatively symbolized as grad $\varphi_g(r)$. The bold type on the force and gradient symbols indicates that they are vector quantities having direction as well as magnitude. Basically this equation states that the steeper the gravity field gradient, the greater the produced force, as was mentioned earlier in connection with figure 1.7. Or, alternatively, the greater the magnitude of $\nabla\varphi_g(r)$, the greater the produced force.

The quantity $-G\nabla\varphi_g(r)$ in equation 4 is termed the gravitational acceleration and is sometimes symbolized as g(r). Thus equation 4 may be rewritten to yield the more condensed expression for gravitational force: $\mathbf{F}_g(r) = m_o\, g(r)$. Often the magnitude of a gravitational accelerating force is measured in terms of "g's," or multiples of Earth's gravitational acceleration pulling us toward Earth, which at Earth's surface has a value of about 980 cm/s^2. This should not be confused with the inertial "g" symbol, which quantifies the magnitude of a mechanical accelerating force experienced by a jet pilot or rocket astronaut as inertial force resisting acceleration. Thus, an electrogravitic acceleration of 10 g's would signify a gravitational acceleration ten times that produced naturally at Earth's surface. Depending on the polarity and orientation of the applied electric field, this artificially induced gravitational acceleration may be engineered either to supplement or to counter that produced by Earth's field.

Equation 4 may be combined with proportionality relation 3 to express the gravitational force $\mathbf{F}_g$ acting on a body (or dielectric) in terms of the product of the inertial mass m_o of that body (or dielectric) and the voltage gradient, $\nabla\varphi_e(r)$, that spans it:

$$\mathbf{F}_g(r) = k\, m_o \nabla\varphi_e(r). \tag{5}$$

The constant k added in here is an experimentally determined electrogravitic proportionality constant that quantifies the charge-to-mass coupling relationship. Hopefully, future experimentation will provide a value for this constant. Equation 5, then, mathematically expresses the electrical induction of a gravitational force.

1.4 ■ ELECTROGRAVITIC MOTORS

In his 1928 British patent, Brown also introduced his invention of a gravitator motor. This involved a series of gravitator cells arranged in a circle (figure 1.8). By ensuring that the cells were spaced sufficiently far apart from one another and that the spacing medium was less dense than the dielectric medium within each cell, the cells would collectively generate unbalanced forces and hence produce rotation. He noted that this motor may either be "independently excited," that is, run by an external source of electric power, or be "self-excited," that is, energized from electric power that it generates itself.

A later version of his gravitator motor was described in U.S. patent 1,974,483, filed in February 1930 and which was issued to Brown in September 1934. This used a rotor made from alternating sectors of marble and varnished wood, separated by copper-plate electrodes across which a high-voltage charge was applied (see figure 1.9). In another variation, he used alternating sectors of lead oxide and paraffin wax; essentially he alternated a high-density dielectric with a low-density dielectric.

In his 1928 patent, where he discussed the possibility of powering his motor from electric power that the motor itself would produce, he pointed out that the electric power output generated by the motor could far exceed the electric input needed to run it. He stated:

> Here it will be understood that the energy created by the operation of the motor may at times be vastly in excess of the energy required to operate the motor. In some instances the ratio may be even as high as a million to one. . . . In said self-excited motors the energy necessary to overcome the friction or other resistance in the physical structure of the apparatus, and even to accelerate the motors against such resistance is believed to be derived solely from the gravitational field or the energy of gravitation.[14]

In effect, Brown boldly states that his motor is a perpetuum mobile. There is a question as to whether he was overstating this motor's over-unity capability, for he makes no reference to experimental data. Also, there is no evidence of anyone having reproduced this design and having obtained such high electrical or mechanical outputs. Nevertheless, such a blatant violation of the first law of thermodynamics in principle is possible in cases in which a gravitational field is made to follow a circular path, as in Brown's gravitator motor. That is, because the gravitators mounted on the wheel's periphery would generate a circumferentially oriented gravity field and carry this field along as the wheel turns, regardless of the wheel's position, the induced gravity field would always cause further rotation. In effect, the wheel would rotate in a state of circular free fall. Just as a mass is able to fall forever in an infinitely deep pit, so too would this rotor be able to turn indefinitely without reaching the end of its potential energy supply. All the while, power could be extracted from the wheel's shaft at no cost, save that needed to power the gravitators.

Such vortical gravity fields are rarely observed in nature, because Earth's field is for the most part directed radially with respect to Earth's center. However, there may be marginal exceptions to this rule, as is the case in the vicinity of Argostoli Bay, on the island of Cephalonia, located off the northwest coast of Greece. Several kilometers northwest of the coastal town of Argostoli, there is a place where water from the bay flows inland, runs downhill from sea level, and, after a few hundred meters, disappears into a fissure in the rock. To find where this water goes, Austrian geologists added 350 pounds of a tracer dye to this inflow and, using sensitive equipment, two weeks later detected this same dye on the other side of the island fourteen kilometers to the east in a spring issuing from a subterranean cavern. Curiously, the water in this cavern is situated several meters above sea level and eventually flows downhill, emptying back into the bay. Thus, the water makes a complete circle! One hundred years ago, local residents fashioned a channel for this inflowing water and built a waterwheel to harness its energy to produce electric power (see figure 1.10).

What causes water on the western side of this bay to flow downhill, below sea level, and then flow uphill toward the eastern side, returning once again to the bay? Some have suggested that geothermal, subterranean hydrostatic pressures may be responsible for siphoning the water upward. Because of the existence of several other unusual phenomena in the region, the Greek physicist Panagiotis Pappas believes that a gravitational field anomaly may instead be responsible. For one thing, the water flow in Argostoli Bay changes its direction about every quarter of an hour. This is most easily seen from the vantage point of the one-kilometer-long bridge that spans the shallow southern end of the bay. There, one can see water flowing briskly under the bridge and passing through its arches at speeds of up to one meter per second, but after some minutes it slows to a stop, reverses, and begins to pick up speed in the opposite direction. This effect is not at all related to lunar tides, which occur on a much longer, twelve-hour cycle.

Across the bay from Argostoli, near the village of Loukouri, lies a huge boulder that for many years was observed to very slowly sway back and forth. Because of its motion it came to be called Kounopetra, meaning "rocking rock." If a sheet of paper was placed under one end of this rock, some time later we would find that the sheet was caught under the rock and could not be removed. Later still, however, the rock's center of gravity would shift and once again the paper could be removed. Perhaps the boulder's slow rocking, the gradual change in water-flow direction in the adjoining bay, and the gravitational anomaly responsible for propelling the subterranean flow of seawater uphill to its spring outlet all arise from the same cause—a vortical instability in the local gravitational field that causes motion tangential to Earth's surface. If so, the waterwheel at Argostoli may have been the first gravitational perpetual-motion machine built in modern times.

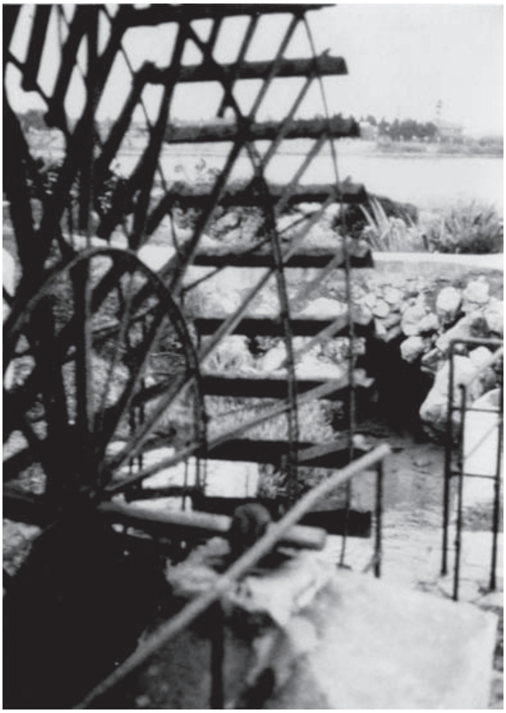

Figure 1.10. Waterwheel on Cephalonia Island built over a sluiceway to generate electricity from inflowing water. The water level drops about 2 meters below sea level by the time it reaches the waterwheel and thereafter drops several more meters before entering a fissure. (Photo by the author)

1.5 ■ BROWN'S GRAVITO-ELECTRIC DISCOVERIES

Brown kept a sharp eye on the daily operation of his electrogravitic motor. In the course of his studies, he found that the rate of rotation of his motor was not constant; it varied depending on the time of day. Further observation revealed that its torque rose and fell according to the lunar and solar cycles. A diurnal sidereal cycle was also present in which the gravitic torque changed as a result of the Earth's rotation relative to a fixed point in space lying in the general direction of the galactic center. He observed similar cyclic influences in his gravitator pendulum experiments in which the total duration of the pendulum's developed impulse was seen to vary with cosmic conditions, such as the pendulum's alignment with the sun and moon at times of conjunction or opposition. Ruling out factors such as changes in temperature and supplied voltage, he concluded that the impulse was governed solely by the condition of the ambient gravity field potential. He found that any number of different kinds of gravitators, operating simultaneously at very different voltages, revealed the same impulse duration at any given instant and underwent equal variations over extended periods of time. The cause of these variations greatly intrigued him and became a focus of his gravity research throughout his life.

In 1930, Brown left Swazey Observatory and began working at the Naval Research Laboratory in Washington, D.C., as a specialist in radiation, field physics, and spectroscopy. From 1931 to 1933, the Naval Research Laboratory placed him in charge of a project whose stated purpose was to investigate certain unusual "electric" effects found in fluids and in massive high-K dielectrics. Brown found that such massive high-K dielectrics exhibited the strongest electrogravitic coupling. Again, he found that the magnitude of the electrogravitic thrust varied with the time of day.

Explaining the Dielectric Constant, K

Often the permittivity of a dielectric is expressed in terms of the dielectric constant K of the material, which is the ratio of its permittivity to the permittivity of empty space, $\varepsilon_o = 8.85 \times 10^{-12}$ farads per meter: that is, $K = \varepsilon/\varepsilon_o$. So if two capacitors are compared, one having a dielectric between its electrodes with a tenfold-higher K value, and if both capacitors are charged to the same voltage, the capacitor with the higher K dielectric will be able to store ten times as much electric charge. K values can range from near unity, such as the value for air, to more than 20,000 for certain ceramic compounds. When Brown was conducting his first tests, he used lead monoxide as a dielectric for one of his gravitators, which has a K of 26. Some ceramic compounds, such as barium titanate, not only can have a very high dielectric constant, ranging from 2,000 to 10,000 K, but they also happen to be quite heavy. More recently, a ceramic compound called barium zirconium titanate (also known as BZT), which also is quite massive, has been found to have a dielectric constant of 23,000.

Brown constructed expensive recording instruments, some of which resembled the electrostatically energized multisegmented rotor he had developed in the 1920s but which used massive dielectrics with much higher K values. He called these sidereal electrometers. For several years, he took continuous readings with them under carefully controlled conditions, keeping voltage and temperature constant and shielding his units from magnetic and electrostatic fields in the environment. His sidereal electrometer rotor was typically 12 inches in diameter and was suspended from its center by a thin wire that allowed it to rotate under torque in a horizontal orientation. A sequencer applied 11,000 volts for thirty seconds across the rotor segments, causing the rotor to turn by several degrees. The power was then shut off for three minutes to allow the rotor to return to its relaxed, untorqued position. The cycle would then repeat. The rotor's energized and relaxed angular positions were automatically recorded on a slowly advancing paper strip, and later the trends were statistically processed to check for possible cyclic correlations. In 1973, Brown wrote the following about his findings:

> There were pronounced correlations with mean solar time, sidereal time and lunar hour angle. This seemed to prove beyond a doubt that the thrust of the "gravitators" varied with time in a way that related to solar and lunar tides and a sidereal correlation of unknown origin. These automatic records, acquired in so many different locations over such a long period of time, appear to indicate that the electrogravitic coupling is subject to an extraterrestrial factor, possibly related to the universal gravitational potention or some other (as yet) unidentified cosmic variable.[15]

In addition, Brown's Naval Research Laboratory investigations unexpectedly revealed that the electric resistivities of certain high-density dielectrics also undergo cyclic changes correlated with solar and sidereal time. He devised a resistance-sensing device that was able to measure these changes. Unlike his sidereal electrometer, it had no moving parts. He made observations with these two types of detectors, both in Washington and at sea on the Navy-Princeton International Gravity Expedition to the West Indies conducted on board the U.S. submarine S-48. Interestingly, Admiral Hyman Rickover, who was then a lieutenant, served as the executive officer (second in command) for this expedition. Brown's laboratory findings were summarized in a study titled "Anomalous Behavior of Massive High-K Dielectrics," which, it seems, has yet to be declassified. A Freedom of Information Act request was made to the Naval Research Laboratory in May 1995 to retrieve a copy of this document. However, the response came back that the library had no record of it. Either they did not do a thorough search or it was relocated and its existence and whereabouts are presently classified.

The results of these gravito-electric measurements were so encouraging that in 1937 a decision was made to extend the investigation and to establish another naval field station some distance west of Washington. Measuring equipment was set up in a constant-temperature vault in the basement of Brown's home in Zanesville, with provisions made for automation of the data-recording process. These new measurements confirmed the Naval Research Laboratory findings. The field station was moved the next year to the University of Pennsylvania, in Philadelphia. The investigation was interrupted during World War II but was resumed again from 1944 to 1949 in California, at Laguna Beach and Los Angeles. The project was sponsored by the Townsend Brown Foundation, a scientific research organization established by Brown's parents in the mid-1920s.

In a letter he wrote in 1968 to the researcher Thomas Turman, Brown commented about the observed variations in electrogravitic force:

> There are a number of mysteries concerning the nature of the [electrogravitic] force, largely the variations which it undergoes. There appear to be at least three semi-diurnal cycles:

> 1) relating to mean solar time (with maxima at 4 AM and 4 PM)
> 2) relating to lunar hour angle with maxima approximately 2 hours after the upper and lower meridian transit of the moon, and
> 3) relating to sidereal time with a sharp peak at 16h S.T. [Greenwich sidereal time] and a minor maximum at 4h S.T. The reasons for these variations as well as the reasons for the almost continuous secular variations [are] completely unknown.[16]

At sixteen hours Greenwich sidereal time, the western end of the Scorpius constellation was reaching its zenith, a sky position lying within 25 degrees of the galactic center. Consequently, Brown theorized that the sidereal effect he was observing was due to some kind of radiation emanating from the center of our galaxy. He concluded that these "sidereal rays" were not electromagnetic in nature and did not resemble cosmic rays. They had no known ionizing power, were not disturbed by Earth's magnetic field, and were highly penetrating. He eventually came to feel that they must be high-frequency gravitational waves.

Brown resumed his sidereal measurements in 1970 from an isolated site on Catalina, an island situated off the coast of Southern California. Around this time, he discovered a new correlated effect. He found that certain materials, including massive high-K ceramic dielectrics, certain kinds of resistors, complex silicates, and natural igneous rocks and clays, spontaneously generate DC electric potentials, with some materials producing as much as 0.7 volt. Moreover, he found that this generated DC potential varied from hour to hour and from day to day in much the same way as the resistance variations he had observed in the Naval Research Laboratory experiments.[17] In a paper about his findings, he commented:

> It has been found that certain basaltic and granitic rocks exhibit a self-potential which undergoes large cyclic variation not related to temperature, pressure, humidity or other local variables. Long-time monitoring has revealed periods of the year when the self-potential correlates consistently with sidereal time, reaching maximum and minimum values vectoring on the Galactic center (17h 43m RA). At other times, solar cycles predominate and [the] sidereal component disappears. Even so, a circadian pattern nearly always exists which cannot be correlated with ambient laboratory conditions. Hence, it is of interest not so much that a self-potential exists, but that it varies with a cosmic pattern.[18]

Brown's discovery that these variations were registered on two different kinds of detectors helped to support his hypothesis that the sidereal effect was due to an energy flux, as opposed to simply a potential gradient. Whatever it was, this phenomenon apparently had the ability to input electric energy into certain dielectric materials, substances that he named petrovoltaics. Because his measurements indicated that this flux could penetrate even to subterranean vaults, he concluded that it might be reasonably identified with high-frequency gravity wave radiation. He found that, in addition to their DC voltage, petrovoltaics also generate alternating current (AC) electric noise, spanning a broad radio frequency band. He theorized that this AC component may arise from cosmic gravity waves that constantly pass through the substance and impart some of their energy to it. He speculated that the rock might act as a rectifier, converting a portion of these energy fluctuations into DC potential.

If electric energy is spontaneously generated in petrovoltaics, it is reasonable to expect that they would also be evolving heat. In fact, in the 1920s, the American inventor and industrialist Charles Brush took measurements on petrovoltaics and demonstrated that they spontaneously gave off heat even though they were not radioactive.[19] He reported his findings in a Physical Review paper titled "Retardation of Gravitational Acceleration and the Spontaneous Evolution of Heat in Complex Silicates, Lavas, and Clays." His calorimetric results were subsequently confirmed by Dr. Elmer Harrington, of the National Bureau of Standards.[20] Probably because it was not well understood, the phenomenon received little attention from the scientific community. If such heat evolution indeed exists, it is reasonable to speculate that a substantial portion of the geothermal flux originating from the Earth's crust arises in this fashion.

In 1974, Brown set up his automated recording equipment at the Haleakala Observatory on Maui for high-altitude observations (10,000 feet), and in 1975 he moved his laboratory to an underground vault at the University of Hawaii in Honolulu. Later, he also took measurements at the bottom of a 300-foot mine shaft in Berkeley, California. His collection of measuring instruments now included a sidereal electrometer, a dielectric resistance sensor, a petrovoltaic self-potential detector, and a "K-wave" detector. All the instruments registered variations that showed sidereal correlations. In this way, he established that this sidereal phenomenon influenced electrogravitic coupling in a bidirectional fashion. It affected both the electrogravitic conversion of electrostatic potential into gravitational force and the gravito-electric conversion of gravitational wave energy into electric power.

Brown's K-wave detector could measure very small changes in a capacitor's dielectric constant, thereby monitoring small changes in the local electric permittivity of space—the ability of space to store electric charge. A capacitor's electric permittivity—ε—is equal to its dielectric constant K times ε_0, the electric permittivity of matter-free space, that is, $\varepsilon = K\varepsilon_0$. The K-wave detector registered changes believed to be caused by slight variations in ε_0. Brown felt that long-term changes in ε_0 could account for historical variations in the measured value of the speed of light.

The circuits Brown used for the K-wave detector and the dielectric resistance detector are shown in figure 1.12. Another version of his K-wave detector used a spent nickel-cadmium battery cell in place of a high-K capacitor. Figure 1.13 presents portions of a nine-day strip chart recording the voltage (in millivolts) spontaneously generated by a piece of Koolau basalt in August 1978.[21] The voltage varied cyclically with time of day and reached a maximum at times when the galactic center reached the zenith. He also found that detectors separated by distances of up to eighty kilometers occasionally registered concurrent events, or "bursts," indicating that they had been triggered by a common external source.[22]

1.6 ▪ THE PHILADELPHIA EXPERIMENT

Another interesting episode in Brown's career that should be mentioned, but for which documentation is very sparse and contradictory, concerns his work with the Navy on the Philadelphia Experiment. This was a highly classified research project reportedly conducted in the Philadelphia Navy Yard in October 1943 whose alleged objective was to render a naval vessel invisible both to radar and to the naked eye.

The list of scientists said to have worked on the project includes Albert Einstein, Vannevar Bush, John von Neumann, and Nikola Tesla. Before describing this further, it is worth reviewing what Brown was doing in the years leading up to the project.

Early in 1933, while working at the Naval Research Laboratory in Washington, D.C., Brown was given temporary leave to serve as a physicist on a geophysical expedition to the Caribbean sponsored by the Smithsonian Institute and financed by businessman Eldridge Johnson, cofounder of the Victor Talking Machine Company, which was the forerunner of RCA.[23] The Johnson-Smithsonian Expedition, which was conducted on board Johnson's immense yacht the Caroline, involved mapping the locations of underwater rifts.

However, there was much more to this expedition than just science. While on this cruise, Brown had the opportunity to meet Johnson and several of his associates, who included his wealthy business partner Leon Douglass and the British master spy William S. Stephenson, who, years later during World War II, earned the title "the man called Intrepid." In his Internet-published biography about Brown, Paul Schatzkin states that he learned from one of Brown's former close acquaintances that Johnson and Douglass were members of Stephenson's international intelligence network and that while on board the Caroline, Brown himself became recruited into its ranks.[24] Schatzkin dubbed this network the Caroline Group and said that it was to play a significant role in the course of Brown's life. Much of Schatzkin's inside information came from an individual he code-named Morgan, who at that time held a high-ranking position in one of the U.S. intelligence agencies and in earlier years had worked closely with Brown.

In the years that followed, Brown held a number of jobs. One particularly worth mentioning is his assignment in 1938 to serve as an assistant engineering officer on the maiden voyage of the USS Nashville. On its return trip from Europe, this ship ferried across the Atlantic $50 million in gold bullion that was being transferred from the Bank of England to the Chase Manhattan Bank in New York. While Brown was on that voyage, an electrogravitic research laboratory was established for him at the University of Pennsylvania. Schatzkin wrote that Johnson was involved in the construction of this laboratory, whose operation was funded from part of the money that the Nashville was transferring.[25]

In 1939, Brown left the University of Pennsylvania to work as a material and process engineer with the Glenn Martin Company in Baltimore, an early forerunner of the Lockheed Martin aerospace corporation. Shortly afterward, in 1940, the Navy called on him to head up a "mine sweeping research and development project" under the Bureau of Ships in Washington, D.C. William Moore wrote that Brown directed a staff of fifteen Ph.D.'s and was allotted a research budget of nearly $50 million for the project.[26] One might suspect that the funding money came from the very same stash that had been transferred to the Chase Manhattan two years earlier. This was a significant sum of money, about 5 percent of the U.S. Navy's 1940 budget! We are left to speculate whether the Caroline Group was somehow involved.

Whatever the case, this project must have been very important, and one wonders whether it was dealing with just “mine sweeping.”

Following the attack on Pearl Harbor and the beginning of America’s direct involvement in World War II, Brown was assigned to the Naval Operating Base in Norfolk, Virginia, as officer in charge of the Atlantic Fleet Radar Materiel School and Gyro-Compass School. In the summer of 1942, he was assigned to return to Philadelphia to disassemble the scientific equipment kept at his laboratory at the University of Pennsylvania and ship it to Norfolk. He continued his work there, at the Atlantic Fleet Radar School, until retiring from the Navy near the end of 1943.

From a brief entry Brown made in one of his autobiographies, we find that after his assignment to the Bureau of Ships in Washington, D.C., and before his assignment to the Atlantic Fleet Radar School, he was assigned to the Philadelphia Navy Yard as an assistant machinery superintendent for “outfitting new ships.” In the autobiography, Brown wrote:

> My activities during the war were largely as follows:
> 1. Acoustic and Magnetic Mine Sweeping (Officer-in-Charge) Bureau of Ships, Washington, D.C.
> 2. Assistant Machinery Superintendent (outfitting new ships) Philadelphia Navy Yard
> 3. Naval Research Laboratory–Radar Refresher
> 4. Atlantic Fleet Radar School (Commanding Officer) Naval Operating Base, Norfolk, VA. Advanced teaching and writing of textbooks, Officer and Librarian.[27]

Curiously, the navy yard assignment as well as his “radar refresher” assignment at the Naval Research Laboratory in Washington are omitted in other biographies of Brown. His autobiography does not give dates for these assignments. However, his biography in Who’s Who in American Science lists him as finishing his work at the Bureau of Ships in 1941.[28] Also, Moore’s article lists Brown as beginning his work at the radar school shortly after the December 1941 bombing of Pearl Harbor, hence in 1942.[29] His assignment to the Philadelphia Navy Yard, then, would likely have been sometime during 1941. This would have placed him in the very location where the USS Eldridge DE 173 destroyer escort is said to have been outfitted in preparation for the Philadelphia Experiment and where the invisibility experiment was alleged to have been conducted in October 1943. Considering Brown's technical caliber as a research scientist, without further information one is left to wonder whether the nautical machinery that he was in charge of outfitting at the Philadelphia Navy Yard might have been equipment for a research experiment to be conducted aboard a ship, lending credence to claims that he had worked on the Philadelphia Experiment.

Later in his life, Brown was privately asked by family friend and business associate Josh Reynolds about his involvement in the Philadelphia Experiment. Brown answered that he "was not permitted to talk about that part of his work"; however, he did comment that "much of what has been written about the project is grossly exaggerated."[30] Here, he was probably referring to claims some have made that the ship had been made to travel through time or that it had teleported itself to Norfolk Harbor, where it was alleged to have reappeared for a few minutes before disappearing and reappearing once again in the Philadelphia Navy Yard. Yet the fact that he did not flatly deny his involvement in the project leads one to suspect that the rumors of his involvement are true.

Moore, coauthor of the book The Philadelphia Experiment, once asked Brown to edit a rough draft of an article he was writing on Brown's life. Moore had planted a paragraph describing a series of experiments, sponsored by the Navy, that were based on the effects and equipment later associated with the Philadelphia Experiment. He had done this intentionally to see Brown's reaction. Although Brown made other corrections and notes for changes to the manuscript, he allowed the entire test paragraph on the Philadelphia Experiment to remain intact. Thus, we are left to conjecture that tales of the existence of this project may be true and that Brown had somehow been involved in this project, although what his involvement was is open to speculation.

In their book The Philadelphia Experiment, Moore and Charles Berlitz cite letters attributed to a former sailor, Carlos Allende (a.k.a. Carl Allen), that suggest that the USS Eldridge was made invisible on October 28, 1943, when it enveloped itself in a very strong magnetic field.[31] They said a large amount of electric power from onboard generators was used to resonantly excite large degaussing coils that were wrapped around the inside of the ship's steel hull. The resonant excitation would have set up a pulsating magnetic field, turning the ship into a giant electromagnet. This intense field was said to make the ship invisible both to radar and by sight!

According to Allende, the crew of the ship experienced physical and mental side effects so horrendous that the project was immediately terminated. He alleged that most of the crew were found to be violently sick after the field had been shut off, some were missing, and some had gone crazy. Most unusual, five men were found fused to the metal of the ship's structure, some crew members being stuck in steel bulkheads, others within the ship's deck, and another with the ship's railing stuck through his body. Allende also claimed that for a period of time, ranging from minutes to, in some cases, months, men would spontaneously become invisible and unable to move, speak, or interact with other people. Such people were said to have become “caught in the Flow” or “stuck in a freeze.” Depending on the duration of the mishap, recovered victims were said to be left with symptoms ranging from psychological trauma to insanity. Allende maintained that those who lived were discharged from the Navy as “mentally unfit” for duty regardless of their condition.

Although it is difficult to sort out fact from fiction when trying to understand what had been done in the Philadelphia Experiment, laboratory research has shown that a metal object can be made radar invisible by high-intensity magnetic fields. At the 1994 Tesla Symposium in Colorado Springs, K. Corum, J. Corum, and J. Daum described an experiment in which they wound a high-amperage coil around a 2-inch-thick, 14-inch-diameter steel torus.[32] They found that when the coil was electrified with a sudden surge of current of several thousand amps or more discharged from a large high-voltage capacitor, the high-gauss magnetic field produced around the torus caused a fivefold reduction in radar reflection from the steel core. Some term this the Corum-Daum effect. The production of optical invisibility, however, has yet to be reported by scientists working outside of the classified world.

Electromagnetic wave experiments conducted by the independent researcher John Hutchison lend some credibility to the report that sailors had been found fused with the vessel's metal structure. Beginning in 1979, Hutchison experimented with high-voltage, high-frequency longitudinal wave emissions similar to those Tesla was producing. Employing a Van de Graaff generator and two or more Tesla coils, he was able to create wave interference zones in which a number of strange phenomena were observed. These included the fusion of dissimilar materials such as wood and metal, cold liquefaction or fragmentation of metal, invisibility, and levitation. Examples of metal splitting and fusion of dissimilar materials are shown in figures 1.14 and 1.15. In the fusion phenomenon, the substances do not dissociate; they retain their individual compositions. A piece of wood, for example, could sink into a metal bar with neither the wood nor the bar coming apart.

Interestingly, Brown's work on magnetic minesweeping would have made him a prime candidate for work on this version of the Philadelphia Experiment. In his autobiography, he describes how he had developed a new technique for blowing up magnetic mines—submerged explosive devices that are triggered when a steel-hulled vessel passes over them. A detector in a mine senses the temporary alteration in the Earth's magnetic field intensity produced by the steel hull and detonates the mine's explosive. Brown had devised a method of exploding these mines by floating a loop of degaussing cable on the water's surface and passing 300 amperes of current through it, producing a magnetic field that triggered the mines to explode. The cable, which typically measured 3.5 inches in diameter, could easily carry a current of several hundred thousand amperes or more. Such a cable would have been ideal to generate an extremely high-intensity magnetic field around a ship. If so, Brown's work in Washington at the Bureau of Ships and later at the Philadelphia Navy Yard may have involved more than just research on magnetic minesweeping. The $50 million research project he was heading, which involved a team of fifteen Ph.D.'s and reportedly had occasional input from Einstein himself, was most likely directly connected with the fabled Philadelphia Experiment.

Another, very different, account of the story, presented by Gerry Vassilatos in his book Lost Science, claims that the cloaking effect was instead brought about by enveloping the ship in a very intense pulsing electrostatic field and makes no mention of magnetic fields.[33] Vassilatos's account is not as documented as Moore's, as he gives no indication of what sources he used for the rather detailed information he gives. One is left with the impression that portions of his story have been improvised. Vassilatos writes that the invisibility effect was first serendipitously noticed at a classified military arc-welding facility that had developed a new spot-welding technique for fabricating very durable armor-plated vessel hulls. The process employed a very intense, high-amperage discharge supplied from an immense bank of high-voltage capacitors. When the titanic, lightning-like discharge was applied to the hull, the resulting shock wave reportedly rocked the entire welding facility. Vassilatos writes that during the discharge, an optical blackout region was seen around the arc, and tools left in the vicinity of the discharge were displaced or found to have vanished. Scientists from the Naval Research Laboratory who were called in to investigate determined that the blackout was not a neural retinal bleaching phenomenon and that the tool disappearance was not due to thermal vaporization. Something far more exotic was going on. They eventually concluded that the momentary buildup of high electric field potentials in the vicinity of the arc in some unexplained manner induced a state of invisibility and even caused local dematerialization of objects. The project was code-named Project Rainbow, and Vassilatos says that at one point Brown was brought in to consult on the project.

Vassilatos writes that after conducting a series of further experiments, researchers devised an experiment that attempted to render an armored tank invisible. Capacitors of very large capacitance were arranged in a ring, and the tank was placed at the ring's center. The capacitors were oriented so that their plates were parallel to the circle's circumference, that is, with their polarization axes directed toward the circle's center. They were synchronously energized with high-voltage, high-amperage pulses conducted in phase along a spokelike array of cables extending from the center of the ring out to each capacitor. In this way, the capacitors acting together were able to build up a very high electric field potential, presumably with a negative potential in the ring's interior. Tesla had done years of research with high-voltage shock discharges, which could explain why he was allegedly called in to consult on the project.

According to Vassilatos, as a next step they scaled up the cloaking experiment to attempt to make an entire ship invisible. He says that they sought to control the effect by adjusting the electric field's intensity to a moderate level so that a state of invisibility might be produced without inducing complete dematerialization. He claims that Brown bowed out of the project prior to the test on the Eldridge, which reportedly ended in tragedy.

While the Navy claims that the story of the Philadelphia Experiment is entirely myth, Brown's hesitation to speak about the subject suggests that something very important and highly classified was going on in Philadelphia during his wartime service. One's suspicions are piqued about the significance of the whole affair because of the tremendous amount of disinformation that has apparently been circulated to purposefully cause confusion. Conflicts emerge even in Brown's own biographical records spanning this period. It is as if these years of Brown's life are shroudeded in a blurry haze. Conflicting accounts give the impression of there being two Townsend Browns, one account placing him at the naval base in Norfolk, Virginia, during 1942 and 1943, the other account having him working at Lockheed Vega Aircraft in Burbank, California, during this same period. This duplicity leaves us asking whether it had been Brown and not the Eldridge that had been teleported in space and time during that mysterious 1943 experiment.

According to the version that Moore published in 1978, Brown retired from the Navy in December 1943 after having suffered a nervous collapse.[34] He says that Brown subsequently took six months off to recover at his home following the recommendation of a team of naval physicians.

He began employment in June 1944 at the Advanced Projects Unit of Lockheed Vega Aircraft in Burbank. This was the forerunner of Lockheed's modern Skunk Works. We are led to believe that Moore's account should be accurate, because prior to its publication he gave Brown the opportunity to check over the draft of his article to make any necessary corrections. The Lockheed Vega employment date that Moore gives is consistent with that listed in the Who's Who biography published after Brown's death, which states that Brown was employed at Lockheed Vega as a radar consultant from 1944 to 1945.[35]

A. L. Kitselman, a mathematician who worked at this Lockheed facility, met Brown there and became his longtime friend. In an essay he wrote in 1962, Kitselman describes Brown as "a quiet, modest, retiring man—exactly the sort one expects to find in important research installations. He was a brilliant solver of engineering problems, and I soon found that he was more familiar with fundamental physical laws than anyone I had met. So many of us are strictly textbook scientists that it is stimulating to find someone who has first-hand knowledge."[36]

In this essay, Kitselman comments that Brown had previously suffered a collapse after working too long and too hard at the Norfolk radar school, was subsequently retired from the Navy, and then, after a six-month rest at home, came to work at Lockheed Vega. Hence Kitselman's account corroborates portions of Moore's story.

According to this timeline, Brown would have been working for the Navy during the critical period when the Philadelphia Experiment was conducted and would have had his nervous collapse around the time of the disastrous failure of this invisibility experiment. In fact, in their book The Philadelphia Experiment, Moore and Berlitz quote Riley Crabb, founder of Borderland Sciences Research Foundation, as saying that the cause of Brown's breakdown was directly related to the Philadelphia Experiment. Crabb noted that if such a disaster had happened to the crew of the ship, it is not too difficult to imagine the mental pressures that those in charge would have experienced.

Schatzkin has come to entirely different conclusions about Brown's whereabouts during this key period. At Morgan's suggestion, he obtained from the Navy a copy of Brown's resignation letter, which is dated September 30, 1942, and which states, "I herewith submit my resignation from the Navy for the good of the naval service in order to escape trial by General Court Martial."[37] If we are to believe this date, this was to have occurred just two months after Brown had shipped his equipment from the University of Pennsylvania to Norfolk.

Schatzkin also obtained an official copy of Brown's Navy fitness report dated October 5, 1942. Describing this report, he wrote:

> The final fitness report is almost completely blank. Instead of the usual details, the page is struck through with a single pen-stroke, above which is hand-written "See remarks." And on the second page, in the "remarks" section that in previous reports had displayed so many glowing assessments of Lieutenant Brown's character and service, Captain Hinkamp writes, "In view of the circumstances under which this officer was detached, I desire to make no comment."[38]

We know something is amiss in the Navy's records because they contain no reference to Brown's assignment in 1942 to the Atlantic Fleet radar schools in Norfolk. However, trusting that the naval records or Brown's discharge papers had not been altered by covert operatives in the interest of protecting any top-secret naval research projects from exposure, Schatzkin accepted October 5, 1942, as the date of Brown's detachment. He then suggested that within two weeks of the date Brown left the Navy, he began working at Lockheed Vega. Schatzkin proposed that Brown had neither a nervous collapse following his discharge nor a subsequent six-month recuperation period. Schatzkin's version of Brown's history then conflicts with both that given by Moore and that given by Kitselman, both of whose accounts he maintains are seriously flawed. The suggestion that Kitselman's account might be flawed, however, comes as somewhat of a surprise, seeing as he was one of Brown's close friends. In writing his essay, he should have had easy access to input from Brown as well as an interest to ensure that he got his facts straight about Brown's departure from the Navy. Also, Brown himself had checked over Moore's story prior to its publication, so if there was such a major error as the date and circumstances of his departure from the Navy, why did Brown not catch it? Considering that there is no record of Brown having expressed any doubts about the accuracy of Moore's or Kitselman's account, one is surprised by the allegation that they were in error.

Furthermore, there is the inconsistency of the date when Brown began working at Lockheed Vega. Schatzkin places his arrival at the end of October 1942, while Moore states the arrival date was more than one and a half years later, in June 1944—a start date that is also corroborated by the account given in the Who's Who biography. So which version is correct, the revised timeline based on Navy records or the preexisting biographic timeline that was developed with Brown's full knowledge? Unfortunately, Brown is no longer around to comment, having passed away in 1985.

To support his argument for Brown's early departure, Schatzkin cites a Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) report that claims to have been filed in March 1943. This report states that by that date, Brown had resigned from the Navy and returned to his home in Los Angeles, as told by an anonymous informant (name blacked out). But should this anonymous informant be relied upon? Schatzkin himself admits that much of the information the report provides about Brown is inaccurate and contradictory. The filing date given on the report appears to be among the fabrications. The report states, “He [Brown] had his own laboratory and had purchased equipment from his own funds for use in his experimental work, and this equipment was taken by Subject when he was detached from the Fleet Service School.” This equipment included gravito-electric sensor equipment, which was among the apparatus that had earlier been transported from Brown’s University of Pennsylvania laboratory to Norfolk. According to Schatzkin’s revised timeline, this equipment would have then been transported from Norfolk to Los Angeles around October 1942, when he claims that Brown was discharged.

However, the revised timeline does not jibe well with Brown’s account of the dates and locations at which he was conducting gravito-electric measurements. In his March 1975 paper titled “Anomalous Diurnal and Secular Variations in the Self-Potential of Certain Rocks,” Brown discusses dates and locations at which he conducted gravito-electric measurements, mentioning his work at the Naval Research Laboratory (1931–1933) and his research at the University of Pennsylvania (1939). Then he writes, “The investigation was interrupted by World War II but was resumed in 1944 in California by the Townsend Brown Foundation (an Ohio non-profit corporation) and was carried forward in two locations in especially constructed shielded rooms at constant temperature.”[39]

If we accept the traditional timeline in which Brown is discharged from the Navy in December 1943 and transports his equipment to California around that same time, then his stated 1944 date for resuming his gravito-electric measurements in California makes sense. This implies that he wasted no time in setting up his equipment to start collecting data once again. On the other hand, if we accept the Navy-FBI timeline that has Brown being discharged in October 1942, we would have to conclude that he shipped his equipment to California at the end of 1942 and left it sitting boxed up for more than a year before setting it up. However, it seems unlikely that Brown would have tolerated having his detectors “off the air” for such a long time period. Could it be that the FBI report was actually filed in 1944 and its date was at some later point changed to 1943 in an effort to rewrite Brown's official history?

To support his 1942 date for Brown's Navy discharge, Schatzkin refers to a bound laboratory notebook that he believes Brown had used while at Lockheed Vega.[40] The ledger's notes are written in Brown's handwriting and contain occasional dates that also appear in Brown's handwriting, the oldest date near the beginning of the book being December 1, 1942, and the most recent date near the end of the book being May 2, 1944. The notebook's cover page is neatly hand printed and reads:*

T. T. Brown
Vega Aircraft Corp.
Burbank, Calif.
NOTES

We are left to consider the possibility that the notebook contains lecture notes that Brown began writing while teaching at the Atlantic Fleet schools in Norfolk. The last dated entry in the notebook would have been made after Brown had left the Navy and had moved to California, prior to going to work at Lockheed. He may have labeled the notebook as "Vega Aircraft Corp." because he wanted his notes with him at his new job, or he may have purposely mislabeled the notebook in this way so that naval intelligence would not squirrel it away in some classified storage room.

If we instead accept that Brown actually wrote these notes while he was at Lockheed Vega and that he began working there as early as October 1942, then we are confronted with the inconsistency of this date with those given in Brown's autobiographies and with the question of why his gravito-electric sensor equipment would supposedly have been stored unused for more than a year. Also, with this early-departure scenario, it is difficult to understand why Brown wished to resign from the Navy at the height of World War II, just nine months after Japan had bombed Pearl Harbor and at a time when his Navy career looked so promising. According to the FBI report, Brown was "reported to know more about Radar detection than any individual in the U.S. Navy." So why would the Navy let him go at such a crucial time of need? If, on the other hand, Brown's decision to leave the Navy arose as a result of a nervous breakdown brought about by the great weight of guilt he felt from being associated with a project that had suffered an immensely tragic outcome, as Moore and Vassilatos suggest, then his departure at the later date of December 1943 becomes more understandable. The Navy administrators who had knowledge of this classified project and who themselves shared the guilt of its outcome would have sympathized with Brown's wish for departure and released him from service, even knowing how indispensable he was.

*Information from photocopied sample pages sent to me courtesy of Paul Schatzkin. Being hand printed, it is more difficult to tell whether the cover page is also in Brown's handwriting; however, members of his family affirm that it is.

According to Schatzkin, "Starting in the fall of 1942 there is virtually no documentation available that might shed some light on just what Brown was doing during those crucial years."[41] He notes that the Brown family files are devoid of any correspondence or documentation from roughly that time until the end of World War II and that they have very little information about his activities at Lockheed Vega.

So considering the absence of information from both the Navy records and the Brown family files, we are left only to speculate. Had some military intelligence organization gone out of its way to ensure that any record of Brown's activities during this period was either erased or classified to keep a tight cover on Brown's wartime research activities? Despite its official denial, did the Navy conduct a highly secret project on ship invisibility and was Brown involved in it? Perhaps the adage "Where there's smoke, there's fire" applies here. One suspects that something very strange and clandestine was under way in the Philadelphia–D.C.–Norfolk area during the 1942 to 1943 time period.

In July 1946, the Eldridge was decommissioned and placed in the Reserve Fleet. In 1951, the United States transferred her to the Greek navy, in which she served as the HS Leon until the 1990s. One Greek engineering professor related that he formerly served on the Leon as a naval officer specializing in electrical engineering.[42] While on board, he noted several odd things about the ship. One was that he saw numerous remnants on the inside of its hull of heavy-duty cables that once ran along the length of the ship. These were in the form of insulated metal bars measuring 10 to 15 centimeters in width that had been cut in between their points of attachment to the hull. Other large-diameter cables were also present fully intact that were presumably part of the electric wiring for the ship's propulsion system. The Eldridge was a Cannon class electric drive ship, meaning that instead of having a shaft running from its engine directly to its propeller, as most ships do, it had a diesel-powered electrical generator whose power was conveyed through heavy-duty cables to a huge electric motor at the ship's stern that drove the propeller. The Eldridge's ability to produce large amounts of electric power with an onboard generator would have made it ideal to use in conducting the Philadelphia Experiment.

The other unusual thing that the professor noted was that one room adjacent to the ship's hull was barred from access, its hatch having been welded shut. The commanding officer had instructed the ship's crew that it was forbidden for anyone to try to enter the sealed room. What this forbidden zone hid will perhaps never be known, for the ship was decommissioned and sold as scrap sometime after 1992.

BEYOND ROCKET PROPULSION

2.1 BROWN’S ELECTRIFIED FLYING DISCS

During the years following World War II, Brown continued to improve his gravitator device in his spare time, financing his efforts through the Townsend Brown Foundation. By 1950 he had built a test apparatus to demonstrate the electrogravitic propulsion concept in a pair of disc airfoils. He set a 6-foot-long horizontal beam on a pivot so that it could rotate about its midpoint, and from each end of the beam he suspended two lightweight saucer discs by means of 7-foot-long tethers (figure

2.1). When the saucers were in flight, rotating tethers extended sideways and expanded the diameter of the flight course to as much as 20 feet. In one version, each disc was made of two curved aluminum shells, measuring 1.5 feet in diameter, fixed on either side of a 2-foot-diameter Plexiglas sheet (figure 2.2).[1] High-voltage power of up to 50,000 volts was supplied through feed wires to positively charge a fine outboard wire running along each disc's leading edge and to negatively charge the aluminum disc body. When electrified with approximately 50 watts of this high-tension power, the discs traveled around their 20-foot-diameter course at speeds of up to twelve miles per hour.[2,3]

The wire electrodes ionized the surrounding air, forming a cloud of positive ions around the leading wire and a cloud of negative ions around the disc body. Although ions would continuously leave these clouds as a result of being attracted to the oppositely charged electrodes, the electrodes would resupply ions at a sufficiently fast rate so as to maintain a positive-ion space charge at the front of the disc and a negative-ion space charge on the disc body (see figure 2.3).

As to how the disc generates its propulsive force, two possibilities present themselves. One is that the ion clouds it emits produce electrostatic fields that act on charges attached to the disc's leading-edge wire and to its main body, producing a net forward thrust. The other possibility is that an electrogravitic thrust may be present whereby the positive- and negative-ion clouds would create, respectively, a gravity potential well and a gravity potential hill in their vicinity. As new positive charges are continuously added to the cloud, they replace charges that leave the cloud through attraction to the disc's negative pole. As a result, the cloud will maintain a moderately deep gravity well at its bow through a kind of dynamic equilibrium. The same will hold for the disc's rearward negative charges. Despite the mobility of the individual negative ions, the negative-ion cloud as a whole will persist and create a net gravity hill. Consequently, the gravity potential gradient established across the disc's body between this hill and the well propells the disc forward in the direction of its positive-ion cloud.

By accumulating charges in the air in the form of fore and aft ion clouds, large quantities of charge may build up, comparable to the quantity of charge on the plates of a high-K dielectric capacitor. But because these charges are freshly created, there is little time for them to polarize the ambient air. Furthermore, due to the disc's forward motion, the air dielectric around the disc is continuously replaced by new, unpolarized air, and this also contributes to maintaining the air dielectric in a relatively unpolarized state. Consequently, the electric and gravity potential fields are able to extend between the oppositely charged fore and aft clouds unopposed by any electric dipole moment in the intervening air. Hence a substantial gravity field gradient could span the disc and exert a maximal forward thrust.

As the disc moves forward, its associated positive- and negative-ion clouds also move forward, transporting their generated electrostatic and gravity field gradients along with them. Consequently, each disc rides its advancing wave much like a surfer riding an ocean wave. Dr. Mason Rose, one of Townsend's colleagues, describes the disc's gravitic principle of operation:

> The saucers made by Brown have no propellers, no jets, no moving parts at all. They create a modification of the gravitational field around themselves, which is analogous to putting them on the incline of a hill. They act like a surfboard on a wave. . . . The electro-gravitational saucer creates its own "hill," which is a local distortion of the gravitational field, then it takes this "hill" with it in any chosen direction and at any rate.[4]

A full-scale version of Brown's vehicle was thought to be able to accelerate to thousands of miles per hour, change direction, or stop merely by altering the intensity, polarity, and direction of its electric charge. Because the wavelike distortion of the local gravitational field would pull with an equal force on all particles of matter, the ship, its occupants, and its load would all respond equally to these maneuvers. The occupants would feel no stress at all, no matter how sharp the turn or how great the acceleration. A turbo-jet airplane, by comparison, must produce a twentyfold increase in thrust just to attain a twofold gain in speed. Whereas jets and rockets attempt to combat the force of gravity through the application of opposed brute force, electrogravitics instead attempts to directly control gravity so that this longtime adversary is made to work for the craft rather than against it.

Partly with the help of his friend Kitselman, who was then teaching calculus in Pearl Harbor, Brown's discs came to the attention of Admiral Arthur Radford, commander in chief of the U.S. Pacific Fleet at the Pearl Harbor Navy Yard. In 1950, Brown was hired as a consulting physicist to stage a demonstration. Nothing immediately came of this. However, two years later, on March 21, 1952, Brown was visited at his Los Angeles laboratory by Vic Bertrandias, a well-connected Air Force major general. He dropped in unexpectedly, just when Brown was about to demonstrate his flying discs to a group of colleagues. Once there, Bertrandias demanded that he be included in the demonstration. Having formerly served as vice president of Douglas Aircraft, he was well informed on the state of the art in aviation technology and knew that Brown's discs could have important military applications. Shaken by what he saw, Bertrandias urgently telephoned Lieutenant General H. A. Craig the following morning to voice his concerns. An excerpt from a declassified transcript of their conversation reads as follows:

> Bertrandias: the thing frightened me—for the fact that it is being held or conducted by a private group. I was in there from about 1:30 until 5:00 in the afternoon and I saw these two models that fly and the thing has such a terrific impact that I thought we ought to find out something about it—who the people are and whether the thing is legitimate . . . if it ever gets away, I say it is in the stage in which the atomic development was in the early days.
> Craig: I see.
> Bertrandias: It was quite frightening. I made the inquiry whether the Air Force or the Navy knew anything about it and I was told—no. But I tell you, after hearing it and all the other things that I had heard, I was quite concerned about it. . . . I am of the opinion that if all I heard the other day—if it ever comes true, and somebody occupies space with that instrument, it is a bad deal for somebody.
> Craig: Well, we will look into it, Vic.

Craig subsequently initiated a background check on the Townsend Brown Foundation.

Bertrandias was also a close friend of General Albert Boyd, director of Air Force Systems Command at Wright Air Development Center. It was under Boyd that Air Force Systems Command carried out most of its early, super-secret research projects on antigravity propulsion.[5] Brown's work may have been encroaching into an area in which the Air Force had established a substantial lead.

Perhaps Brown sensed Bertrandias's fearful reaction and was concerned that he might initiate formal military classification of Brown's electrogravitic work, for just two weeks after Bertrandias's visit, Brown and his two associates, Mason Rose and Bradford Shank, held a press conference to publicize the fantastic possibilities of this electrogravitic propulsion technology. In this way, they got the word out before things got too hushed up. Reporters from the Los Angeles Times were invited to view Brown's flying discs in operation and had a chance to read a paper prepared by Rose that explained the Biefeld-Brown antigravity effect and how it could be used to propel a full-scale antigravity spacecraft. The next day the Times carried a story about Brown's discs and how flying saucers (also popularly known as UFOs, short for "unidentified or unconventional flying objects") might function on a similar principle.[6] It quoted Rose as saying that details about Brown's work had been given to some Navy admirals and that there was military interest, although no censorship had yet been imposed. Like the Air Force, the Navy had an active interest in advanced aviation technology.

About two months after the L.A. press conference, in June 1952, the Office of Naval Research (ONR) sent Will Cady to investigate a number of Brown's inventions, including his flying discs. The ONR data indicate that Cady witnessed a pair of 1.5-foot-diameter discs achieve a top speed of three miles per hour with a propulsion efficiency of 1.5 percent while drawing 15 watts of power at 47 kilovolts.[7] This was about one-fourth the speed and efficiency obtained with the 2-foot-diameter model. Did Brown stage this more modest performance with the intention to reveal just enough to get the military interested but not enough to make the demonstration so astounding that they might demand classification of his work? One alternative suggested by Paul Schatzkin is that there had been a security breach during Brown's Pearl Harbor demonstration and that Brown had been asked to purposely downplay the performance of his device in order to mislead foreign intelligence agents into thinking that his invention was not worth pursuing.[8]

Presumably, Cady was unable to see the discs perform at higher voltages because of the limitations of the power supply that Brown chose for the occasion. That is, the ONR data indicate that the output voltage progressively leveled off to 47 kilovolts as the control panel voltage dial was turned up to increasingly higher settings. This indicates that the 0.7 milliamp that the test rig was drawing was more current than the high-voltage power supply was designed to provide.* For his own research,

*The power supply's upper-limit current would be determined by the impedance of the secondary winding of its high-voltage transformer.

Brown probably used a transformer that had a slightly higher current rating, perhaps 2 milliamps. Cady conducted a test in which he removed one of the saucers from its carousel and suspended it from the ceiling to measure its static propelling thrust at various applied voltages. At 47 kilovolts, he observed that the discs delivered only 8 grams of thrust.

Cady concluded that the technology was impractical for aviation because the discs were propelled with an efficiency over an order of magnitude less than the efficiency of a jet engine. He had failed to realize that the trends in his own data showed that the speed and propulsion efficiency of the discs increased exponentially with increasing voltage and that he had been observing their behavior in a very unfavorable voltage range. A logarithmic plot of the ONR data (see figure 2.4) reveals that above 38 kilovolts, the velocity of the discs increased according to the 5.5 power of voltage and that their propulsion efficiency increased according to the 4.5 power of voltage.[9] These projections may be somewhat optimistic, as most of Brown's writings state that thrust increases according to the second or third power of voltage. Nevertheless, enormous speeds and efficiencies would undoubtedly have been attained at higher voltages.

Cady maintained that it was unnecessary to introduce exotic ideas such as electrically induced gravity fields because the behavior of the discs could be explained entirely in terms of the conventional ion-wind effect. That is, he believed that the discs obtained their thrust because ionized particles impacting the disc electrodes imparted more of their momentum in the forward direction than the reverse direction. On the contrary, although ion-wind forces would have been present, such forces would have been too small to account for the thrust. Furthermore, vacuum chamber tests that Brown later carried out on electrostatically charged rotors and saucers showed that thrust persisted even in the absence of ion discharge.

Cady also suggested that the discs may have been propelled forward by unbalanced electrostatic forces operating between the discharged ions and the disc that was discharging them. This is a more likely possibility than ion wind. For example, positive ions emitted by the leading wire electrode would move toward the negatively charged disc body, setting up a positive-ion space charge behind the wire and ahead of the disc (see figure 2.3). These charges would repel forward the positively charged wire and attract forward the negatively charged disc body. As the saucer's speed increases, the airflow would assist in displacing the positive ions behind the wire, thereby improving the forward propulsive force. Also, the positive-ion wind and the airflow passing the disc would blow the negative ions toward the rear of the disc, and as a result, their space charge would electrostatically repel forward the negatively charged rear wire and disc body. As a result, both the negative and positive ions would work together to create a forward thrust on the saucer.

Brown referred to a mass effect (gravitational force effect) operating in the electrokinetic movement of massive high-K dielectrics but did not similarly report a mass effect operating in the case of his electrokinetic disc experiments. Thus it is not clear how much of the thrust he was attributing to gravitic forces and how much to electrostatic forces. Nevertheless, his research colleagues did seem to think that a new electrogravitic principle was needed to account for the propulsion. In his 1952 write-up, Rose stated that "anyone wanting to understand electrogravitation and its application to astronautics must dismiss the principles of electromagnetics in order to grasp the essentially different principles of electrogravitation. . . . Electrogravitation must be understood as an entirely new field of scientific investigation and technical development."[10]

As we can see from entries he made in 1943 in one of his laboratory notebooks, Brown was exploring an "ether" theory interpretation of the electrogravitic phenomenon, one that has many similarities to subquantum kinetics. More will be said about this in chapter 4.

The ONR researcher's skeptical reaction was typical of individuals who were used to thinking in conventional scientific terms. In one of his articles on Brown, the journalist Gaston Burridge wrote that many scientists and engineers had watched the discs fly and most of them concluded that the discs were propelled by the well-known "electric wind" phenomenon and not by some new principle of physics. One engineer blurted out to him, "The whole thing is so screwball I don't want to even talk about it!" Other engineers reportedly objected to the lack of mathematical substantiation. Burridge explained, "To engineers and scientists one equation is worth a thousand words!" But even an equation is of little use unless it has values assigned to at least some of its main parts. When these were not forthcoming, from a technical point of view, it appeared Brown was walking on straw legs.[11]

2.2 ■ THE SECOND PEARL HARBOR DISC DEMONSTRATION

Some years later, around 1953 or 1954, in the hope of renewing the Navy's interest, Brown again staged a demonstration at Pearl Harbor for a number of admirals. This time his demonstration was on a much larger scale. From a gymnasium ceiling, at a height of 50 feet, he suspended a revolving horizontal beam that tethered a pair of 3-foot-diameter discs (see figure 2.5). Powered by a potential of 150 kilovolts, the discs flew around a 50-foot-diameter course at such an impressive speed that the subject became highly classified. The speed may have been in excess of 100 miles per hour, because the May 1956 issue of the Swiss aeronautics magazine Interavia stated that the discs were capable of attaining speeds of several hundred miles per hour when charged with several hundred kilovolts![12] Such high velocities are not surprising considering that the ONR test data show that the speed of the discs increased exponentially with voltage.

Brown used a different disc design for this later demonstration. During a telephone conversation he had in the early 1970s with electrical engineer Tom Turman, Brown disclosed that the airfoil disc design depicted in his 1960 patent (no. 2,949,550) was an inferior one. The cross-sectional view presented in that patent shows the spun aluminum discs having a knife-thin edge at their periphery (as shown in figure 2.3). The discs used in the 1952 ONR test were of a similar design. On the other hand, the discs that Brown flew in his gymnasium demonstration had a blunt profile, as shown in figures 2.6 and 2.7. This design consisted of two spun aluminum discs cupped on either side of a Plexiglas sheet, but the upper disc had a "triarcuate" cross-sectional profile—a convex central bulge that turned concave farther out and that finally terminated in a convexly curved rim with a radius of curvature of ½ inch or more. The outer rim of the lower half of the disc had a flat profile, but its outer edge was curved to make a smooth transition to the edge of the upper disc.

Also, the leading-edge electrode used in the disc flown in Brown's gymnasium demonstration was of much smaller diameter. In a letter he wrote to Turman in 1971, Brown noted in a sketch that he used an electrode that had a diameter of only 1 mil (0.001 inch). This is five times smaller in diameter than the wire he used on the discs flown in his ONR test in Los Angeles. Moreover, it is far smaller than the diameter he had specified in his 1960 patent. His patent states that saucers designed to be energized at voltages greater than 125 kilovolts would preferably have leading-edge electrodes of large cross-section made of rods or hollow pipes having diameters measuring from ¼ to ½ inch (e.g., 250 to 500 mils) to ensure that their surface potential gradient was below the threshold required to produce a visible corona. He maintained that energy losses associated with coronal ionization reduced the achievable thrust, but, as he acknowledged in his 1971 letter, the design specified in the patent was inferior to what he used in his Pearl Harbor gymnasium demonstration. The leading-edge electrodes of the discs he flew in that demonstration would have had a much steeper field gradient at their surface, which would have allowed them to emit ions more effectively.

Burridge has commented that the discs emanated a slight humming sound as they flew.[13] This implies that Brown may have been applying a nonreversing high-voltage AC potential across his disc that, on average, established a DC potential across its electrodes. He may have used a rectifier bridge circuit to convert the 60-cycle AC output from his high-voltage transformer into a series of unfiltered half-wave voltage cycles oscillating at 120 hertz. His use of a blunt profile for the edge of the negatively charged disc body would have helped to suppress negative-ion coronal discharge toward the front of the craft. This would especially have become an important issue in this gymnasium demonstration because he flew his discs at much higher voltages than used in flying his earlier model. The asymmetrical profile of his saucer, with its curved upper surface and flat lower surface, would also have been beneficial since airflow over the surfaces would have given the saucer aerodynamic lift during flight.

After his Pearl Harbor demonstration, Brown traveled to the mainland. Upon returning to Hawaii, he found that his room had been broken into and that some government agency had confiscated his models and notebooks and sealed his laboratory.[14] A day later, the Navy informed him that they had his notebooks and that he could have them back. A few days after that, they said that they were not interested in his work. They claimed that the discs must be powered by ion wind and, hence, that they would not work in outer space.[15] So here we find that the Navy had the opportunity to make changes, in the interest of national security, to any of Brown's laboratory notebooks, including his Vega notebook.

2.3 ■ PROJECT WINTERHAVEN

The negative evaluation that came out of the 1952 ONR investigation of Brown's electrokinetic discs temporarily slowed down the Pentagon's endorsement of his work, but it did not halt the eventual implementation of his electrogravitic technology. In an effort to secure government funding, Brown wrote up a proposal in 1952 urging the Navy to initiate a highly secret project to develop a manned flying saucer as the basis of an interceptor aircraft with Mach 3 capability and proposed that this might follow along the same lines as the Manhattan District Project, which developed the atomic bomb at the end of World War II. This confidential January 1953 submittal was code-named Project Winterhaven.[16] Extrapolating the numbers from the performance charts for Brown's laboratory-model flying discs, Project Winterhaven estimated that larger discs operating at 5 million volts, rather than 50,000, should be able to develop speeds of 1,150 miles per hour (Mach 1.5) in the presence of atmospheric resistance and in excess of 1,800 miles per hour (Mach 2.5) in the upper atmosphere.

This rather conservative speed estimate was based on the assumption that disc speed extrapolated linearly with voltage, when in fact the evidence suggested a nonlinear relationship in which disc speed would rise exponentially with applied voltage. Thus, considering that Brown's 1½-foot-diameter discs had achieved speeds of twelve miles per hour when energized at 50 kilovolts, the report conservatively estimated that larger versions should be able to achieve speeds at a hundred times greater when energized at 5,000 kilovolts. The Pearl Harbor Navy Yard demonstration, which Brown performed shortly after this proposal was submitted and was intended as a demonstration of the aviation technology he was proposing in Project Winterhaven, indicated that speeds far higher than this would be possible. Because his 3-foot-diameter airfoils were shown to achieve speeds of several hundred miles per hour when energized at just 150 kilovolts, even a simple linear voltage-speed extrapolation would indicate that speeds of Mach 13 (10,000 miles per hour) would have been more reasonable for a 5-megavolt disc. However, since the jet speed record at the beginning of 1953 was only Mach 1.88, Brown could guarantee Navy interest even with his more conservative speed estimates.

Project Winterhaven proposed a five- to ten-year-long research and development (R&D, or RAND) program that was to be carried out in stages. Beginning with 2-foot-diameter discs powered at 50 kilovolts, it would proceed to 4-foot-diameter discs powered at 150 kilovolts, and finally to a 10-foot-diameter disc powered at 500 kilovolts. The proposal also suggested making a 10-foot demonstration model capable of vertical levitation as well as horizontal thrust.

The aircraft that Brown had in mind for military development probably looked similar to the version described in his U.S. patent 3,022,430, which was filed in July 1957 (figure 2.8).[17] Like his small-scale flying disc models, this craft produced a cloud of positive ions at its bow and a cloud of negative ions at its stern. Brown did not discuss gravity field effects in his patents, probably because he felt that such unconventional concepts might jeopardize a patent's ultimate acceptance. So although his patent alludes to ion thrust as being the craft's means of propulsion, on the basis of his own research Brown was convinced that the propulsion also involved electrogravitic effects.

In parallel with this effort to develop an electrogravitic craft, Project Winterhaven also planned to investigate various methods to generate the high voltages required on board the aerospace vehicle. The discs that Brown had flown in his carousel demonstration were energized from a heavy, high-voltage laboratory transformer powered by wall current. A full-size airborne craft, however, would need to carry its own energy source, one capable of delivering far more power at far higher voltages than were used for this demo model. However, a conventional turbine generator and transformer unit capable of delivering the required amount of power would have been prohibitively heavy. Consequently, Brown took a very different approach. He recommended investigating a device that he called a "flame-jet" electrostatic generator. This was essentially a jet engine modified to electrify its exhaust stream, turning it into a powerful electro-hydrodynamic generator (figure 2.9, taken from Brown's 1965 patent).

The jet engine's exhaust nozzle was to be fitted with a negatively charged needle electrode and a positively charged plate electrode. A 50,000-volt starter transformer located on the craft would cause the needle to emit a stream of negative ions into the jet exhaust. The ions, however, would never succeed in reaching the nozzle's positive electrode because they would be whisked out of the nozzle throat and away from the craft by the high-velocity exhaust gases. The departing negative ions would acquire a very large negative voltage potential relative to the electrodes in the jet's nozzle. The farther they would be forced from the craft, the greater would be their potential difference. A Van de Graaff generator, a common fixture in most high school physics laboratories, operates on a similar principle. In that case, a rapidly running conveyor belt takes the place of the engine exhaust for transporting and separating the negative ions from the positive. The Winterhaven proposal indicated that such an engine would be capable of generating up to 15 million volts, three hundred times higher than the 50-kilovolt input potential initially used to electrify its needle ionizer.

By positioning a metallic grid in the exhaust stream just beyond the generator's nozzle, some of the exiting exhaust ions could be collected at an intermediate voltage of around 1 million and, after being stepped down in voltage, could be recycled to drive the generator's needle ionizer. Thus, once the generator got going, the 50-kilovolt starter transformer that supplied the initial power could be turned off, leaving the generator to run itself from its own electrical output. In the alternate design, shown in figure 2.10, the downstream exhaust grid is replaced by a series of conical baffles that become charged to successively negative potentials, with the outermost baffle being the most negative and attaining a charge of many millions of volts.

Furthermore, Brown proposed that the flame-jet generator's positive electrode be connected to an ionizer wire running along the craft's leading edge (see figure 2.8). As a result, when the generator was in operation, a positive-ion space charge would build up in front of the craft, counterbalancing the negative-ion space charge built up in the exhaust plume trailing the craft. The gravity gradient generated between these oppositely polarized ion clouds would induce a forward-pulling gravitational force. The craft could be steered to one side or the other by diverting its exhaust through one or the other of its side nozzles, thereby producing a corresponding shift in its gravitational propulsion field.

Brown found that his flame-jet generator conveyed charges most effectively when its flame was adjusted to an orange-red color, indicating incomplete combustion of its fuel.[18] Incomplete combustion would produce large numbers of charged submicron-size particles (0.003 to 0.03 micron in diameter) that, upon being ionized, would grow in size to form Langevin ion smoke particles (> 0.03 micron). Being much more massive than air ions, Langevin ions would move considerably slower

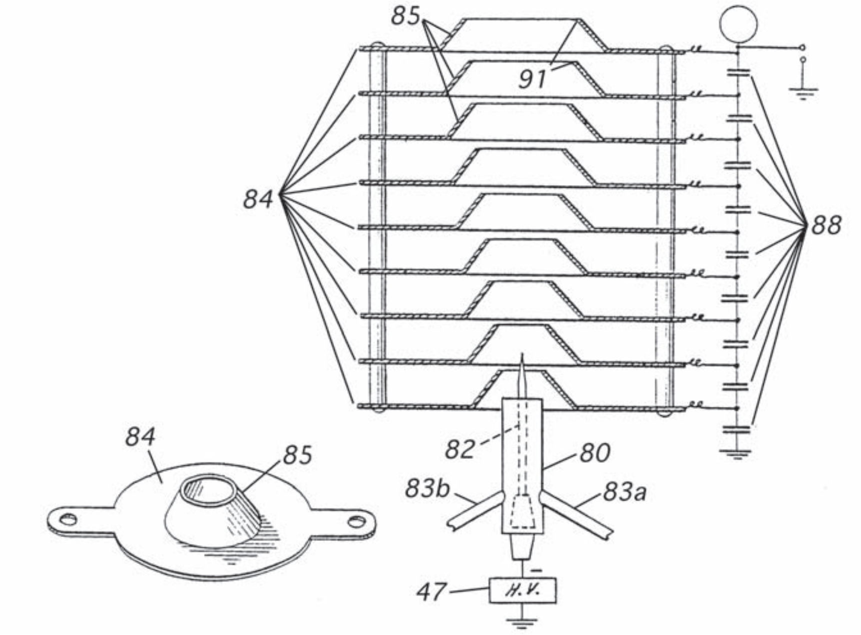

Figure 2.10. A high-voltage flame-jet generator, a second design depicted in Brown's patent. Numbers indicate the following: (47), a 50-kilovolt power supply; (80), exhaust nozzle; (82), needle electrode; (83a and 83b), air and fuel inlets; (84 and 85), baffles; (88), capacitors; (91), jagged electron emitter edges. under the influence of an electric field. For example, in a field of 10,000 volts per centimeter, the kind Brown often worked with, Langevin ions would travel about 1 centimeter per second, as compared with 450 miles per hour for air ions. Hence, once they are ejected from the craft, the negative exhaust ions would not readily return to the front of the aircraft to neutralize the positive ions. Consequently, a much larger negative-ion space charge would build up behind the craft that, in turn, would substantially increase the forward-directed gravitic propulsion force. Although the positively charged air ions produced at the front of the craft would have a much higher ionic mobility, the bow shock front that would form under high-speed flight would tend to deflect these ions away from the body of the disc, thereby retarding their rearward flight toward the negative-ion space charge cloud.

The Winterhaven proposal stated that the electrogravitic motor would be essentially soundless, vibrationless, and heatless and that its internal resistance losses would be almost negligible and its speeds enormous. The motor's thrust could be controlled by regulating the applied voltage, and its flight velocity could be braked or even reversed simply by reversing its electric polarity. The proposal commented that past laboratory research had indicated that an electrogravitic motor would set up a gravitational field independent of that of Earth. Hence, an electrogravitic spacecraft could maintain sustained acceleration even after leaving the gravitational influence of Earth. It predicted top speeds far beyond those of jet propulsion or rocket drive, with the possibility of approaching the speed of light in free space.

A 1960 report titled "Electrohydrodynamics," issued by the Electrokinetics Corporation of Bala Cynwyd, Pennsylvania, presented an idea for a vertical takeoff aero-marine vehicle that was a variation of the one proposed in Project Winterhaven (figure 2.11).[19] The proposed vehicle was to be 24 feet high and 70 feet in diameter. Through experimentation, Brown found that a disc whose upper surface had a triarcuate-shaped profile, a helmet-shape similar to that shown in figure 2.11, produced the best vertical thrust.

As described in the report, the vehicle would use spherical pontoons to rest on the water surface (see figure 2.12, Landing Position). To take off, the craft would ignite its flame jet without electrical excitation (figure 2.12, Stage 1). The jet would be powered by either kerosene or solid rocket propellants. The exhaust would set up a positive pressure beneath the canopy that would loft the craft about ten feet above the water surface, allowing the pontoons to be partially retracted. A gyro wheel in the cabin dome would provide horizontal stability and orientation control.

Once the vehicle was airborne, the flame would be electrically energized by applying high voltage to the incandescent cathode (figure 2.12, Stage 2). An electric gradient would establish itself along the length of the exhaust plume, with the voltage progressively increasing downstream to reach a potential difference of several million volts. A potential gradient would similarly build up on the nozzle's conical collector electrodes, which collect power for the craft. The exhaust would set up a negative-ion space charge below the craft, and ionizer electrodes on the canopy would create positive ions above the craft. The positive charges emitted from the canopy would create an ion wind that would move downward and radially inward toward the central cathodic axis, setting up a toroidal ion vortex. The flow would receive negative charges from the exhaust, which would cause it to accelerate upward toward the canopy. The large volume of upward-moving plasma would impart upward momentum to the undersurface of the positively charged canopy, thereby helping to loft the vehicle. Also, the inflowing ion plasma would buck the flame jet's outgoing gas flow, confining its flow and increasing the lift pressure beneath the canopy. At this stage, the vortex would be slightly larger than the diameter of the craft. The craft would have risen to about a 25-foot elevation and would continue to rise as subcanopy pressures induce further lift. At this point, the pontoons would have completely retracted. Smoke tests, which Brown conducted on an 18-inch-diameter model, showed that this electrode geometry indeed generates a toroidal vortex (see chapter 3, figure 3.3).

The report states that as the craft rises, the toroidal vortex would expand to about three (craft) diameters. The axial upwelling would continue to buck the downward jetstream to add to the jet's upward thrust (figure 2.12, Stage 3). At about a 50-foot elevation, the subcanopy pressure would diminish to equal the weight of the craft and equilibrium would be established. In this fashion, the craft would be able to hover at about this height, its canopy riding upon the vortex, whose aerodynamic pressure would act at all points against the craft's underside, providing lift. Electrogravitic forces would also contribute to this effect, as would electrostatic forces between the craft and charges in the surrounding air and charged plasma.

Horizontal thrust in any direction would be provided by altering the symmetry of the electric field and of the resulting vortex pattern (figure 2.12, Stage 4). This would allow flame gas to escape to the rear of the craft and the forward side of the vortex to exert traction upon the water surface. The unbalanced canopy pressures would provide forward thrust, and the additional lift of the leading edge would cause a change in the altitude of the craft.

Project Winterhaven also requested funds to develop solid-state electrogravitic motors similar to Brown's early gravitators. It stressed the importance of improvements that had been achieved in developing new dielectric materials, noting that the available dielectric constant K-values had progressively increased from 6 to 100 to 6,000 to 30,000 and beyond. It proposed engineering a 500-pound high-K dielectric motor for propelling a model ship and envisioned that this would presage the development of much larger motors for ships weighing thousands of tons.

Yet another Winterhaven project concerned the investigation of electrogravitic communication equipment that would transmit and receive electrogravitic waves. Early in 1952, Brown conducted a demonstration in Los Angeles of one such transmitting and receiving system, through which he successfully transmitted a signal over a distance of 35 feet to a receiver located within an electrically grounded metallic enclosure.[20] He used a relaxation oscillator as his transmitter. This consisted of a high-voltage power supply that continuously charged a capacitor, which, in turn, periodically discharged itself through a small spark gap when its voltage had reached a certain value (figure 2.13). Just as in his early capacitor experiments, Brown reasoned that electrogravitic coupling would cause the capacitor to radiate gravitational waves. His receiver antenna consisted of a charged high-voltage capacitor bridge circuit similar to the one he used for his gravito-electric measurements. Because the grounded Faraday shield that surrounded his receiver antenna was able to prevent the entry of ordinary electromagnetic waves, he concluded that the signal being conveyed was gravitic rather than electromagnetic and that his capacitor bridge was able to detect gravitational disturbances.

In a patent disclosure Brown wrote in September 1953, he described another version of this communication device, which was designed to send a signal from an audio oscillator to an electrically shielded radio receiver. However, instead of capacitors, this device used heavy spherical masses for the transmitter and receiver antennae.[21] His Project Winterhaven proposal envisioned that electrogravitic wave transmission and reception could be developed into a fundamentally new communication technology. It noted that because of the extreme penetrating ability of these waves, messages could be transmitted to submarines and to underground shelters and military installations, locations inaccessible to normal radio-wave communication. Brown's spherical antenna gravitational wave generator bore a close resemblance to devices developed by scientist and inventor Nikola Tesla in the early twentieth century. How such devices generate gravity waves may be understood in terms of the subquantum kinetics ether methodology (see box).[22,23]

A Gravity Wave Model

As mentioned earlier, subquantum kinetics predicts that a positive charge should induce the formation of a gravity potential well and a negative charge should induce the formation of a gravity potential hill. Hence, a spherical conductor that is alternately charged and discharged should radiate both an electric potential wave and a gravity potential wave. These waves would be scalar waves rather than force field vector waves because they would consist of changes in energy potential (i.e., ether concentration), which is a scalar quantity. That is, a potential wave would have a measurable magnitude at a given point in space but no associated direction. Electric charges on a spherical monopole antenna would not be laterally displaced to any appreciable extent, as they would be in a conventional dipole antenna; hence, they would induce a minimal magnetic field. So unlike Hertzian electromagnetic waves, which oscillate transverse to their direction of travel, these scalar waves would induce no forces transverse to a wave's direction of travel. They would instead produce longitudinal electric and gravity potential field gradients that would induce longitudinal forces, that is, forces aligned with the wave's direction of propagation.

Tesla's ether sound-wave model for describing radiant energy waves fits this energy potential description quite well because sinusoidal variations in ether concentration may be visualized as alternate compressions and rarefactions of the ether medium, analogous to the compressions and rarefactions of air molecules in a sound wave. A high ether concentration would correspond to a high energy potential, and a low ether concentration would correspond to a low energy potential. So according to this model, the antenna would be radiating spherical waves of alternating ether concentration. In the event that the waves were made to repeatedly reflect back and forth under resonance, they could reinforce one another to produce stationary wave patterns characterized by very strong longitudinal forces.

The Project Winterhaven proposal requested that its projects be carried out under a Department of Defense R&D contract administered by a prime contractor. It advocated a cooperative participation of four commercial corporations engaged in applied research and four academic institutions engaged in pure research. The four corporations were to comprise Lear Inc. (for gravimetric field measurements), Jansky & Bailey (for electrogravitic wave communication research), Brush Development Company (for development of high-K dielectric thrust motors), and Hancock Manufacturing Company (for development of the disc airfoils). The academic institutions included Stanford Research Institute, the University of Chicago, and the Franklin Institute.

The proposal acknowledged that the Pentagon had classified some of Brown's past electrogravitic research. It noted that additional data confirming the existence of the electrogravitic coupling effect have been "associated with government research projects of a highly classified status, and publication has been precluded." Nevertheless, Brown's desire in proposing Project Winterhaven was not to keep this technology secret but to accelerate its development so that it could benefit humanity.

Unfortunately, his dream of unrestricted access to electrogravitic technology was not to be realized. Perhaps unknown to him at that time, highly classified work on electrogravitics then in progress had proceeded to a relatively advanced stage of development. In particular, out of all the ideas proposed in Project Winterhaven, the electrogravitic wave communicator device came closest of all to this ongoing sensitive propulsion research.

2.4 ▪ ANTIGRAVITY RESEARCH: TOP SECRET

Brown's effort to promote his electrogravitic propulsion concept received its greatest boost from Aviation Studies (International) Ltd., a privately owned, London-based aviation intelligence consulting firm.* Since its formation in 1950, Aviation Studies has marketed reports to aerospace companies and government defense departments on a wide variety of subjects, giving information about various kinds of aircraft, rockets, and missiles (e.g., their design features, prices, production run sizes, foreign arsenal sizes); data on nuclear, thermal, and directed-energy weapons; assessments of foreign government military intelligence capabilities (e.g., organization missions, manpower, intelligence advisories); and much more. Their price lists for publications available between 1957 and 1960 and for publications issued in 1993 are reproduced in appendix B.

Richard Worcester, the director of Aviation Studies, had become convinced that Brown had discovered something that could radically revolutionize aviation technology. So beginning in August 1954, his think tank began an effort to promote Brown's ideas to the aerospace industry, indicating that the rewards of success in developing electrogravitics technology were too far-reaching to be overlooked. They began including news items about electrogravitics technology in their weekly newsletter, *Aviation Report, and by 1956 also began sponsoring research into high-K dielectric materials for use in electrogravitic aircraft. Their catalytic effort proved successful because industry involvement in electrogravitics expanded exponentially from 1954 onward. Around the late 1950s, antigravity propulsion research went underground and little was heard about it, although today the effort continues secretly on a scale rivaling the Manhattan Project's effort to develop the atomic bomb.

*The firm's address was given as Aviation Studies (International) Ltd., Sussex House, 37A Parkside, Wimbledon, London SW19 5NB, UK. However, currently no address for this organization is available.

In February and December 1956, Aviation Studies published two summary reports on electrogravitics. The February report, titled "Electrogravitics Systems: An Examination of Electrostatic Motion, Dynamic Counterbary and Barycentric Control," presents an illuminating survey of government and industry's early involvement in the field of antigravitics R&D.[24] Its cover page lists its origin as the Gravity Research Group, a subdivision of the Aviation Studies Special Weapons Study Unit, but it is now known to have been written by Worcester. The December report, titled "The Gravitics Situation," also written by Worcester, was issued as being produced by Gravity Rand Limited, an affiliate of Aviation Studies.[25] It provides additional information about aviation industry progress in developing electrogravitic antigravity technology. Gravity Rand had no affiliation with the Rand Corporation. Rand, an acronym for Research and Development, is often included in the names of companies that are involved in R&D work.

It is relatively difficult to obtain original copies of these documents. Although the card catalog at the U.S. Library of Congress in Washington, D.C., has a card on file for the February 1956 "Electrogravitics Systems" report (LOC no. 3,1401,00034,5879; call no. TL565.A9), when I tried to check out the report in 1985, the librarian found that it was missing from its shelves. A subsequent check of the Library of Congress computer database showed that one other library in the United States kept a copy of the report. That was the Wright-Patterson Air Force Base Technical Library in Dayton, Ohio. Originally marked "confidential," the report had been declassified sometime prior to when I obtained it in 1985 and is currently available for public scrutiny. It may be borrowed from Wright-Patterson through the interlibrary loan system, but doing so may require some persistence on the part of the requester since the document is not cataloged on all Wright-Patterson computer databases, so Air Force librarians might overlook its presence. The February 1956 report is reproduced in appendix C.

*A 1993 circular states that this newsletter covers aerospace policy and contains equipment and intelligence data, economic/technical acquisition needs, and government news, analysis, and trends. I do not know if it continues to be published.

An original copy of the December 1956 report was more difficult to locate. Librarians at Wright-Patterson could not find a copy in their stacks and an attempt to obtain the document from Aviation Studies was also unsuccessful. The director responded that copies of both 1956 electrogravitics studies could not be found in its files. Currently, however, it is possible to download these documents from the Internet. Aircraft and missile companies that have been purchasing the Aviation Studies reports may still keep copies of these older issues in their technical libraries, but company officials may be hesitant to share them with outsiders. There is an apparent effort to keep this subject very quiet. For example, Loral Vought Systems Corporation of Grand Prairie, Texas, a company that is heavily involved in missile R&D and that served as a subcontractor to Northrop Grumman Corporation on development of the B-2 stealth bomber, had listed the December 1956 report on its library database, but in a 1993 telephone conversation, one of their librarians told me that the document was marked as "destroyed." Although she mentioned that three or four other Aviation Studies reports were listed, she was unwilling to divulge their titles and cited company policy that prevented the documents from being loaned out.

The subtitle of the February 1956 report—An Examination of Electrostatic Motion, Dynamic Counterbary, and Barycentric Control—blatantly indicates that it deals with gravity control. The words dynamic counterbary and barycentric control translate to mean antigravity propulsion and the control of gravity, the root word bary coming from the Greek βαρη, meaning weight. More specifically, page 19 of this report defines counterbary as "the manipulation of gravitational force lines" and barycentric control as "the adjustment to such manipulative capability to produce a stable type of motion suitable for transportation."

The glossary of the December 1956 Aviation Studies report defines counterbary as “another name for lofting . . . the action of levitation where gravity’s force is more than overcome by electrostatic or other propulsion.” It defines barycentric control as “the environment for regulation of lofting processes in a vehicle.”

The term “dynamic counterbary,” or contrabary, was coined by the renowned German scientist Burkhard Heim, who used it publicly for the first time in 1952 in a Stuttgart lecture titled “Dynamic Contrabary and the Solution of Astronautical Problems.” Heim had been heavily engaged in gravity force field research in the early 1950s and claimed to have discovered what he called the “contrabaric effect,” a way of inducing a gravitational force field by electromagnetic means.

The February 1956 report briefly reviews Brown’s seminal work and mentions his 1952 Project Winterhaven proposal to develop an electrogravitic interceptor disc of approximately 35 feet in diameter that would be capable of attaining Mach 3 (2,250 miles per hour) and executing sharp-edged changes of direction. The authors of the report were quite convinced that electrogravitics involves a nonconventional method for artificially altering a vehicle’s gravity field, because the report begins by stating:

> Electrogravitics might be described as a synthesis of electrostatic energy used for propulsion . . . and gravitics (or dynamic counterbary) in which energy is also used to set up a local gravitational force independent of the earth’s . . .
> The essence of electrogravitics thrust is the use of a very strong positive charge on one side of the vehicle and a negative on the other. The core of the motor is a condenser and the ability of the condenser to hold its charge (the K number) is the yardstick of performance . . .
> . . . The electrogravitics saucer can perform the function of a classic lifting surface—it produces a pushing effect on the under surface and a suction effect on the upper, but, unlike the airfoil, it does not require a flow of air to produce the effect.[26]

The report summarizes electrogravitics work that was being done in the United States and in Great Britain and even indicates that several antigravity test rigs were in operation at that time. It also includes extracts from various issues of Aviation Report dated between August 1954 and December 1955. These give an illuminating view of how interest in electrogravitics progressively expanded over this eighteen-month period. Some interesting excerpts are quoted here in chronological order:

> Aviation Report, September 7, 1954[27]

An October 1954 report refers to Brown's 1952 Winterhaven Project proposal and indicates that the Pentagon was about to begin funding the development of electrogravitic aircraft:

> ELECTRO-GRAVITIC PROPULSION SITUATION
> Under the terms of Project Winterhaven [1952] the proposals to develop electro-gravitics to the point of realizing a Mach 3 combat type disc were not far short of the extensive effort that was planned for the Manhattan District. Indeed the drive to develop the new prime mover is in some respects rather similar to the experiments that led to the release of nuclear energy in the sense that both involve fantastic mathematical capacity and both are sciences so new that other allied sciences cannot be of very much guide. In the past two years since the principle of motion by means of massive-K was first demonstrated on a test rig, progress has been slow. But the indications are now that the Pentagon is ready to sponsor a range of devices to help further knowledge. . . . Tentative targets now being set anticipate that the first disc should be complete before 1960 and it would take the whole of the "sixties" to develop it properly, even though some combat things might be available ten years from now. . . . The frame incidentally is indivisible from the "engine." If there is to be any division of responsibility it would be that the engine industry might become responsible for providing the electrostatic energy (by, it is thought, a kind of flame) and the frame maker for the condenser assembly which is the core of the main structure.
> Aviation Report, October 12, 1954[28]

Note that the October report mentions Brown's flame-jet high-voltage generator concept as a means for generating electrostatic energy and suggests that such a device would be developed by the jet engine industry. A November 1954 report describes the Air Force's first attempts to draw up specifications for the development of an electrogravitic vehicle and notes that the goal of a Mach 3 combat saucer would be possible through an extrapolation of technology available at that time:

> Specification writers seem to be still rather stumped to know what to ask for in the very hazy science of electrogravitic propelled vehicles. They are at present faced with having to plan the first family of things—first of these is the most realistic type of operational test rig, and second, the first type of test vehicle. In turn this would lead to sponsoring of a combat disc. The preliminary test rigs which gave only feeble propulsion have been somewhat improved, but of course the speeds reached so far are only those more associated with what is attained on the roads rather than in the air. But propulsion is now known to be possible, so it is a matter of feeding enough KVA [kilovolt-amperes] into condensers with better K figures. 50,000 is a magic figure for the combat saucer—it is this amount of KVA and this amount of K that can be translated into Mach 3 speeds.
> Aviation Report, November 19, 1954[29]

The term "KVA," which stands for kilovolt-amperes, is used exclusively in referring to power consumption in which the power source is AC. Its use in the above passage suggests that the disc being discussed was to use high-K capacitors powered with AC, rather than DC.[30] If the disc's capacitors were instead powered exclusively with DC, then it would have been more proper to refer to kilowatts of power, or KW.* Also, this same report later states, "Perhaps the main thing for management to bear in mind in recruiting men is that essentially electrogravitics is a branch of wave technology and much of it starts with Planck's dimensions of action, energy, and time, and some of this is among the most firm and least controversial sections of modern atomic physics." So here is further acknowledgment that researchers were actively investigating the use of time-varying electric fields for electrogravitic propulsion.

Although Brown's early demonstration discs were powered with high-voltage DC power, later demonstrations, such as the one given in a gymnasium at Pearl Harbor, appear to have instead used rectified AC. Also, in one of his patents, Brown briefly alludes to energizing high-K dielectrics with high-frequency AC, but he kept fairly quiet about this part of his work. How an AC-energized capacitor might be used to produce an amplified electrogravitic thrust is described in the next chapter.

*When a capacitor is energized with AC, there is a phase shift between the current and voltage sine waves such that the current change through the capacitor tends to lead the voltage change across it. Consequently, the product of average current times average voltage (or kilowatts) is not a good measure for the average power of a half cycle. In such cases, electrical engineers instead refer to kilovolt-amperes.

During a January 25, 1955, meeting of aviation leaders held in New York, George S. Trimble, vice president of advanced design for Glenn Martin Aircraft in Baltimore, was quoted by the Associated Press as saying, "Unlimited power, freedom from gravitational attraction, and infinitely short travel time are now becoming feasible."[31] He then added that eventually all commercial air transportation would be in vehicles operating on these fantastic principles. Recall that Brown had briefly worked at the Baltimore Glenn Martin plant sixteen years earlier, before the beginning of World War II. Undoubtedly, he had planted the seeds about electrogravitics at that early date.

At the same meeting, Dr. Walter R. Dornberger, a guided missile consultant for the Bell Aircraft Corporation, predicted that airliners would eventually travel at 10,000 miles per hour (Mach 13). This would make possible a trip from New York to Sidney, Australia, in approximately one hour. Two weeks later, Aviation Studies issued a report disclosing that many aircraft companies were aware of the existence of this antigravity technology:

> New companies . . . who would like to see themselves as major defence prime contractors in ten or fifteen years time are the ones most likely to stimulate development. Several typical companies in Britain and the U.S. come to mind—outfits like AiResearch, Raytheon, Plessey in England, Rotax and others. But the companies have to face a decade of costly research into theoretical physics and it means a great deal of trust. Companies are mostly overloaded already and they cannot afford it, but when they sit down and think about the matter they can scarcely avoid the conclusion that they cannot afford not to be in at the beginning.

> Aviation Report, February 8, 1955[32]

In July 1955, Aviation Report quoted Lawrence D. Bell, founder of Bell Aircraft, as saying that the tempo of development leading to the use of antigravitational vehicles would accelerate and that breakthroughs that had become feasible at that time would advance the introduction of such vehicles ahead of the time it had taken to develop the turbojet.[33] That same issue predicted that government procurement would open up "because the capabilities of such aircraft are immeasurably greater than those envisaged with any known form of engine."

On October 15, 1955, the Department of Defense issued a news release informing the public that some government aircraft under development could resemble flying saucers. Secretary of the Air Force Donald A. Quarles stated:

> . . . we are now entering a period of aviation technology in which aircraft of unusual configuration and flight characteristics will begin to appear . . . The Air Force and other Armed Services have under development several vertical-rising, high performance aircraft . . . Vertical-rising aircraft capable of transition to supersonic horizontal flight will be a new phenomenon in our skies, and under certain conditions could give the illusion of the so-called flying saucer.[34]

Although Quarles did not refer to any unconventional propulsion technology, it may be no coincidence that just one year earlier the Pentagon had begun plans to fund the development of Brown's electrogravitics technology. To camouflage the truly exotic nature of the project, the news release called attention to the disc-shaped AVRO car, developed by AVRO Ltd. of Canada. The AVRO car was an ill-conceived vehicle that used a conventional air turbine that was ducted to provide vertical lift. Unfortunately, its design was inherently unstable; it had the persistent tendency to flip over after rising just a few feet off the ground.

The November 1955 issue of Aviation Report acknowledges the key role that the Aviation Studies newsletter played in catalyzing the development of the electrogravitics industry:

> The feasibility of a Mach 3 fighter (the present aim in studies) is dependent on a rather large K extrapolation, considering the pair of saucers that have physically demonstrated the principle only achieved a speed of some 30 fps [feet per second]. But, and this is important, they have attained a working velocity using a very inefficient (even by to-day's knowledge) form of condenser complex . . .
> It was, by the way, largely due to the early references in Aviation Report that work is gathering momentum in the U.S. Similar studies are beginning in France, and in England some men are on the job full time.

> Aviation Report, November 15, 1955[35]

Later that month, Ansel Talbert, military and aviation editor for the New York Herald Tribune, published a series of articles on the aviation industry's interest in gravity control. On November 20, he wrote:

> A number of major, long-established companies in the United States aircrafts and electronics industries also are involved in gravity research. Scientists in general, bracket gravity with life itself as the greatest unsolved mystery in the Universe. But there are increasing numbers who feel that there must be a physical mechanism for its propagation which can be discovered and controlled. Should this mystery be solved it would bring about a greater revolution in power, transportation, and many other fields than even the discovery of atomic power. The influence of such a discovery would be of tremendous import in the field of aircraft design where the problem of fighting gravity's effects has always been basic.[36]

Talbert's article displayed a photo of two General Dynamics Convair Division scientists conducting a research experiment aimed at controlling gravity. It showed them facing an apparatus supported on pillars that was wired with electrical connections. In an article dated November 21, Talbert named six other firms that were involved in such studies:

> Aircraft industry firms now participating or actively interested in gravity include the Glenn L. Martin Co. of Baltimore, builders of the nation's > first giant jet-powered flying boat; Convair of San Diego, designers and builders of the giant B-36 intercontinental bomber and the world's first successful vertical take-off fighter; Bell Aircraft of Buffalo, builders of the first piloted airplane to fly faster than sound and a current jet "vertical takeoff and landing" airplane, and Sikorsky division of United Aircraft, pioneer helicopter builders. Lear, Inc., of Santa Monica, one of the world's largest builders of automatic pilots for airplanes; Clarke Electronics of Palm Springs, California, a pioneer in its field, and the Sperry Gyroscope Division of Sperry-Rand Corp., of Great Neck, L.I., which is doing important work on guided missiles and earth satellites, also have scientists investigating the gravity problem.[37]

Talbert also named several physicists who were interested in pursuing gravity control research:

> . . . current efforts to understand gravity and universal gravitation both at the sub-atomic level and at the level of the Universe have the positive backing today of many of America's outstanding physicists. These include Dr. Edward Teller of the University of California, who received prime credit for developing the hydrogen bomb; Dr. J. Robert Oppenheimer, director of the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton; Dr. Freeman J. Dyson, theoretical physicist at the institute, and Dr. John A. Wheeler, professor of physics at Princeton University, who made important contributions to America's first nuclear fission project.[38]

Others mentioned to be working on understanding gravity included Dr. Vaclav Hlavaty of the University of Indiana and Drs. Stanley Deser and Richard Arnowitt of Princeton's Institute for Advanced Study. Unlike his colleague Albert Einstein, Hlavaty believed gravity simply to be one aspect of electromagnetism.

In his November 21 article, Talbert further acknowledged the existence of a widespread industry program geared toward gravity control research:

> Many in America's aircraft and electronics industries are excited over the possibility of using its magnetic and gravitational fields as > a medium of support for amazing "flying vehicles" which will not depend on the air for lift. Space ships capable of accelerating in a few seconds to speeds many thousands of miles an hour and making sudden changes of course at these speeds without subjecting their passengers to the so-called "G-forces" caused by gravity's pull also are envisioned. These concepts are part of a new program to solve the secret of gravity and universal gravitation already in progress in many top scientific laboratories and long-established industrial firms of the nation.

> William P. Lear, inventor and chairman of the board of Lear, Inc., one of the nation's largest electronics firms specializing in aviation, for months has been going over new developments and theories relating to gravity with his chief scientists and engineers. Mr. Lear in 1950 received the Collier Trophy from the President of the United States "for the greatest achievement in aviation in America" through developing a light-weight automatic pilot and approach control system for jet fighter planes. He is convinced that it will be possible to create artificial "electro-gravitational fields whose polarity can be controlled to cancel out gravity." He told this correspondent: "All the (mass) materials and human beings within these fields will be part of them. They will be adjustable so as to increase or decrease the weight of any object in its surroundings. They won't be affected by the earth's gravity or that of any celestial body. This means that if any person was in an anti-gravitational airplane or space ship that carried along its own gravitational field . . . — no matter how fast you accelerated or changed course—your body wouldn't any more feel it than it now feels the speed of the earth."[39]

It is unlikely that an industrialist as prominent as Lear would make such a strong statement unless he himself had seen concrete evidence that such an electrogravitic effect was possible. Bell, whose company in Buffalo had built the first piloted aircraft in history to fly faster than sound, also was optimistic about the results of gravity research then in progress. The New York Herald Tribune quoted him as saying, "Aviation as we know it is on the threshold of amazing new concepts. The United States aircraft industry already is working with nuclear fuels and equipment to cancel out gravity instead of fighting it."[40]

Grover Loening, the first engineer hired by the Wright brothers and whose forty-year career in aircraft design, construction, and consulting had been decorated by the U.S. Air Force, told Talbert, "I firmly believe that before long man will acquire the ability to build an electromagnetic contra-gravity mechanism that works. Much the same line of reasoning that enabled scientists to split up atomic structures also will enable them to learn the nature of gravitational attraction and ways to counter it."[41]

Trimble's company, Glenn Martin, was the first in the United States to investigate electrogravitational propulsion.[42] This is not surprising given that Brown worked for Martin as early as 1939. The New York Herald Tribune said that, under Trimble's initiative, Martin Aircraft was building a laboratory between Baltimore and Washington to house the new Research Institute for Advanced Study, which would be committed to investigating the theoretical basis of electrogravitics and to conducting programs in applied research. Regarding the development of this new technology, the Herald Tribune quoted Trimble as saying, "I think we could do the job in about the time that it actually required to build the first atomic bomb if enough trained scientific brain-power simultaneously began thinking about and working towards a solution. Actually the biggest deterrent to scientific progress is a refusal of some people, including scientists, to believe that things which seem amazing can really happen."[43]

Dudley Clarke, president of Clarke Electronics, was also reported to be optimistic about gravity control. In an article dated November 22, Talbert stated, "Mr. Clarke notes that the force of gravity is powerful enough to generate many thousand times more electricity than now is generated at Niagara Falls and every other water-power center in the world—if it can be harnessed. This impending event, he maintains, will make heat and power needed by one family for an indefinite period."[44]

Two weeks after the Herald Tribune story came out, Aviation Report stated:

> Electro-gravitics Effort Widening
> Companies studying the implications of gravitics are said in a new statement, to include Glenn Martin, Convair, Sperry-Rand, Sikorsky, > Bell, Lear Inc. and Clark[e] Electronics. Other companies who have previously evinced interest include Lockheed, Douglas and Hiller. The remainder are not disinterested, but have not given public support to the new science—which is widening all the time. The approach in the U.S. is in a sense more ambitious than might have been expected.

> Aviation Report, December 9, 1955[45]

Of these companies, Brown had particularly strong ties with Lockheed, having worked there just ten years earlier. The Aviation Studies' "Electrogravitic Systems" report, issued two months after the December 9 article quoted above, noted the increasing number of U.S. aviation companies that were expressing interest in antigravity propulsion technology:

> One of the difficulties in 1954 and 1955 was to get aviation to take electrogravitics seriously. The name alone was enough to put people off. However, in the trade much progress has been made and now most major companies in the United States are interested in counterbary. Groups are being organized to study electrostatic and electromagnetic phenomena. Most of the industry's leaders have made some reference to it. Douglas has now stated that it has counterbary on its work agenda but does not expect results yet awhile. Hiller has referred to new forms of flying platform, Glenn Martin say gravity control could be achieved in six years, but they add that it would entail a Manhattan District type of effort to bring it about. Sikorsky, one of the pioneers, more or less agrees with the Douglas verdict and says that gravity is tangible and formidable, but there must be a physical carrier for this immense trans-spatial force. This implies that where a physical manifestation exists, a physical device can be developed for creating a similar force moving in the opposite direction to cancel it. Clarke Electronics state they have a rig, and add that in their view the source of gravity's force will be understood sooner than some people think. General Electric is working on the use of electronic rigs designed to make adjustments to gravity—this line of attack has the advantage of using rigs already in existence for other defence work. Bell also has an experimental rig intended, as the company puts it, to cancel out > gravity, and Lawrence Bell has said he is convinced that practical hardware will emerge from current programs. Grover Leoning is certain that what he referred to as an electro-magnetic contra-gravity mechanism will be developed for practical use. Convair is extensively committed to the work with several rigs. Lear Inc., autopilot and electronic engineers have a division of the company working on gravity research and so also has the Sperry division of Sperry-Rand. This list embraces most of the U.S. aircraft industry. The remainder, Curtis-Wright, Lockheed, Boeing and North American have not yet declared themselves, but all these four are known to be in various stages of study with and without rigs.[46]

The report added that a certain amount of antigravity work was also going on in Europe. It mentioned two French companies getting involved and several private ventures developing rigs in Britain. It also mentioned that one Swedish company, two Canadian companies, and several German companies were also making studies. The Airplane Corporation and Gluhareff Helicopter were among the foreign companies that had recently joined the growing gravity research club.

The report extrapolated that it should be possible to produce a Mach 3 fighter disc by electrifying the craft with million-volt potentials and using surface coatings having K-values of more than 10,000. By that time, K figures of 6,000 had been obtained from some ceramic materials, and researchers had demonstrated 30 percent weight reductions in some energized devices. Moreover, there were prospects of synthesizing ceramics with K figures as high as 30,000. Thus it was felt that an operational manned aircraft could be built simply by scaling up what was then already in existence.

The emphasis on using high-K dielectric materials for the craft's hull indicates that its designers planned to achieve gravity control primarily by electrically charging the craft's surface rather than depending entirely on the gravitic effect of external ion clouds. Nevertheless, since this vehicle was to obtain its high-voltage power from a flame-jet generator, its designers probably planned to make beneficial use of such auxiliary ion cloud effects.

One month after the February 1956 Aviation Studies report was released, Interavia magazine echoed similar optimism regarding the practical application of Brown's electrogravitic technology:

> Such a [gravitic] force raised exponentially to levels capable of pushing man-carrying vehicles through the air—or outer space—at ultra-high speeds is now the object of concerted effort in several countries. Once achieved, it will eliminate most of the structural difficulties now encountered in the construction of high-speed aircraft . . . The force is not a physical one acting initially at a specific point in the vehicle that needs then to be translated to all the other parts. It is an electrogravitic field acting on all parts simultaneously. Changes in direction and speed of flight would be effected by merely altering the intensity, polarity and direction of the charge.[47]

In December 1956, Aviation Studies issued a second progress report that pointed out the military advantages of the technology and mentioned that government funding was being continued:

> Electrostatic discs can provide lift without speed . . . This could be an important advance over all forms of airfoil which require induced flow; and (lift without airflow) is a development that deserves to be followed up in its own right, and one that for military purposes is already envisaged by the users as applicable to all three services (Army, Navy, & Air Force). This point has been appreciated in the United States and a program in hand may now ensure that development of large sized disks will be continued. This is backed by the U.S. Government, but it is something that will be pursued on a small scale. This acceptance follows Brown's original suggestion embodied in Project Winterhaven.[48]

The report also made the following revealing assessment of the electrogravitics industry situation:

> Already companies are specializing in evolution of particular components of an electrogravitics disk. This implies that the science is in the same state as the ICBM, namely that no new breakthroughs > are needed, only intensive development engineering. This may be an optimistic reading of the situation; it is true that materials are now available for the condensers giving higher K figures than were postulated in Winterhaven as necessary, and all the ingredients necessary for the disks appear to be available. But industry is still some way from having an adequate power source, and possessing any practical experience of running such equipment.[49]

The report suggests that other companies were duplicating Brown's flying disc experiment and similarly obtaining speeds in the range of hundreds of miles per hour. It states, "High speeds in electrostatic propulsion of small discs will be worth keeping track of (by high speed one means hundreds of mph) and some of these results are beginning to filter through for general evaluation."[50] Interest in the subject of antigravity continued to accelerate in the following years. In January 1957, the Institute of Field Physics at the University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill held a weeklong scientific conference on the role of gravitation in physics. The conference was attended by forty-five physicists from the United States and seven other countries. Brown was undoubtedly among them. Interestingly, the Wright Air Development Center of Wright-Patterson Air Force Base was one of the sponsors of the meeting and was also in charge of publishing the conference proceedings.[51] That same year, J. E. Surrat Jr., vice president of the Society of Aeronautical Weight Engineers, said that Wright-Patterson was equipped with a multimillion-dollar installation designed for the research and study of antigravity forces.[52]

A. V. Cleaver, who worked as assistant chief engineer at the Aero Engine Division of Rolls-Royce, assessed the status of electrogravitics in a February 1957 article published in the prestigious Journal of the British Interplanetary Society.[53] He estimated that government and industry in the United States were spending on the order of $5 million annually on fundamental research on electrogravitics and noted that firms in France, Italy, and Japan may also have been researching the phenomenon.

Nevertheless, unknown to the many newcomers being indoctrinated into the field of electrogravitics, this multicompany R&D effort was merely supplementing a highly classified effort that had already been in progress since the end of World War II. This preexisting project, known as Project Skyvault, was actually ahead in achieving the goal of a manned antigravity craft. Yet before examining this project, let us study subsequent developments made by Brown that greatly improved the propulsion force of his technology.

ONWARD AND UPWARD

3.1 THE PARIS EXPERIMENTS

Skeptics had claimed that Brown's flying discs were propelled entirely by ion wind pressure and would lose their propulsive force if tested in a vacuum chamber where few air molecules would be present, but in 1955 and 1956, they were proved wrong. Under the sponsorship of the French government, Brown conducted a series of vacuum chamber experiments at facilities made available by Société Nationale du Constructions Aeronautiques du Sud-Ouest, a Paris-based aeronautical corporation. There, he successfully flew a pair of miniature saucer airfoils in a high vacuum of less than one billionth of an atmosphere. Not only did the discs propel themselves more efficiently, but they also sped faster, since, without ion leakage, they could be energized with greater voltages. The tests used a 200-watt power source to supply DC potentials ranging from 70 to 220 kilovolts.[1] Few details are known about these tests because the results were considered a confidential matter. However, it appears the discs measured about 4 to 5 inches in diameter and had a central body made of solid aluminum.[2,3] By comparison, the 1.5- and 3-foot-diameter discs that Brown had tested in his carousel demonstration were made of Plexiglas and lightweight sheet aluminum.

In addition to these miniature airfoils, Brown conducted vacuum chamber tests of a rotor apparatus. (Appendix D presents one of his reports on this experiment.[4]) The apparatus consisted of an arm that rotated about a central bearing and that was fitted at each end with a pair of electrodes (figure 3.1). When the electrodes were oppositely charged, the rotor spun like a pinwheel, revolving around its axis in the negative-to-positive direction. It was found that the torque increased in an exponential fashion with applied voltage. At times when a stream of electrons would discharge from the negative to the positive plate, the rotor would acquire a momentary burst of forward thrust. At around 150 kilovolts, the rate of rotation became so great after four or five discharges that the voltage had to be reduced for fear that the rotor might fly apart and shatter its glass bell-jar enclosure. Moreover, Brown found that the thrust persisted even when the capacitor elements were each surrounded by Plexiglas enclosures in the manner shown in figure 3.1. Since there was no way that ions could escape from the enclosures, ion thrust could be ruled out as a motive force. He also used asymmetrical capacitors having electrodes of differing sizes in which either the positive plate was larger than the negative or the negative plate was larger than the positive. However, neither of these geometries had any appreciable effect on the amount of thrust generated by the discharge events.

In February 1973, Dr. Rolf Schaffranke, who wrote the book Ether Technology under the pseudonym Rho Sigma, received a letter from Brown responding to inquiries he had made about Brown's Paris experiments.[5] In that letter Brown disclosed that the thrust on the rotor was several orders of magnitude larger than ion thrust could account for. He also related to Schaffranke that he had obtained a greater thrust when a massive high-K dielectric such as barium titanate was placed between the capacitor plates. He also acknowledged that a residual thrust was obtained even when there were no discharges, clear evidence of the existence of a Biefeld-Brown electrogravitic effect.

Several effects could explain why very large thrusts accompanied each discharge event. As one possibility, the volley of high-energy electrons that formed the spark discharge could have delivered an electrogravitic impulse to the positive electrode. The electron burst would have moved from the negative to the positive electrode of the sparking rotor capacitor at close to the speed of light. That is, in the prevailing hard vacuum, electrons accelerated by a 150-kilovolt potential would have attained a velocity of about 82 percent of the speed of light. Subquantum kinetics predicts that these free electrons would have generated a local gravity potential hill, and as they flew toward the positive electrode, they would have carried this gravity potential hill with them. In the rotor rest frame, this would have appeared as a forward-propagating gravity potential wave. The sharp potential rise at the leading edge of this wave would have had a matter-repelling effect, which would have given a thrust impulse in the negative-to-positive direction as it momentarily passed through the positive electrode mass and any intervening dielectric. This electrogravitic impulse effect is further discussed in chapter 6 in connection with the gravity beam experiments of the Russian materials scientist Eugene Podkletnov.

The nonlinear field gradient associated with each spark could also have contributed to the thrust. Brown observed that the discharges were emitted from a point on his negative electrode and fanned out to produce a broad luminescence on his positive electrode. In other words, regardless of the size of his positive electrode, whether it was a 4-inch disc or a half-inch sphere, the field produced from the discharge would have fanned out from a small high-flux-density region to a larger low-density region. The fanning geometry of the discharge and the sudden onset of the discharge would momentarily have produced a nonlinear electric field between the capacitor plates. This in turn would have generated a large virtual-charge gradient between the capacitor electrodes along with an accompanying gravity potential gradient that would have momentarily induced a large thrust on the capacitor dielectric in the direction of the positive electrode, where the field's flux density would have been lowest. We will defer further discussion of such virtual charge electrogravitic effects until section 4.2 of the next chapter.

Brown's work as a consulting physicist for Société Nationale de Constructions Aeronautiques du Sud-Ouest came to an end in 1956, when the company merged with a larger company, Sud Est, that apparently had no interest in electrogravitics. That summer he returned to the United States with all his papers and took up residence in Washington, D.C.* There, he contacted the Navy, hoping to show them his Paris data, which proved that their earlier ion wind theory was wrong. He was met by Admiral Rickover, but instead of showing interest in Brown's results, the admiral sternly advised him not to take his electrogravitics work any further, that it would be best if he dropped it.[6] Nevertheless, by the end of 1956, the Pentagon had begun sponsoring electrogravitics research that was then in progress at some of the major aerospace firms and had apparently elevated the matter to a top-secret status. Was Brown, the father of this amazing technology, to be excluded from the inner circle of companies chosen to develop his ideas?

Brown was unwilling to give up that easily. He continued his work under the sponsorship of a Delaware company he had formed called Whitehall-Rand Corporation, which had offices in both Washington and London. He probably chose the name Whitehall to allude to the executive branch of the British government, which is based largely on Whitehall Street in London. In July 1957, while serving as its director of research and development, he protected his electric disc and flame-jet-driven aircraft ideas by applying for three U.S. patents (2,949,550; 3,018,394; and 3,022,430). When these were issued, in 1960 and 1962, they were assigned to Whitehall-Rand. Brown was the only contributor of patents to this company.

*By the end of August, Brown had founded the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena (also known as NICAP), a UFO research organization that at the time was the largest and most influential of such organizations. Nevertheless, four months later, as a result of a disagreement over what the organization's objectives should be, he was forced to resign as its director, the position being subsequently filled by Major Donald E. Keyhoe.

3.2 ■ OVERUNITY LEVITATION

In the fall of 1957, Brown teamed up with Dr. Frank King and Agnew Bahnson Jr., who also had a strong interest in antigravity research. Bahnson, an industrialist from Winston-Salem, North Carolina, had in 1956 played an instrumental role in establishing the Institute of Field Physics at the University of North Carolina, an organization dedicated to the study of gravitation. Having a longtime interest in Brown's electrostatic antigravity propulsion work, Bahnson constructed a well-equipped private laboratory in Winston-Salem and invited Brown down as consultant to work with himself and King. Beginning in November 1957 and continuing for several years, the three carried out electrogravitics research on various kinds of "ballistic electrode" saucer models. Bahnson kept a record of their work in a series of laboratory notebooks, and some of this was reviewed by Charles Yost in the second issue of Electric Spacecraft Journal.[7] This work led Brown and Bahnson to file a series of U.S. patent applications in May 1958: an "electrokinetic apparatus" patent awarded to Brown in June 1965 (3,187,206) and two "electrical thrust producing device" patents awarded to Bahnson in 1960 and 1966 (2,958,790 and 3,263,102).

That same year, Brown and his friends organized a company called Rand International Limited, with Brown serving as its president. Together, they carried on electrogravitics experiments and applied for more than seventy-five patents in twelve major countries (the United States, Australia, Canada, France, Belgium, Great Britain, Germany, Holland, Italy, Japan, Sweden, and Switzerland).

It was around this time that Brown succeeded in developing a 15-inch-diameter, dome-shaped saucer that was capable of levitating its own weight! Kitselman, Brown's mathematician friend, related that he had contacted Brown after being out of touch with him for several years and was told, "The lift isn't just 1 percent any longer; the apparatus will now lift 110 percent of its own weight!" Kitselman and his wife immediately flew to Washington and with their own eyes saw a moderately heavy gadget made of metal and Pyrex lift itself right up when 50 kilovolts of electricity were applied and float steadily when a slightly lower voltage was used.[8]

In an April 1973 letter to Schaffranke, Brown confirmed that he had performed this demonstration but indicated that he had conducted experiments throughout the entire voltage range from 50 to 250 kilovolts DC. Illustrating his letter with the sketch depicted in figure 3.2, Brown wrote:

> Mr. Kitselman witnessed an experiment utilizing a 15" circular, dome-shaped aluminum electrode, wired and energized as in the attached sketch. When the high voltage was applied, this device, although tethered by wires from the high voltage equipment, did rise in the air, lifting not only its own weight but also a small balance weight which was attached to it on the underside. It is true that this apparatus would exert a force of upward of 110% of its weight.[9]

In a November 1, 1971, letter written to electrical engineer Tom Turman to respond to some of Turman's questions, Brown described tests on an 18-inch-diameter disc that lifted 125 percent of its weight:

> We used a triarcuate ballistic electrode as the anode and a small electrode underneath as the cathode . . . The large electrode was made of a balsa umbrella-like frame with aluminum foil covering. A thin glass stand-off insulator mounted the cathode as shown in the drawing [drawing shown in appendix A]. The lift of this unit at 170 kv was > about 125 grams. The electrode structure itself weighed only about 100 grams, so it was actually self-levitating.[10]

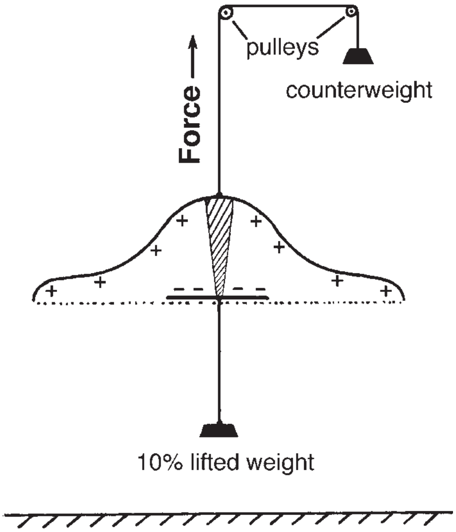

Figure 3.2. A cross-sectional view of a model electrogravitic saucer that was capable of sustained levitation. (Brown, April 5, 1973, letter written to R. Schaffranke)

The report titled “Electrohydrodynamics,” issued in March 1960 by the Electrokinetics Corporation, presents a diagram of this 18-inch-diameter test model that shows that a toroidal air current vortex was generated beneath the arcuate electrode when the electrode was electrified (figure 3.3).[11] It notes that this vortex was an effective aerodynamic pattern for inducing lift, although vacuum chamber tests that were conducted showed that any momentum that may have been imparted by this ion wind would have been many orders of magnitude too small to account for the observed thrust. The report notes that hydrostatic pressure exerted against the entire inner surface of the large arcuate electrode resulted in a lift force.

In a second letter to Turman, Brown drew cross-sectional views showing how the hydrostatic air pressure is distributed beneath the positively charged electrode for differing inclinations of the negative electrode (see figure 3.4).[12] The pressure was found to be up to 0.25-inch water gauge (~0.64 gram per cm^2) and more positive below the electrode than in the disc’s immediate surroundings. Estimating from Brown’s sketch, the positive pressure beneath the positive electrode would have averaged about 0.1 inch water gauge, or about 0.25 gram per cm^2. An 18-inch-diameter saucer would have had a cross-sectional area of 1640 cm^2; hence, this pressure would have imparted an upward force of up to 400 grams, more than enough to support the 125-gram weight.

Commenting on various means of steering or stabilizing the flight of such a saucer, Brown wrote:

> It was found that, by canting the center electrode, the pressures could be unbalanced so that one side or the other could be lifted. This could provide horizontal stability in a large prototype. An alternate way of doing this is to provide three independent electrodes in triangular configuration instead of one center electrode. These electrodes can be differently charged in order to change the electric field configuration under the ballistic canopy and this did away with the necessity for a mechanical moving part. Horizontal stability could be maintained entirely electrically.[13]

Brown recognized that the forces involved may not be just electrogravitic, but may also involve a more conventional electrostatic force phenomenon such as electrophoresis (the force exerted on a charged particle in the presence of electric fields) or dielectrophoresis (the force exerted on dielectric materials in the presence of nonuniform electric fields). He referred to this new field of study generally as electrohydrodynamics—the study of high-intensity electric field phenomena and their influence on nonconducting (dielectric) media. He regarded this area of investigation to be the counterpart to the more widely known field of magnetohydrodynamics. Electrokinetics Corporation's "Electrohydrodynamics" report also describes vacuum chamber tests in which a 6-inch-diameter ballistic electrode saucer was made to levitate when energized at 150 kilovolts DC, the lift force reaching a detectable level above 10 kilovolts. The graph reproduced in figure 3.5 indicates how thrust and input electric current were found to vary as air pressure was decreased, with the supplied DC voltage being kept constant.[14] The report notes that when the pressure fell moderately below one atmosphere, current rose catastrophically and went off-scale when the pressure had decreased to about a hundredth of an atmosphere (10 mm of mercury). At these low pressures, the air spontaneously ionized, producing a glow discharge that shorted out the electrodes. As a result, the electrogravitic thrust plummeted, only to reappear when the pressure had dropped to the very low value of 4 × 10^{-6} atmospheres (0.003 mm of mercury). At and below this hard vacuum pressure, the glow discharge diminished, along with a precipitous drop in current to the device. Significantly, the graph demonstrates that thrust remained constant at 17 grams (0.6 g/cm^2), despite the major drop in supplied current. The report states:

> A significant feature of the curves is that, except for this limitation [the glow discharge gap], thrust remains constant with the reduction > in pressure to 10^{-6} mm of Hg, while current consumption falls off sharply—demonstrating the system's improved efficiency as a hard vacuum is approached.

> For this reason the strong indication remains that thrust results primarily from electrostatic field stresses, rather than plasma flow. Thus electrohydrodynamics may prove more efficient in a hard vacuum (10^{-12} mm of Hg) than in air where the induced plasma actually seems to result in unnecessary power consumption.[15]

Because the rate of ion flux passing between the electrodes of the device correlates with current, the ion wind should accordingly have dropped precipitously with the drop in current. Hence, the data clearly demonstrate that the source of the observed thrust is due not to ion wind, as critics often charged, but rather to some other force. This raises a question in regard to the canopy pressure measurements described in chapter 2. In the vacuum chamber tests, there would have been no vortical ion movement below the positive electrode, nor any air-induced pressure differential of the sort proposed in explaining the operation of the aero-marine vertical takeoff vehicle. The suggestion in the "Electrohydrodynamics" report that the upward thrust results from "electrostatic field stresses" is explored later in this chapter.

Another test, presumably carried out with a larger electrode and energized at a higher voltage, achieved even greater thrusts:

> Laboratory devices weighing 100 grams (approx. 3.5 ounces) less power source have produced a thrust of 110 grams, for an electrical power expenditure of 500 watts (250,000 volts @ 2.0 milliamperes). This experiment was performed in air (1 atmosphere). Supplementary research indicates much greater efficiency results (same thrust for less power input) when operated in a vacuum (10^{-4} mm Hg or better), when the current drops to about 2.0 microamperes.[16]

Here, the report makes the astounding disclosure that under hard vacuum conditions, a force of 110 grams (1.1 newtons) could be achieved for a power expenditure of just 0.5 watt (250,000 volts times 2×10^{-6} amps), or 2,200 newtons of thrust per kilowatt. This is about 150 times the thrust-to-power ratio of a jet engine! Also, it is 10,000 times greater than the thrust-to-power ratio of a space shuttle main engine. The report notes that under harder vacuum conditions of 10^{-12}mmHg, such as exist in space, Brown's electrokinetic propulsion device would be expected to achieve even higher efficiencies due to a further reduction in ion leakage power consumption. The report also compared the observed thrust with that of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's (NASA) ion propulsion engine, which weighed ten times as much as Brown's saucer and produced only 28 grams of force for an input power of 1,200 watts, or just 0.23 newton per kilowatt. Hence, NASA's ion propulsion engine was 10,000 times less efficient than Brown's electrokinetic disc.

These measurements of thrust indicated that the force lifting Brown's electrified disc was almost 100 million times greater than what could reasonably be generated by an ion wind. For example, an upward thrust of 110 grams is equivalent to a force of about 10^5 dynes. By comparison, a 2-microampere ion wind resulting from electrons accelerated in a 250-kilovolt potential would yield a force of somewhat over 10^{-3} dynes, almost 100 million times less than the lift produced by Brown's apparatus.

Ion Wind Force

The upper-limit estimate for ion wind force may be arrived at through the following calculation: An electron current of 2×10^{-6} amps would comprise an ion wind flux of $\Phi = 1.25 \times 10^{13}$ electrons per second. A voltage drop of 250,000 volts would accelerate these particles to a velocity $v = 2.96 \times 10^{10}$ cm/sec, or 0.988c, which would yield a Lorentz factor of $\gamma = 6.6$. The ion wind force, or electron momentum flux, would equal $F = 9.1 \times 10^{-28}$ g/electron $\bullet \gamma \bullet \Phi \bullet v = 2.2 \times 10^{-3}$ dynes. If the ion wind was made up of aluminum ions instead of electrons, the resulting force would be only thirty-eight-fold greater. By comparison, the lifting force Brown observed amounted to 110 gm • 980 cm/sec^2 = 1.08×10^5 dynes.

This vertical-lift device performed much better than the tethered electrokinetic discs that Brown flew in his demonstration for Will Cady, the scientist from the ONR. It developed fourteen times greater thrust when electrified at a voltage that was more than five times higher. Also, it consumed thirty times less power when operated under vacuum conditions.

Moreover, Brown's apparatus would have yielded a far greater thrust if it had used barium titanate for its dielectric instead of Pyrex. Barium titanate ceramics can have a dielectric constant, K, of around 5,000 when charged with a DC potential, but when rapidly charged and discharged at frequencies of hundreds of megahertz, its K value may drop to about 50. The lower value may be the more relevant here because, as discussed in section 3.4 of this chapter, it appears that he was cyclically varying the voltage potential across the plates of his electrokinetic apparatus at frequencies of around 750 megahertz to maintain a high thrust condition. The "Electrohydrodynamics" report notes that thrust on the electrokinetic apparatus was observed to increase directly with the K value of the dielectric and according to the square (or in some cases the cube) of the applied voltage. Consequently, a dielectric having a K equal to 50, which is about twelve times greater than the dielectric constant for Pyrex, would produce a twelvefold-greater thrust. Also considering that barium titanate has a mass density 2.7 times that of Pyrex, it should develop a proportionately greater thrust when subject to a gravitational gradient. So, one might expect overall a thirty-two-fold improvement, allowing Brown's apparatus to generate a phenomenally high levitating force of about 3.5 kilograms! If this high-K dielectric device consumed only half a watt of power, its thrust-to-power ratio would have had the unusually high value of 70,000 newtons per kilowatt, almost five thousand times that of a jet engine.

The measurements reporting a power consumption of only half a watt may have been referring to just the DC power consumption. If substantially greater power was needed to establish an AC field across the apparatus, then the thrust-to-power ratio value estimated above would have to be reduced accordingly. If tests were conducted with barium titanate, curiously, they are not mentioned in the report.

Brown probably did not openly discuss such test results because they were so phenomenal. If reports were written, it is possible that they are currently classified.

Consider the usefulness of this technology for spaceflight. Suppose that a high-K electrokinetic thruster was able to achieve a thrust-to-power ratio of 70,000 newtons per kilowatt. Energized by a 3-kilowatt power source, a bank of 6,000 asymmetrical capacitors could develop a thrust of 21 metric tons (210,000 newtons), enough to propel a small, 100-ton spacecraft to Mars in just over five days. Using chemical or nuclear rocket propulsion, the same trip would require anywhere from five to seven months and demand a far greater fuel load. If this 100-ton spacecraft were placed in space and left to accelerate under the influence of this 0.21-g force (21 tons/100 tons), its propulsion efficiency would increase linearly with time. By the end of one second, when it had attained a velocity of about 2 meters per second, its propulsion efficiency would already have reached 7,000 percent.* Moreover, its efficiency would continue to increase tenfold with every additional tenfold increase in flight time. Because kinetic energy far in excess of the inputted electric energy appears to be created out of nowhere, Brown's device, by its nature, violates the first law of thermodynamics. Such iconoclastic results become the new norm when one steps into the era of field propulsion.

3.3 ■ NONLINEAR FIELDS

Unlike his tethered flying disc models, Brown's levitating saucer models had no bumper wires for generating positive and negative ions. An idea of how they achieved their high antigravity thrust was put forth in Brown's "electrokinetic apparatus" patent, filed in 1958 and awarded in 1965, which discussed the assembly shown in figure 3.6. The patent attributes the thrust of the device to its ability to produce a nonlinear field gradient between its positive and negative electrodes, the gradient being steeper at the negative electrode than at the positive electrode. This was accomplished by curving the upper, positively charged surface into the form of a parabaloid and by reducing the size of the negative electrode. The negative electrode was pictured either as a small-diameter sphere or as a disc placed at the positive electrode's geometrical focus. Regarding the importance of having a nonlinear field gradient across the dielectric member, Brown wrote:

*A 0.21-g accelerating force will accelerate a 100-ton craft at the rate of 206 cm/s^2. After one second, this craft will attain a velocity of about 2 m/sec and have a kinetic energy of $E_k = 2.1 \times 10^{12}$ ergs. During this second, the craft's 3-kilowatt electric power consumption, E_e, would have resulted in a total energy consumption of 3,000 joules, or $E_e = 3 \times 10^{10}$ ergs. Hence, the propulsion efficiency would equal $\varepsilon = E_k/E_e = 7{,}060$ percent.

> I have discovered that if two electrodes are mounted on opposite ends of a dielectric member, and a field emanates from these electrodes which produces a linear gradient through the dielectric member as shown by dotted line 30 of FIGURE 3 [dashed line in figure 3.6], then no thrust is produced by the dielectric member. However, if the field is distorted to produce a nonlinear gradient such as graphically represented by line 32 in FIGURE 3 [solid line in figure 3.6], then a thrust will be produced which thrust will be related to the degree of nonlinearity of the field gradient. One way to produce a gradient which varies nonlinearly is to shape one of the electrodes in a form of an arcuate surface . . .[17]

Brown's patent suggests that the electric field gradient could also be made nonlinear by using a conical dielectric member that tapers toward the negative electrode or one whose dielectric constant K progressively changes along its length, that is, one that preferably decreases toward the negative electrode. It also points out that the force is directed from a region where the electric flux density is high toward a region where the electric flux density is low. For example, it states:

> By attaching a pair of electrodes to opposite ends of a dielectric member and connecting a source of high electrostatic potential to these electrodes, a force is produced in the direction of one electrode provided that electrode is of such configuration to cause the lines-of-force to converge steeply upon the other electrode. The force, therefore, is in a direction from the region of high flux density toward the region of low flux density, generally in the direction through the axis of the electrodes. The thrust produced by such a device is present if the electrostatic field gradient between the two electrodes is nonlinear. This nonlinearity of gradient may result from a difference in the configuration of the electrodes, . . . from the shape of the dielectric member, from a gradient in the density, electric conductivity, electric permittivity and magnetic permeability of the dielectric member, or a combination of these factors.[18]

Brown often emphasized that nonlinear electric fields were central to the phenomenon. In a letter to Turman in 1968, he wrote that this 1965 patent held the key to understanding electrogravitics:*

> The Patent No. 3,187,206 contains the essential teaching in electrogravitics. A definition of the electrogravitic force might be "the ponderomotive force developed within a high-K dielectric under electrical strain." The patent teaches the use of nonlinear electric fields such as those internally developed in truncated cones of dielectric material. . . . The belief that the phenomenon is gravitic in nature is based almost entirely upon the appearance of the effects of mass (in the dielectric material) on the force exhibited.[19]

Brown did not elaborate as to why a nonlinear electric field would produce increased thrust. He arrived at his conclusions from careful observation but offered no theory to account for them. However, by extending the theory described in chapter 1 for the electrogravitic effects of charge densities, it should be possible to gain an understanding of how nonlinear electric fields might boost a capacitor's electrogravitic thrust. This involves understanding how a nonlinear field would produce a virtual-charge-density gradient across a dielectric and how this gradient, in turn, would generate a gravity field gradient. A virtual charge is a charge source, like an electron or proton, but is one that is not associated with any particle. It instead arises from the ambient electric field continuum whenever that field varies with distance in a nonlinear manner.

*This and other letters that Brown wrote to Tom Turman are reproduced in appendix A.

This virtual-charge concept is most easily understood within the "ether physics" context presented in the next chapter. Thus we will defer discussing the virtual-charge electrogravitic thrust effects on Brown's electrokinetic apparatus until after the subquantum kinetics ether concept has been introduced. It should be noted here, however, that with sufficient field nonlinearity, the electrogravitic thrust effects produced by virtual charges could far exceed those produced by the real charges being applied to the capacitor plates.

Part of the thrust developed by Brown's electrokinetic apparatus would also have been produced by unbalanced electrostatic forces acting on the charges on the capacitor's plates. An unbalanced residual force would have been present because the capacitor's nonlinear electric field would have exerted more force on the smaller electrode than on the larger electrode. Such a residual force would be absent in a conventional capacitor having equal-size electrodes. Such capacitors establish a linear electric field across their dielectric when charged, the electric potential gradient being the same at their negative pole as at their positive pole. The electric field gradient being created across the charged capacitor, then, would electrostatically attract the capacitor's negatively charged electrode toward the field's positive pole and the capacitor's positively charged electrode toward the field's negative pole. Because both capacitor plates would carry the same surface charge density and be subject to the same field gradient, these two attractive forces would be equal to and opposite one another. Hence, the capacitor would experience a compressive force pushing the plates in toward the dielectric. However, since these forces would balance one another, the capacitor as a whole would experience no net translatory motion. In this force analysis, we assume that the capacitor's electric field is anchored neither to the capacitor's charges nor to the capacitor's plates, but rather resides in the capacitor's environs as an independent entity capable of exerting forces on the very same charges that created it.

Now, let us instead consider an asymmetrical capacitor of the kind that Brown used in his electrokinetic saucer experiments, one whose positive electrode is larger than its negative electrode (figure 3.7). The electric field across this type of capacitor varies with distance in a nonlinear fashion, the electric flux density and field gradient being highest at the capacitor's negative pole and lowest at its positive pole. Suppose the capacitor is in a vacuum and, hence, has no ionic charges around it. The electric field established in the vicinity of the lower negative electrode would induce an attractive force on the negative charges gathered there, which would be directed upward toward the electric field's positive pole. Also, the electric field established in the vicinity of the upper positive electrode end of the dielectric would induce an attractive force on the positive charges gathered there, which would be directed downward toward the field's negative pole (figure 3.7). However, since the electric field lines converge toward the negative electrode, the field gradient would be stronger there as compared with the positively charged end of the dielectric. Consequently, the force pulling the lower end of the dielectric upward would be greater than the force pulling the upper end of the dielectric downward. As a result, the capacitor as a whole would experience a net force directed upward toward its larger electrode.

Moreover, the force vectors on the upper electrode would have only a fraction of their total force directed downward. The more peripheral regions of the positive electrode that make up most of the electrode's surface would have their force vectors angled inward, toward the dielectric axis, with a lesser vector component being directed downward (see figure 3.7). It then becomes clear why Brown fashioned his upper electrode into an umbrella-like arcuate shape, so that it curved downward to enclose all or most of the dielectric column. This pulled a greater number of positive charges toward the electrode's periphery and changed the direction of the attractive forces affecting those upper electrode charges, causing their vectors to be angled more horizontally, perpendicular to the dielectric axis. Thus the downward force on the upper electrode would be less than the upward force on the lower electrode both because the upper electrode force magnitudes would be less and because they would be vectored so that only a portion of their thrust would be aimed downward.

Such unbalanced electrostatic forces would produce a thrust toward the larger electrode even if the capacitor's polarity was reversed. This is because the direction of the residual electrostatic force is not linked to plate polarity, but to the direction in which the electric field diverges. The directional dependence for this electrostatic thrust differs from that for the electrogravitic thrust which, as explained in the previous section, is always directed toward the positive electrode. So, depending on the polarity of the DC field across the asymmetrical capacitor, the unbalanced electrostatic thrust would either reinforce or oppose the electrogravitic thrust.

In his patent, Brown mentions that his asymmetrical electrokinetic apparatus always produces a thrust toward its larger electrode, even when the electrode polarity is reversed, although he mentions that the thrust is greater when the larger electrode is positive rather than negative. This suggests that the electrogravitic force is being overpowered by the unbalanced electrostatic thrust that depends on field geometry rather than plate polarity. However, his statements here appear to be referring to the case where his thruster is energized with a DC potential. He does not comment on the correlation of thrust direction with plate polarity when an AC field is energizing the apparatus.

In responding to the unbalanced electrostatic force, the upward movement of Brown's electrokinetic apparatus would occur with no recoil displacement of the electric field it was generating. In fact, as the apparatus moves upward, the charges that generate this field would also move upward, so the field would move upward as well. Thus, by means of this unbalanced force effect, Brown's saucer, so to speak, "picks itself up by its own bootstraps."

Standard physics is somewhat split over the issue of whether a field might exist as an independent entity. For example, most would agree that electromagnetic waves propagate as entities independent of the displaced charges that first created them. However, the notion that an electrostatic field exists independently of the charges creating it poses a problem for theories that view electrostatic attraction as being mediated by entities such as virtual particles that are "mechanically" ejected and subsequently absorbed with a momentum recoil at the time of ejection and an equal and opposite momentum transfer at the time of absorption.

Subquantum kinetics, however, avoids this source-to-target momentum exchange requirement. According to subquantum kinetics, charges are able to create an electric field without suffering any momentum recoil from the effect that this field might produce on other charges. In other words, the source charges are blind to the consequences of the field they are producing. Also, when the field's voltage gradient accelerates these other charges, they respond with no recoil being transferred back to the field. In the familiar case of repulsion between two like-charged particles, each particle acquires its repulsive impulse by responding to the other particle's field with no recoil momentum being imparted to the field itself. This reactionless electrostatic thrust idea is generally consistent with a similar idea independently advanced by French inventor Jean-Claude Lafforgue (see discussion in chapter 4). The existence of electrostatic thrust in asymmetrical capacitors has been demonstrated in tests of devices developed by Lafforgue, which are reviewed in chapter 12.

As the nonlinearity and steepness of the applied voltage gradient increase, so too does the net thrust developed from the unbalanced electrostatic forces. The magnitude of the induced electrostatic force also depends on the amount of charge stored on the capacitor's plates. This explains why Brown emphasized using a high-K dielectric. For a given voltage differential, high-K dielectrics are able to store up more electric charge on their end electrodes, the amount of charge being directly proportional to their K factor. With a greater charge load, the plates are able to generate a proportionately greater unbalanced attractive force with respect to the ambient field. In agreement with this, the "Electrohydrodynamics" report states that under vacuum, the thrust on the triarcuate electrode was observed to increase in direct proportion to the K of the dielectric, that is, in proportion to the stored charge; recall the previous section.

Increasing the voltage across the dielectric would also cause the dielectric to store more charge because its ability to store charge is directly proportional to the applied voltage differential. At the same time, the higher voltage would increase the electric potential gradient across the capacitor and thereby augment the inward attractive force acting on each of its electrodes. Hence, for a given field geometry, a given increase in voltage should produce a far greater increase in thrust. Indeed, Brown found that the thrust on his saucer varied as the square or cube of voltage.

When Brown's electrokinetic apparatus was operated in an atmosphere, ionic forces also played a role, although in view of the results of the vacuum chamber tests described in the "Electrohydrodynamics" report, such forces could not have been very significant. Positive ions tended to be emitted on the underside of the canopy, the side facing the negative electrode, and they produced an upward-repelling force on the positive charges in the canopy. Also, negative ions emitted from the lower, negative electrode produced a negative space charge located somewhat above this electrode. This repelled the negative charges in that electrode, producing a force directed inward toward the electrode and angled downward. It is difficult to say whether the force produced by the upward-repelling positive ionic charges prevailed over the force produced by the downward-repelling negative ionic charges to produce a net upward thrust. Ionic forces appear to be more important in understanding the operation of the lifter devices that are described in chapter 12.

To summarize, electrostatic forces on the plates of a capacitor become unbalanced when the electric field intensity varies nonlinearly with distance between the plates. The net thrust increases as the field nonlinearity increases in accordance with the teachings of Brown's patent.

3.4 ■ AC FIELDS

Careful reading of Brown's 1965 patent indicates that he proposed applying an AC voltage across the high-K dielectric of his thrust-producing device. He may have gotten a clue to energizing his dielectric with a nonlinear AC field potential as a result of studying the results of his Paris vacuum-chamber experiments. Observing that the test rotor in those experiments developed a very high electrogravitic thrust during each of its spontaneous electron discharges, it would have been natural for him to steer his research in the direction of duplicating these high-thrust conditions by rapidly charging and discharging his vertical thrust electrokinetic apparatus with a high-frequency oscillating field.

Brown's 1965 patent suggests that a cyclically varying potential would repeatedly establish a nonlinear field gradient along the length of the dielectric member and increase the resulting thrust:

> In applying potentials to these various embodiments, it has been found that the rate at which the potential is applied often influences the thrust. This is especially true where dielectric members of high dielectric constant are used and the charging time is a factor. In such cases, the field gradient changes as the charge is built up. . . . One advantageous manner of applying potential is that of employing potentials which vary cyclically.[20]

In his patent, Brown proposed applying a high-voltage AC field in the megahertz radio frequency range to a hornlike device fitted with a conical dielectric (figure 3.8). The small disc (29) at the apex of the dielectric was identified as a "half-wave radiator," and the applied AC voltage was said to be of a frequency such that a half-wavelength spans the disc's diameter.

Note that the saucers that Brown tested, which succeeded in levitating 110 to 125 percent of their own weight, also used a disc electrode attached to the tip of a central dielectric column. Hence, these devices were essentially the same design as the microwave device pictured in figure 3.8, except that their positive electrode was curved rather than conical in shape and the disc antenna was somewhat larger. So the dramatic lift Brown obtained in these experiments may have been because he was applying radio frequency AC in addition to the high-voltage DC bias potential. In describing this experiment to Kitselman, Schaffranke, and Turman, Brown never mentioned that he was also using AC. Perhaps this was the key to the practical application of his technology, and for that reason, he wished to keep that aspect proprietary.

In the case of the device shown in figure 3.2, whose canopy was 15 inches in diameter, the negative disc electrode would have been about 4 inches (i.e., 10 cm) in diameter. In the absence of an attached dielectric, it would have been most efficiently excited at a frequency of around 1.5 gigahertz to radiate a 20-centimeter wavelength. However, in this case, in which the same size disc is cemented to the apex of a dielectric cone, the dielectric changes the disc's impedance so that the antenna would be driven more efficiently at a lower frequency, say of 750 megahertz, which would be in the UHF range.* This would radiate a proportionately longer free-space wavelength of 40 centimeters. Provided that the negative disc electrode was spaced from the positively charged canopy by a quarter-wavelength distance (about 10 centimeters), the canopy (or horn) would act as a resonator cavity, allowing a 10-centimeter quarter-wavelength standing wave to build up across the two ends of its central dielectric.

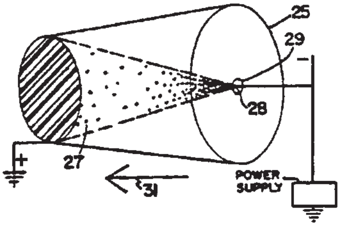

Figure 3.8. An electrokinetic apparatus proposed by Thomas Townsend Brown that used high-voltage AC to generate an electrogravitic thrust. Numbers indicate the following: positive electrode in the form of a frustrated metallic cone (25); frustrated dielectric cone (27) containing semiconducting particles near its tip (28); negative electrode in the form of a disc serving as a half-wave radiator (29); direction of electrogravitic thrust (31). (From Brown, U.S. patent 3,187,206, figure 4)

Let us suppose that the DC potential bias applied across the capacitor dielectric was chosen to be -100 kilovolts and that the AC field amplitude was adjusted to have a comparable value of 95 kilovolts and was applied so that the negative electrode potential was left free to oscillate relative to the grounded positive electrode. The net potential across the capacitor, due to the summed AC and DC potentials, then would have varied between -5 kilovolts and -195 kilovolts. As explained in the next chapter, this repeating unipolar oscillation would have generated a virtual-charge gradient across the dielectric that would have produced an oscillating unidirectional electrogravitic thrust on the apparatus.

The electrogravitic thrust would have been stronger than that achieved with DC energization alone because with such a rapid charging cycle, the dielectric would have had insufficient time to appreciably polarize in response to each voltage onset. Hence, the dielectric's opposing electrogravitic dipole moment would have been unable to build up sufficiently to cancel out the imposed electrogravitic field, allowing a maximal thrust to be exerted throughout the dielectric. Unlike Brown's gravitator, described in chapter 1, whose forward thrust progressively diminished after being initially energized, the oscillating potential applied across his electrokinetic thruster would have caused it to receive a series of rapidly recurring forward thrusts.

Brown's patent suggests that the half cycle period of the AC voltage oscillation applied to the asymmetrical capacitor's negative electrode was comparable to the time taken for this voltage change to travel across the dielectric to the capacitor's positive electrode. Under such a circumstance, the applied oscillation would increase the nonlinearity of the field spanning the dielectric and thereby boost the thrust arising from both the electrogravitic effect and the unbalanced electrostatic force effect.

*For example, copper ferrite–barium titanate composites have a dielectric constant of about 50 in the frequency range of 10^8 to 10^9 hertz, the dielectric constant of such high-K dielectrics being much lower at high frequencies than at low frequencies. Knowing that the optimal driving frequency scales as $1/\sqrt{K}$ and that the dielectric covers only a small portion of the diameter of the radiating disc, we might surmise that the optimal driving frequency would be reduced by a factor of 2 rather than 7, making it about 750 megahertz.

There is another aspect to this AC energizing that Brown did not discuss in his patent—namely, that a phase-locked stationary wave pattern would have formed beneath his disc and stored up the energy of each AC cycle. This would have created an electric and gravity potential gradient in the space around the disc that would have progressively increased over time, eventually becoming far greater than the gradient applied during any individual cycle. Tesla observed this effect in his experiments with high-voltage, high-frequency shock discharges. This important effect is well known to "black-project" engineers, who term it "field-induced soliton phenomenon." It is explored further in chapter 8, in the discussion of phase-conjugate resonance.

Rapid recurrent charging of the dielectric should also improve the thrust arising from unbalanced electrostatic forces. As the capacitor dielectric polarizes, the charges on the capacitor plates become partially neutralized by charges of opposite polarity supplied by the adjacent dielectric, so the residual thrust on the capacitor would tend to decline. By charging the plates quickly and repetitively, without any polarity reversal, the electrostatic thrust could be maintained at a maximal level.

3.5 ▪ ELECTROGRAVITICS GOES BLACK

When Brown began working on this AC electrogravitic resonator concept, he may have been getting too close to something that governments considered top secret. Around 1959, there was a substantial change in openness about antigravity research. Earlier, during the mid-1950s, aerospace companies did not hide from the public the fact that they were conducting electrogravitics R&D, although they generally kept the particulars of their own work confidential. For example, an article by A. V. Cleaver, from Rolls-Royce's Aero Engine Division, indicates that as of the beginning of 1957, secrecy had not been imposed but might be imminent. The article states, “The fact that there appears to be no very high security rating attached to it in itself suggests that definite results have not yet been achieved; if, and when, they are one would expect the usual ‘clamp’ to be tightened down.”[21]

Openness continued, even into the early part of 1958, with the subject inspiring heated discussion at a January aeronautical science meeting in New York. Just prior to the event, Product Engineering magazine carried the following news brief:

> ELECTROGRAVITICS: SCIENCE OR DAYDREAM?
> A few weeks from now, at a special session of the Institute of the Aeronautical Sciences (New York City, Jan. 27–31), a group of dedicated men will discuss what some people label pure science-fiction, but others believe is an attainable goal. The subject: electrogravitics—the science of controlling gravity.

After exploring various notions of gravity, the article finally concludes:

> Perhaps British aeronautical engineer A. V. Cleaver is right in insisting that if any anti-gravity device is to be developed the first thing needed is a new principle in fundamental physics—not just a new invention or application of known principles. Nevertheless, the Air Force is encouraging research in electrogravitics, and many companies and individuals are working on the problem.[22]

After the meeting, Business Week magazine reported the following:

> If anyone had predicted 10 years ago that a cross-section of the nation’s top physicists, aeronautical engineers, and mathematicians would be fighting for standing room to hear the chaste theory of gravity seriously challenged, he would have been labeled sun-stroked, senile, or worse.
> . . . At an opening day meeting of the Institute of Aeronautical Sciences in New York last week, however, the impossible became > possible. In record numbers—in a rush that stacked up scientists 20 deep at every entrance to the Sheraton-Astor's North Ballroom—the elite of research came to hear what it is that has reawakened scientific interest in the possibility of doing something about gravitation.

> What has happened, they wanted to know, that has caused major aircraft companies as well as the government and various universities, to start serious inquiries into the possibility of controlling gravity? How do the recent discoveries in antiproton research fit into the picture? And even more importantly, how accurate are the reports (circulated by Tass) that Russian scientists hope to turn up some sort of machinery to cancel or modify the force of gravity sometime during 1958?[23]

Business Week went on to list an impressive array of companies and institutions backing gravity research, companies such as the Glenn Martin Company, Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corporation, Lockheed Aircraft Corporation, Sperry-Rand Corporation, the Army Transportation Research and Development Command, Princeton University, the University of North Carolina, and the University of California. Hughes Aircraft should also be added to the list of organizations that by 1958 had become involved in antigravity research.[24,25]

Yet this climate of openness began to change very soon after, as companies became increasingly silent about their involvement in gravity research. In the July 1959 issue of Canadian Aviation, Charles Carew wrote, "The author has not been able to determine whether the Glenn L. Martin Corp. has discontinued its antigravity program or made a significant discovery which has elevated it to super-top-secret category, since no information about the project has recently been available."[26]

This indicated that Glenn Martin had made a decided turnabout from its unusually outspoken support of electrogravitics, evident in its vice president's statements to the press in 1955. Most probably, antigravity research had begun to be funded by the military and as a result had continued under a cloak of secrecy. This could explain the difficulty Brown had been encountering in promoting his ideas. During this period, he had been slowly and patiently giving demonstrations for the Pentagon and key aerospace companies in the United States, hoping to generate some interest in his work, but success continually eluded him. In The Philadelphia Experiment, Moore wrote that "such interest as he was able to generate seemed to melt away almost as fast as it developed—almost as if someone (or perhaps something?) was working against him."[27]

As mentioned earlier, beginning in 1957 Brown was invited to work on a consulting basis with Agnew Bahnson Jr. to investigate electrogravitic propulsion. Together with Dr. Frank King, they had explored methods of applying AC fields to electrified discs. An examination of Bahnson's laboratory notebook shows that on January 5, 1958, he had suggested to Brown a variation of the AC electric field concept.[28] Bahnson's idea was to place a parabolic metal grid between a positively charged parabolic lift canopy and a negatively charged sphere, as shown in figure 3.9. Then he applied an oscillating high-voltage field between the lift canopy and the negative sphere. He chose a megahertz frequency for this oscillating field that would establish a resonant stationary wave between the two electrodes. He hypothesized that this electrostatic stationary wave would somehow store the energy of the applied AC field in an "ether-like" energy reservoir residing in the space immediately around the test device. He felt that this resonant condition might allow the latent energy in this stationary field to be used with a minimum of power consumption. So here we see Bahnson hitting upon this same key idea of a field-induced soliton phenomenon.

Bahnson also described the use of alternating current fields in a U.S. patent that he filed in September 1964 on an electrogravitic levitation device (see figure 3.10).[29] The data in his patent indicate that his test rig had developed a thrust of 100 grams at 150 kilovolts, with thrust increasing exponentially according to the 2.6 power of voltage. This performance was comparable to the levitating rigs that Brown had tested, which again leads us to suspect that Brown was using AC to get the impressive results that his friend Kitselman had witnessed.

Shortly after Bahnson filed his patent, tragedy struck. He was killed under somewhat unusual circumstances, when his private airplane reportedly struck a high-tension wire.[30] His patent, which was issued in December 1965, was assigned to his estate. His heirs, having no interest in further developing Bahnson's antigravity work, sold his patents to another company.

Brown's electrokinetic apparatus and his electric generator patents (3,187,206 and 3,196,296) were issued several months before Bahnson's, in June and July 1965. Brown's patents were assigned to the Electrokinetics Corporation, a company that Philadelphia businessman Martin Decker had formed in collaboration with Brown to develop Brown's electrokinetic devices. The company was located in the Philadelphia suburb of Bala Cynwyd, where Decker was operating an industrial compound. This was only eight miles from the General Electric Space Center in King of Prussia, where Brown had conducted vacuum chamber experiments in 1959. Brown had consulted for Electrokinetics since the early 1960s and had received a considerable quantity of stock in the company in exchange for the assignment of his patent rights. In his biography of Brown, Schatzkin writes that in the summer of 1964, Decker had told Brown that his Electrokinetics stock had become worthless.[31] Nevertheless, the company must have continued to function, as patents of Brown's issued as late as 1967 are listed as being assigned to Electrokinetics. Some mystery appears to surround this company's circumstances.

Electrokinetics Corporation kept its electrogravitics work veiled in secrecy because in 1968, in a letter to Turman, Brown wrote, "The company to which I serve as consultant has not released some of the information you have requested and I am very much at a loss to know what to say."[32] This shroud of secrecy over Brown's work apparently continued into the 1980s because in February 1982, responding to an Illinois gentleman inquiring about the status of his work, he wrote, "I regret to advise you that electrogravitic research has been taken over in its entirety by a California corporation which has imposed secrecy—at least until their investigations are completed. No further publication or release of information is permitted, possibly until next year."[33] Was this California corporation Lockheed Martin, or was it Hughes Aircraft? Brown did not say.

After his brief consulting work for Electrokinetics in the early 1960s, Brown went into semiretirement, and by 1970 had dropped most of his applied electrogravitic work to busy himself with research on petroelectricity, or so it had seemed. Brown died of natural causes in 1985. Until the time of his death, details about the use of pulsating fields in his electrogravitics research were not forthcoming. Classification restrictions or concerns for trade secrecy presumably discouraged him from openly saying much about this aspect of his work.

Moore's biography of Brown paints a picture of someone who was ahead of his time yet not understood by most of his colleagues, of an inventor who was confronted by one discouragement after another in his attempts to secure government funding and who finally gave up electrogravitic propulsion research at the end of the 1960s. However, one source close to the Brown family indicates that this was not the case, that Brown was being kept in the loop of the secret aerospace research he had catalyzed and that the switch to petroelectricity research was primarily a cover. The public exposure he had received in the past due to media attention to his electric disc technology would have made him a potential security threat. Thus it is understandable that when the military began seriously funding his ideas, the work would have been contracted to a large aerospace company, with Brown being allowed to consult in private as long as he kept quiet about his involvement.

Although Brown was probably legitimately pursuing petroelectricity research, which also included the work he was doing at Stanford Research Institute, this openly acknowledged work must not have occupied him full time. He apparently had obtained high-level clearance and was also quietly consulting on a secret military project that was implementing his electrogravitic propulsion ideas. As described in chapter 5, Brown's electrokinetic technology was eventually incorporated into the B-2 Advanced Technology bomber, serving as its primary means of propulsion. In effect, the B-2 is the realization of the concept Brown first proposed in Project Winterhaven. Its electrogravitic technology would probably have remained a secret were it not for information leaked by a group of engineers who were part of the inner circle working on such super-secret projects.

It seems that the optimistic projections that electrogravitic vehicles would be commonly used for commercial flight have not come to pass as of the present date. Carew's investigations into the unpublicized gravity control research, being conducted all over the globe in 1959, at that time led him to believe that the technique for effectively controlling gravity would be mastered within the lifetime of his readers. The February 1956 Aviation Studies report was even more optimistic. It estimated that development of a prototype antigravity combat disc was only ten years away. It predicted that the twentieth century would be divided in half. Whereas air transport during the first half had used aerodynamic principles, heat engines, and flapping controls, it predicted that the second half would arise as a radical offshoot with no ties to past aviation science and that in this new era electrical energy would serve as the catalyst to motion. Gravity, the bitter foe in the first half of the century, would become the great provider in the second half. However, almost half a century later, we still find commercial aviation using the "sledgehammer" approach, employing jet and rocket propulsion technologies. Still, these early predictions were partially correct: gravity control did become practically applied, but not for commercial use. As described in subsequent chapters, antigravity vehicles have been developed for the military and are being flown in large numbers, but knowledge of their existence is being kept a closely guarded secret.

AN ETHERIC EXPLANATION

4.1 THE NEW "CLASSIFIED" PHYSICS

As we discussed in chapter 1, the Biefeld-Brown effect proved to be puzzling to scientists right from the start, because of its departure from prevailing theories of gravitation held by classical field theory and general relativity. Einstein's space-warping equations, for example, failed to predict a connection between electrostatics and gravitation. The following passage from Aviation Report illustrates this confusion:

> Meanwhile Glenn Martin now feels ready to say in public that they are examining the unified field theory to see what can be done. It would probably be truer to say that Martin and other companies are now looking for men who can make some kind of sense out of Einstein's equations. There's nobody in the air industry at present with the faintest idea of what it [electrogravitics] is all about.

> Aviation Report, November 19, 1954[1]

Noting that modern physics did not shed much light on the electrogravitics phenomenon, the Aviation Studies February 1956 report speculates that an answer might be forthcoming from discoveries providing new insights into the physics of subatomic particles. It suggests that atom-smasher experiments and abstruse field theory calculations might turn up useful leads.

The scientific establishment provided little help in carrying out needed basic research into electrogravitics because its members refused to believe that such an effect could exist. The complacency of the conventional scientific world pertaining to this line of investigation is typified by the response of scientists at the U.S. National Bureau of Standards Laboratory in Boulder, Colorado. Of any government scientific laboratory, this one should have made it its business to be doing basic research into electrogravitic phenomena. Yet in 1985 I asked their expert on gravity measurement, Dr. James Faller, whether he knew of anyone who had done experimental research investigating a possible coupling between charge and gravitational mass. He replied that he knew of no such research. When I asked him why no one had carried out such a study, he answered, "Because there has been no interest."

Nevertheless, since 1956, when the Aviation Studies "Electrogravitics Systems" report was written, there have been vast improvements both in understanding the theory behind the electrogravitics phenomenon and in developing hardware, but most of this work has been carried out in Air Force black projects. In 1992, I had an interesting telephone conversation with a man who is one of the group of informants mentioned in chapter 5 whose stunning revelations about the B-2 bomber were published in Aviation Week & Space Technology. Although he gave me his full name, I will identify him as Ray for reasons of confidentiality. Ray claimed to have worked on a number of black R&D projects and to have been in contact with certain other black-world researchers.[2] He told me that the physics theories that academics and most laboratory physicists currently understand, teach, and write about are grossly in error. A very advanced and much more accurate theoretical framework has been developed by scientists of the black-programs community, but its fundamentals presently remain classified. From the standpoint of this new physics, modern physics concepts used in the conventional world, such as relativity theory, quantum electrodynamics, and quantum mechanics are referred to as "classical concepts," that is, they are regarded as terribly outdated.

According to Ray, unlike today's "classical" physics, the new physics does not begin with physical observables in developing its treatment of physical phenomena. Rather, it postulates the existence of an underlying reality consisting of an inherently unobservable subtle substance called an ether, or alternatively aether, which fills all space. It then defines all of its fundamental quantities at that subphysical level. Physical observables then emerge as mathematical solutions to equations defined in terms of these more basic ether processes. This new physics regards time and space as absolutes and views Einstein's notion of relative time and space as fundamentally incorrect. Physically observable phenomena, such as length contraction and clock retardation, which relativists normally interpret as alterations of the space-time continuum, emerge as manifestations resulting from motion through the absolute ether. Thus, the ether concept, so long spurned by the academic establishment, turns out to be central to this highly classified new physics.

Ray said that this ether physics embraces Brown's electrogravitics phenomenon as well as key research that Brown conducted while he was with the Navy, documents of which have remained highly classified. Perhaps he was referring to work Brown did in connection with the Philadelphia Experiment. Ray stated that this physics also embraces phenomena discovered by Tesla. Among other things, Tesla is known for his work with resonant AC circuits and with techniques for producing unconventional shock discharge Coulomb waves, sometimes called longitudinal waves. As described in chapter 1, the electrogravitic waves that Brown was producing with his communication device were of this sort. How Tesla's work relates to antigravity propulsion is further discussed in chapter 6.

As mentioned earlier, conventional physics is at a total loss to account for the Biefeld-Brown effect. Nor does string theory, with its ten-plus dimensional spaces, offer any insights, and now, after its forty-year reign, many physicists have become disenchanted with it, leaving the search open once again for a unified field theory that will work.[3,4] As of this time there has been no public disclosure of the classified ether physics or of how it explains electrogravitics. However, there is one very promising theory that we can talk about and that does predict many aspects of the electrogravitic phenomenon. This is the ether physics of subquantum kinetics.[5–11] Unlike string theory, which never resulted in any testable prediction, subquantum kinetics has to date had twelve a priori predictions verified, outdoing most standard field theories.*

Let us take a moment to review something about this new approach and examine how it accounts for the mysterious gravitational thrust that Brown was observing. Subquantum kinetics is an approach to microphysics that is based upon discoveries made in recent years in the disciplines of general system theory, nonequilibrium thermodynamics, and nonlinear dynamics. It was inspired from research carried out in the late twentieth century on certain types of nonequilibrium reaction systems that have the ability to spontaneously self-organize wave patterns of precise wavelength. Problems such as wave-particle dualism, field-source dualism, infinite energy absurdity, naked singularities, the cosmological constant conundrum, the wave packet dispersion problem, and many others that plague conventional physics do not appear in subquantum kinetics because it represents quantum phenomena in a very different way.

Like the classified physics of the black-project world, subquantum kinetics begins with an ether as its point of departure. It conceives quantum structures, such as subatomic particles and energy waves, to be concentration patterns that emerge in a primordial reaction-diffusion ether, one whose constituents both diffuse through space and react among one another according to a specified set of nonequilibrium reaction processes. This subtle medium is postulated to extend throughout space and to be composed of subquantum units, called etherons, that come in various types. In a similar manner, conventional physics postulates subquantum structures called quarks that come in various sorts distinguished by their "colors" and "flavors." However, subquantum kinetics, in its current Model G formulation, uses far fewer types of etherons as compared with the number of quarks that physics postulates. Model G involves just seven types of etherons for its specification: A, B, G, X, Y, Z, and Ω. Unlike quarks, which are characteristically unreactive, these etherons are postulated to react with one another and transform from one etheron state to another according to a specified set of five reactions, which are collectively termed Model G (figure 4.1).

This reaction system is similar to the Brusselator, a two-variable reaction system developed at the Free University of Brussels, with the exception that it interposes a third variable G between the A and X reaction states, hence the name Model G. The k_i symbols in figure 4.1 are Kinetic constants that specify the rates at which each reaction proceeds forward. Together with the diffusion coefficients that describe the rate at which each etheron type diffuses through space, this set of reactions forms the essence of subquantum kinetics. The basic processes are extremely simple, yet from their interactions emerge physically realistic structures and a very rich array of behavior.

Subquantum kinetics identifies etheron concentration at any given point in space with the standard energy potential concept. In particular, an electric field characterized by a spatial variation in electric potential would correspond to a spatial variation in X and Y etheron concentration. A gravity field characterized by a spatial variation in gravity potential would correspond to a spatial variation in G etheron concentration.

Unlike traditional physics, which is founded on closed-system, mechanistic concepts, the continually reacting and transmuting reaction-diffusion ether of subquantum kinetics functions as an open system. Unlike closed systems, open systems allow the possibility for order to emerge from disorder. Under the proper conditions, the ether is able to spawn subatomic particles that have wavelike characteristics. They form spontaneously from energy fluctuations of sufficiently large magnitude that occasionally emerge from the ether's chaos. Thus, subquantum kinetics espouses a cosmology of continuous matter creation rather than a single big bang creation event.

According to subquantum kinetics, the etheron concentrations are in a state of continual fluctuation throughout space, manifesting as energy potential fluctuations. These are similar to the zero-point energy fluctuations proposed in conventional physics, except of far smaller magnitude, each being less than a quantum of action. Also, they do not necessarily arise as correlated matter–antimatter polarity fluctuations, but rather as individual unipolar pulses that can be of either positive or negative polarity.* This can manifest either as a positive polarity fluctuation—a region of high-Y and low-X ether concentration—or as a negative polarity fluctuation—a region of high-X and low-Y ether concentration.

On occasion, one such electric potential fluctuation "seed" will become large enough that over time it will grow in size and develop into a subatomic particle configured as a stationary electric potential wave pattern. The spontaneous growth of such an energy fluctuation would appear to violate the first law of thermodynamics, which holds that energy may be neither created nor destroyed. But such growth is permissible due to the open-system character of the ether, the action responsible for this growth coming from the ever-present reaction processes that underlie all particle and field phenomena. This matter creation process would occur so slowly that a well-equipped physicist would be unable to detect it in an Earth-based laboratory.

Subatomic particles would not emerge as mass points, as standard physics would conceive them, but as wave patterns configured of etheron concentrations whose magnitudes vary cyclically through space. Figure 4.2a illustrates the spherical, shell-like geometry of the X-Y wave pattern forming a proton, and figure 4.2b presents a stylized cross-sectional view of the variation of the X and Y ether concentrations in the core of a proton. This would chart the proton's electric potential field, a positive charge polarity corresponding to a high-Y/low-X core concentration. The negatively charged antiproton would have a low-Y/high-X core concentration, hence X and Y magnitudes that were of reversed polarity.

*This of course violates the conventional rule of charge conservation but is allowable in the subquantum kinetics framework when dealing with incipient zero-point fluctuations.

The wavelength of this electric field pattern would equal the particle's Compton wavelength, which is numerically equal to the wavelength of the photon that would result if the particle's rest mass was converted entirely to energy. This Compton wavelength, λ, is mathematically quantified as: $\lambda = hc/E$, where E is the rest mass energy of the particle, h is Planck's constant, and c is the velocity of light. The proton's Compton wavelength, for example, would measure just 1.32×10^{-13} centimeters. The electron's wavelength would be about two thousand times longer. Subquantum kinetics calls this wavelike field the particle's Turing wave, in honor of the British cyberneticist Alan Turing. Turing was the first to demonstrate that reaction-diffusion systems could form such wave patterns through a process he termed morphogenesis.

One of the successes of subquantum kinetics is that its prediction that the nucleon's core electric field should be contoured with a Compton wavelength periodicity was confirmed almost thirty years later by nucleon scattering experiments.[12] The quark model, by comparison, failed to anticipate the nucleon's wave character.

The standard quantum mechanical view proposes modeling the location of the subatomic particle as a wave packet, a superposition of a series of linear electromagnetic waves. It has long been recognized, however, that the wave packet has the problem that over time it spontaneously broadens and eventually disperses, leaving the particle entirely unlocalized. The subatomic particles that Model G forms, though, do not disperse over time. Their periodic ether concentration structure is continually regenerated by order-creating etheric reaction-and-diffusion processes. The cyclical transformation of X into Y and Y into X depicted in figure 4.1 is what allows the model G reaction system to create and maintain the subatomic particle's stationary wave pattern.

An analysis of the Model G reaction system indicates that there is a stable steady state in which the core Turing wave of an initially neutrally charged particle becomes biased away from its zero-charge steady state. Upon making the transition to this state, the particle acquires a unit of electric charge that allows it to create its long-range electric field. This is not an assumption; it is a characteristic that emerges as a consequence of the postulated reaction system. In a positively charged particle, for example, the electric field pattern would become positively biased at its center, its high-Y core concentration rising and its low-X core concentration falling to adopt bias levels similar to those shown in figure 4.2b. In a negatively charged particle such as an electron, the electric field pattern would instead be negatively biased, the Y core concentration being depressed and the X core concentration being elevated. Recent particle scattering observations that elucidate the charge distribution in the core of the nucleon confirm this wave pattern bias prediction.[13]

Subquantum kinetics predicts that a particle's electric charge generates its gravitational mass and associated gravity potential field through the reverse, ether reaction G ← X, which converts X etherons (X-ons) into G etherons (G-ons). Although the ether reactions shown in figure 4.1 proceed predominantly in the forward direction (to the right in the figure), such reverse reactions also exist, although they proceed at an almost negligible rate. But even though the reverse X-to-G reaction produces a very small G flux, without it particles would be unable to generate their gravity fields. Through this reaction, an increase or decrease of X arising from either a negative or a positive charge polarity translates into a corresponding increase or decrease of G. Accordingly, subquantum kinetics predicts that there should be two gravitational mass polarities, each correlated with a corresponding electric charge polarity. That is, positively charged particles such as protons, which have low X-on concentrations in their cores, should produce a central gravity potential well, while negatively charged particles such as electrons, which have high X-on concentrations in their cores, should produce a central gravity potential hill.

Consider, for example, a positively charged particle such as a proton, which would maintain a high Y-on and low X-on concentration at its center. The low X-on concentration would correspondingly reduce the rate at which G-ons were created in the center of the proton via the X-to-G reaction. In other words, the particle's positive charge would generate a corresponding positive gravitational mass; see figure 4.3. The reduced X-on and G-on core concentrations resulting from the X-on and G-on production rate deficits would induce X-ons and G-ons to diffuse inward from surrounding regions. Also, the elevated Y-on core concentration arising from the Y-on production rate surplus would induce Y-ons to diffuse radially outward to the environment. These radial diffusive fluxes would generate the long-range electric and gravity potential fields that surround the proton's core.

The electric field would consist of a 1/r decline in the particle's X-on and Y-on etheron concentration biases, and the gravity field would consist of a 1/r decline in the particle's G-on concentration bias. Both fields mathematically conform to the requirements of classical electrostatics and gravitation. Their 1/r character is not assumed ad hoc, but rather emerges as a natural consequence of radial etheron diffusion. In his Lectures on Physics, the Nobel laureate physicist Richard Feynman proposed an etheron diffusion model not too different from this as a way of understanding how a subatomic particle generates its 1/r energy potential field.[14]

These concentration biases and etheron diffusive fluxes would be just the opposite for an electron. A negatively charged particle such as an electron would maintain high X-on and G-on and low Y-on concentrations in its core, which would constitute the negative charge and negative mass state. This X-on and G-on production rate surplus would induce X-ons and G-ons to flow outward to surrounding regions and the Y-on production rate deficit would induce Y-ons to diffuse inward from the environment. These fluxes would generate the electron's long-range electric and gravity potential fields. A proton's gravity well would have a matter-attracting effect on surrounding neutral matter, while an electron's gravity hill would have a matter-repelling effect on surrounding neutral matter.

Austrian astrophysicist Sir Hermann Bondi described this gravity-field-generating mass with the term "active gravitational mass," distinguishing it from passive gravitational mass, which characterizes the particle's tendency to respond to an external gravity field, and from inertial mass, which characterizes the particle's tendency to resist changes in velocity. Electrically neutral matter, containing equal numbers of protons and electrons, would have a net positive active gravitational mass, since the proton's positive gravitational mass is slightly greater than the electron's negative gravitational mass. That is, the proton's gravity well is only partially canceled out by the electron's gravity hill, and as a result, the electrically neutral atom is left with a residual matter-attracting gravity well. Particles producing gravity wells would attract neutral matter, whereas particles producing gravity hills would repel neutral matter.

It should be kept in mind that subquantum kinetics grew out of the intention to apply chemical kinetics concepts to microphysics and the realization that a reaction kinetic ether could provide a viable framework for describing the formation of subatomic particles. I did not devise it in a concerted attempt to explain the phenomenon of electrogravitics. In fact, I was initially somewhat concerned that the theory predicted two mass polarity states, each correlated with a corresponding electric charge polarity, but was later relieved upon discovering Brown's work.

Subquantum kinetics accounts for gravitational force in terms of the action of gravity potential gradients on material bodies and not by introducing ad hoc assumptions about dimensional warping. Gravity potential fields move a particle by affecting the ether reactions that generate the particle and form its Turing wave. This reaction-kinetic approach is something quite foreign to classical physics and quantum mechanics, which consider a proton or an electron as a relatively immutable structure. Not so in subquantum kinetics. The subatomic particle's etheron population is continuously transformed and renewed. A particle's Turing wave structure is re-created every instant, as etheron diffusion balances etheron creation or dissolution at each point in space. The subatomic particle, then, maintains its field structure in a dynamic steady state, or what the Hungarian systems theorist Ludwig von Bertalanffy would call a Fliessgleichgewicht, a "patterned flow equilibrium." Or, using a term coined by the Russian Nobel laureate Ilya Prigogine, we would refer to subatomic particles as "dissipative space structures."

The presence of an external field gradient will necessarily affect the position of a particle because it will disturb the equilibrium of the reaction processes that continually generate the particle's Turing wave pattern. That is, the field gradient will distort the particle's space structure by raising (or lowering) the etheron concentrations more on one side of the particle than on the other. Because the steady-state condition tends to create a symmetrical space structure for the particle, any such departure from symmetry will induce a stress, or a state of disequilibrium. This stress is identified with the electrostatic or gravitational force that this electric or gravity potential field exerts on the particle. The reaction system relieves this stress and momentarily gains greater symmetry by accelerating or moving the particle's regenerating wave pattern either up or down the field gradient, the direction of movement depending on whether the field's action is attractive or repulsive.

According to subquantum kinetics, force action is fundamentally a reaction-kinetic process rather than a mechanical process, one in which the particle's core field readjusts its concentration pattern in response to the disequilibrium caused by an imposed field gradient. Thus the field's induction of force and acceleration is accomplished with no recoil force being applied back on the field. No momentum transfer is involved. Similarly, the potential gradient generated by a charge or mass becomes established in the ether and is able to operate on charges and masses without any deference to the charges or masses that originally generated it. Thus, in subquantum kinetics it is perfectly acceptable for a field to accelerate the very same charges that generate it. This field autonomy is key to understanding how unbalanced electrostatic forces can induce motion in an asymmetrical capacitor, a subject we examined in the previous chapter.

French inventor Jean-Claude Lafforgue proposes a similar idea in his 1991 patent on an asymmetrical thrust capacitor. He suggests that when a capacitor is charged, the fields it generates have their seat in the local space-time continuum reference frame, allowing them to act on the capacitor without any reaction force being directed back to the capacitor itself. Thus, he suggests that the electric fields generated by a properly shaped asymmetrical capacitor can exert unbalanced electrostatic forces on the capacitor, whose residual is capable of displacing the capacitor relative to its initial rest frame. In his patent Lafforgue states:

> It is acceptable then to consider that F [electrostatic force] rests its support on E [electric force field intensity], that is to say, on the space-time continuum . . . It is the same for all the electrodes whatever their orientation and polarization . . . Whether the electrodes are at rest or in motion does not at all change the values of ρ, of σ, of q, of E, nor of F. So under the action of the "force of expansion," the isolated system moves and drags with itself σ and E and consequently F. Our isolated systems are therefore self-accelerated.[15]

Lafforgue's term "force of expansion" refers to electrostatic pressure, that is, the electrostatic force $\mathbf{F} = \sigma\mathbf{E}$ present on a portion of the capacitor plate divided by the surface area it acts through. Lafforgue does not refer to the notion of an ether. He uses instead the relativistic term "space-time continuum," and he adopts the convention of working with force field intensity, E, rather than the electric potential gradient $\nabla\varphi_E$. However, his conclusions about a capacitor's self-field action, which are based on experimental observation, are surprisingly identical to those predicted by subquantum kinetics. Hence, his work may be considered as independent support for the subquantum kinetics approach. Tests performed on one of Lafforgue's asymmetrical capacitors are discussed in chapter 12.

Classical physics assumes that subatomic particles produce only matter-attracting gravitational forces regardless of their charge polarity. Classical theory doesn't describe what a gravitational field is or how it exerts its force; it just identifies it and mathematically represents how gravitational force is related to the mass of a body and to an observer's distance from the body. As for antimatter, there are a variety of opinions among physicists. Some believe that antimatter particles should produce matter-attracting fields and others believe that they should produce matter-repelling fields.

General relativity, like classical physics, also asserts that all subatomic particles should produce attractive gravity fields regardless of their electric charge. Yet it also advances the additional proposition that these gravitational effects come about because the body's mass warps the surrounding metric of space and time and as a result induces an attractive motion in neighboring masses. Relativity does not state how matter manages to accomplish this warping feat; it simply states this as a given. Although fancy equations are presented to describe the warping assumption, they do not themselves provide any insight as to why matter, a physical quantity, might affect the geometry of space or the rate at which time passes. The initiate is asked to accept this on faith. Subquantum kinetics, on the other hand, does explain how a material body generates its electric and gravity potential fields, why these two fields are interlinked, and also how these fields induce forces on charges and masses. Furthermore, it describes how a material particle comes into being in space, another point on which conventional physics is a bit vague.

Most physicists are reluctant to consider ether-theory explanations of particles and fields because relativists have long drummed into them the misconception that the idea of an ether, with its preferred reference frame, has been disproved. Usually, they cite the Michelson-Morley experiment's failure to detect a directional variation in the velocity of light. However, many have argued that the experiment's null result was due to the fact that it was conducted underground, where the ether was stationary in the reference frame of the rotating Earth. Other experiments carried out by Georges Sagnac, Dayton Miller, and Ernest Silvertooth have since shown that the one-way velocity of light is not a constant.[16–20] Hence, the results favor the notion of an ether over relativity's relative-frame notion.

The vindication of the ether-frame concept even impacts us every day in a practical sense. To establish proper synchronization of the clocks in the global positioning system satellite array, computer software must make allowances for the change in radio signal velocity caused by the array's geosynchronous rotation relative to the local ether frame. Were this not done and the network was instead synchronized in accordance with the pronouncements of special relativity, a hiker would be unable to accurately establish his latitude and longitude coordinates. The military knows this quite well.

Moreover, general relativity has no exclusive claim over tests carried out to check its predictions, such as the gravitational bending of starlight by the Sun and the precession of Mercury's orbit. All of these have also been accounted for in terms of classical physics effects.[21] It might be added that these same gravitational effects are also predicted by subquantum kinetics. What general relativity refers to as a spatial warping of starlight photons by a celestial mass subquantum kinetics understands to be a refraction of photons (ether waves) by the body's gravity potential gradient (G-on concentration gradient). The gravitational time dilation phenomenon that all massive bodies experience and that relativity interprets again as an inexplicable warping of space is understood as a clock retardation effect that arises as a result of the reduction of the G-on concentration within the star or planet (as G decreases, so too does X, and in turn so too does the X-Y flux rate that is responsible for all physical action). The gravitational redshift of light emitted from a massive celestial body occurs for a similar reason. Subquantum kinetics also accounts for special relativistic effects. All of these effects emerge from the five basic equations diagrammed in figure 4.1 (see page 118). In summary, special and general relativistic effects emerge as corollaries of subquantum kinetics, but without requiring the magical warping of space-time.

So it is not surprising that highly classified black-budget programs embrace the concept of an ether in their attempts to understand the gravity-defying technologies that they have been developing. They have no obligation to please the academic physics establishment, which still teaches the rocket principle as the ultimate in space propulsion technology.

Norwegian researcher Dr. Björn Overbye points out that most physicists find it virtually impossible to visualize and understand relativity theory because it requires that one think in terms of four dimensions. He says, "Even experienced mathematicians and theoretical physicists who have worked with higher dimensional space for years admit that they cannot visualize them! Instead, they retreat into the world of mathematical equations."[22] According to the Nobel laureate Hannes Alfvén, "The people were told that only Einstein and a few geniuses that were able to think in four dimensions could understand the true nature of the physical world. Science was something to believe in, not something that should be understood."[23]

Subquantum kinetics, on the other hand, offers us a path back to visualization and understanding. It is based on a simple conceptual framework, but to follow it one must forget the misleading models that have been taught in the past, quantum mechanics and relativity theory being among them. Since the theory is not easily presented in the space of a few paragraphs, the reader is referred for more details to the journal articles cited at the beginning of this chapter and to my book Subquantum Kinetics, all of which deal more thoroughly with the subject.[24] The more philosophically inclined are referred to my book Genesis of the Cosmos, which presents a less technical introduction to the subject.[25]

4.2 ■ VIRTUAL CHARGE ELECTROGRAVITIC EFFECTS

In earlier writings of how subquantum kinetics predicts an electrogravitic connection, I did not also consider that virtual-charge gradients might also produce electrogravitic effects. However, it is reasonable to expect that, like real charges, virtual charges also should induce gravity potentials. Moreover, gravitational thrusts on a capacitor dielectric arising from virtual charges may in some cases be far greater than those produced by the real charges creating the capacitor's electric field. So it is evident that the scope of the subquantum kinetics electrogravitics prediction should be expanded to include such virtual-charge effects. Let us proceed to derive this by considering a charged asymmetrical capacitor that establishes a nonlinear electric field across its dielectric.

Due to the math involved, the material presented in the next several pages may be a bit challenging for those who have not had a course in college physics. Some, then, may want to skip over it. But those wishing to acquire a nuts-and-bolts understanding of how antigravity technology might work are encouraged to read this section, if not now, at least at some later time, for this material is referenced frequently later in the book.

As was explained above, subquantum kinetics identifies an electric potential gradient with an X-on or Y-on ether concentration gradient. Consider a charged asymmetrical capacitor whose negative plate is smaller than its positive plate. With such a field geometry, the voltage gradient will vary nonlinearly with distance across the dielectric, the field gradient getting steeper toward the capacitor's smaller negative plate. Represented in terms of the X-on etheron concentration component, C_x, X-on concentration will rise nonlinearly, reaching a maximum at the negative plate. X-ons will continuously diffuse down this concentration gradient away from the negative plate, their flux per unit surface area being represented by the symbol Φ_x, called the X diffusive flux vector. It is related to the X-on concentration gradient, ∇C_x, by the formula $\Phi_x(r) = -D_x \nabla C_x(r)$, where D_x is the diffusion coefficient.

Suppose that we consider three adjacent volumes in the capacitor dielectric aligned along the axis of the capacitor and located near the capacitor's negative plate (see lower three boxes in figure 4.4). Because the field potential varies nonlinearly with distance across the dielectric, the X-on concentration gradient, ∇C_x, between box 1 and box 2 will be steeper than that between box 2 and box 3. Therefore, more X-ons will be induced to flow into box 2 than will be induced to leave from box 2. As a result of this flux imbalance, the number of X-ons in that box will increase at the rate $\Phi_{x(in)} - \Phi_{x(out)}$. This has the effect of raising the X-on concentration in that box, which is equivalent to lowering its electric potential, negative potential being correlated with increased X-on concentration.

Because there is a net inflow of X-ons into box 2, the divergence of the X diffusive flux vector $\nabla\cdot\Phi_x$ for that box will be a negative quantity. This diffusive-flux-vector divergence by definition is calculated from the variation of X-on concentration $C_x(r)$ using the equation $\nabla\cdot\Phi_x(r) = -D_x\nabla^2 C_x(r)$. This negative Φ_x divergence, in turn, is equal to a quantity called the X production rate balance density, ρ_x, a scalar quantity that represents the rate, Q_x, at which X-ons enter a unit volume dV. This is mathematically expressed as $\rho_x(r) = Q_x(r)/dV = -\nabla\cdot\Phi_x(r) = -D_x\nabla^2 C_x(r)$.

The X production balance density, ρ_x, is the ether counterpart of the negative virtual electric charge density, $-\rho_E$.* Thus the excess influx of X per unit time into box 2 would act as though a negative electric charge density, $-\rho_E$, was present in that box. Also, the X diffusive flux vector, Φ_x, is the ether equivalent of the electric flux density vector, D, of conventional theory. Physicists also refer to D as the electric displacement, but we use here the flux density vector designation since it more closely approximates the terminology used for its ether counterpart. It should be mentioned that all of these conventional physics terms were originally developed in the context of 18th- and 19th-century ether models.

*The Y production rate balance density, ρ_y, would be the counterpart of the positive virtual electric charge density. We instead focus here on specifying the X-on component, since it is this component that is involved in generating the G-on gravity field.

The upper set of boxes in figure 4.4 illustrates how these etheron fluxes would be expressed in conventional physics terms using D and ρ_E. A nonlinear electric potential gradient $\nabla\varphi_E$ is assumed to extend across the capacitor dielectric with the potential gradient steepening toward the negative electrode on the left. This field gradient induces a greater electric flux density to flow out from box 2 (to the left) than to flow into box 2 (from the right). Consequently, D has a positive divergence, which by definition creates a negative virtual-charge density in that box. In conventional terminology, this is expressed as $\nabla\cdot\mathbf{D}(r) = -\varepsilon\nabla^2\varphi_E(r) = -\rho_E$. Rearranging these terms we may write:

Here we also include in the expression the term $-\varepsilon\nabla\cdot\mathbf{E}(r)$, which expresses this equivalence in terms of the permittivity times the divergence of the electric field intensity, E, for those who are familiar with this alternate term.

However, in the case of real negative charges such as electrons, the D vectors would instead be inward directed making the divergence term $\nabla\cdot\mathbf{D}$ a negative quantity. If this subtle difference between real and virtual charges is not appreciated, one might mistakenly assign an incorrect polarity to virtual charges and calculate gravity thrust vectors pointing in the opposite direction. Taking the etheron model as an example, if real negative charges were present in box-2, X-ons would be entering the box through X-on creation attributable to the Model G reactions. The resulting X-on surplus would produce an outward diverging flux, making the divergence term $\nabla\cdot\Phi_x$ a positive quantity. In the case of a negative virtual-charge density, on the other hand, the X influx arises from the spatial redistribution of X-ons, which enter the unit volume as a result of the electric field's nonlinearity. Thus the diffusive flux vectors will instead point inward, making the divergence term $\nabla\cdot\Phi_x$ a negative quantity.

Based on equation 6 above, we conclude that virtual charge is formed wherever the field's electric flux density vector D acquires a nonzero divergence value, div D $\neq 0$, or in other words, wherever the derivative of D differs from zero. Expressed in terms of the electric potential field, $\varphi_E(r)$, a virtual charge would arise wherever the second derivative of the field's electric potential becomes nonzero, that is, $\nabla^2\varphi_E \neq 0$. For the second derivative to be nonzero, the magnitude of the field's electric potential must vary nonlinearly with distance.

Now, going back to our ether flux model, let us consider how these virtual electric charge densities would produce a gravitational field across the capacitor. The positive X production rate balance density in box 2 (lower half of figure 4.4) results in the creation of a positive G production rate balance in that box due to the reverse reaction, $G \leftarrow X$, which in turn produces a local increase in G-on concentration, C_g. With this surplus G production rate, the volume acts as though it contains a negative virtual mass density that produces a local increase in gravity potential, φ_g. Consequently, a negative divergence of the X diffusive flux vector leads to an increase in gravity potential at that point.

Thus subquantum kinetics leads to a charge-mass equivalence similar to that stated in relation 2 of chapter 1, except here we broaden the definition of charge density so that we consider the electrogravitic effects of a virtual-charge-density gradient opposed to a real-charge-density gradient. Hence we may state that a virtual-charge density of magnitude ρ_E creates a proportional virtual mass density of magnitude ρ_m, that is, $\rho_m \propto \rho_E$. If the negative virtual-charge density varies with distance across the capacitor's dielectric, then there will be a corresponding variation in negative virtual mass density and a gravity potential gradient will form across the dielectric. Given that this virtual mass density creates a proportional negative gravity potential field, $\rho_m \propto -\varphi_g(\mathrm{r})$, we conclude that the gravity potential at a given point r should be proportional to the negative charge density at that location. By using equation 6 above, this may be mathematically expressed as:

$$\varphi_g(r) \propto -\rho_E(r) = \nabla\cdot\mathbf{D}(r) = \varepsilon\nabla\cdot\mathbf{E}(r) = -\varepsilon\nabla^2\varphi_E(r) \qquad (7)$$

The gradient of this gravity potential field would create a gravitational force on matter that it spanned. As mentioned earlier, this force would arise because the G-on concentration gradient spatially distorts the etheric wave patterns of the subatomic particles it affects, perturbing them from their ideally spherical symmetric configuration. Because of their tendency to maintain a state of morphogenic homeostasis, the particles respond to this stress by moving down the gravity potential gradient toward the capacitor's positive pole.

In accordance with Newton's second law, the gravitational force acting on a body at point r would be proportional to the negative gradient of the induced gravity potential field at that location multiplied by the body's inertial mass, which is expressed as $\mathbf{F}_g(r) = -Gm_o\nabla\varphi_g(r)$. Hence using relation 7 to substitute for gravity potential $\varphi_g(r)$, the gravitational force on a capacitor is expected to vary in proportion to the third derivative of the electric potential $\varphi_E(r)$, or as the derivative of the LaPlacian of the electric potential:

$$\mathbf{F}_g(r) = k\ m_o\varepsilon\nabla(\nabla^2\varphi_E(r)) \tag{8}$$

As before, the constant k in this equation is an experimentally determined electrogravitic proportionality constant that quantifies the virtual-charge-to-virtual-mass coupling relationship.

This thrust on the capacitor dielectric will persist as long as the applied electric field is not canceled out by the opposing electric dipole moment created by the polarization of the dielectric. By oscillating the electric field to repeatedly create virtual charge, the gravitational thrust may be maintained without complete cancellation.

One thing that becomes apparent from studying relation 8 is that the electrogravitic force should increase as the electric potential field across the capacitor becomes increasingly nonlinear; the more nonlinear the field, the greater the induced gravitational thrust. Force also increases in accordance with the dielectric's dielectric constant, ε, and its mass, m_o. Thus dielectrics with higher K and greater mass will deliver greater thrust. Brown stressed all of these points in his work.

Furthermore, like the electrogravitic force produced by a real-charge-density gradient, the electrogravitic force arising from a virtual-charge-density gradient will always be directed toward the positive pole. If the field polarity is reversed, the polarity of the virtual-charge density would also reverse, as would the direction of the gravitic thrust. Thus, if the smaller electrode in an asymmetrical capacitor was made positive instead of negative, the electrogravitic thrust would be directed once again toward the positive electrode, which in this case would be the smaller of the two electrodes.

Now let us consider a standard symmetrical parallel plate capacitor. Such a capacitor would develop no virtual-charge-density gradient when charged since its electric field potential would vary linearly across its dielectric. The only gravity field across its dielectric would be that arising from the charges on its plates. The negative charges on the negative plate would be producing X-ons and G-ons while the positive charges on the capacitor's positive plate would be consuming X-ons and G-ons. Consequently, the X-on and G-on concentrations would be highest at the capacitor's negative pole and would drop linearly with distance across the dielectric until they reached their lowest value near the capacitor's positive pole. These X-on and G-on concentration gradients would be accompanied by a diffusive flux of X-ons and G-ons flowing down the gradient in a uniform manner. Since any volume in the dielectric would experience the same etheron influx as eflux, the divergence of the X diffusive flux vector would be zero throughout the dielectric, as would be the virtual-charge density.

We may now attempt to calculate the gravity field developed across an asymmetrical AC electrokinetic capacitor having a design similar to that shown in figures 3.2 and 3.6. We may use electrogravitic relation 7 to determine the virtual-charge profile and gravity potential field that would be generated across the dielectric. Suppose that a 100-kilovolt DC bias potential were applied across the capacitor plates, with potential varying nonlinearly according to the inverse square of distance as shown by the dotted line in figure 4.5a. This would plot as the equation $V = -1/r^2$. Compare this with the field potential graph reproduced from Brown's patent (see figure 3.6). Note that this field is substantially more nonlinear than the $1/r$ potential field that would typically exist around a charged sphere. Let us also suppose that the capacitor's negative antenna electrode excites a quarter-wave sine wave oscillation across the dielectric with a node at the positive electrode. If it was a conventional symmetrical capacitor having equal area electrodes, the oscillating potential would vary with distance across the dielectric, as shown in figure 4.5b, in which the solid and dashed curves represent the potential distribution at voltage minimum and voltage maximum. However, since the capacitor is asymmetrical, with a field that varies with distance in a nonlinear manner, this sine wave amplitude will decrease sharply with distance toward the positive electrode.

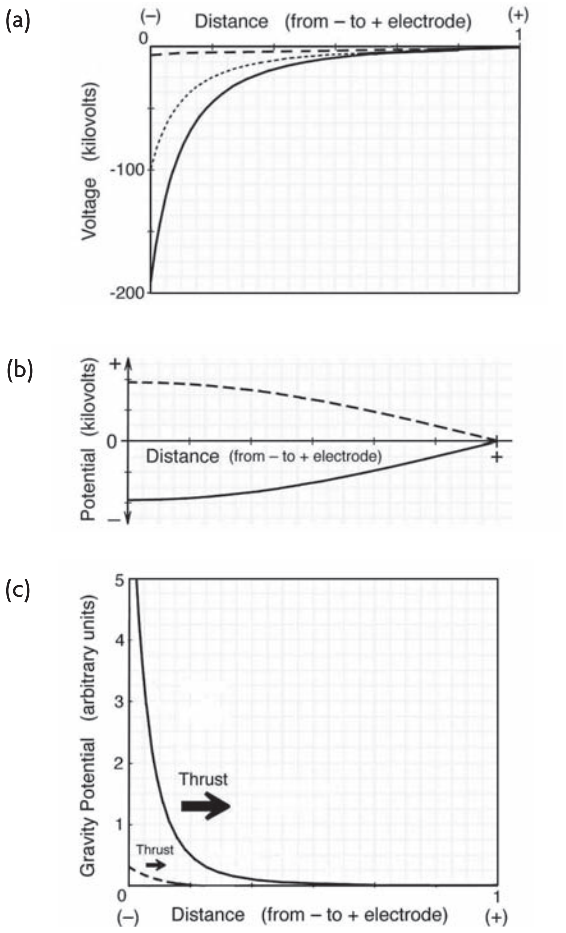

Figure 4.5. (a) The DC bias potential across the dielectric (dotted line), with the superimposed resonant oscillation (solid line represents maximum negative; dashed line represents maximum positive). (b) Sine wave voltage oscillation applied across the dielectric in Brown's electrokinetic apparatus. (c) The corresponding gravity potential profile. (P. LaViolette, © 2007)

If it were superimposed on the DC bias potential, the overall field would oscillate between the very negative potential profile prevailing when the sine wave oscillation was at its maximum negative voltage (shown as the solid line in figure 4.5a) and the low negative voltage field distribution prevailing when the sine wave oscillation was at its maximum positive voltage (shown as the dashed line in figure 4.5a). The amplitude of the sinusoidal oscillation at the negative electrode is adjusted to be about 95 percent of the bias voltage. Using the electrogravitic coupling expression that is presented as relation 7 and including a geometry correction to account for the capacitor's asymmetrical geometry, the resulting gravity potential distribution is computed to be that shown in figure 4.5c; see text box for details. The gravity gradient and resulting thrust vary from a minimum to a maximum as the voltage of the sine wave resonance at the negative electrode cycles between positive and negative maxima. Throughout the AC cycle, the thrust remains always directed toward the positive electrode, but oscillates in magnitude approximately 750 million times per second.

Gravity Potential Distribution in an Asymmetrical Capacitor with a DC Voltage Bias and Applied AC Voltage Oscillation

$$\varphi_g(r) = \left(\frac{\partial}{\partial r}\left(\left(-2\frac{\partial}{\partial r}\left(\frac{1}{r^2}\left(\frac{3}{\pi}\sin\pi\left(\pm 0.5+\left(\frac{r}{12}\right)\right)\right)-\frac{1}{r^2}\right)\right)4\pi r^2\right)\right)\frac{1}{4\pi r^2}$$

The central term in the brackets represents the electric potential and is given as:

The sine term here represents the sine wave voltage oscillation at its positive and negative maxima. This is multiplied by $1/r^2$ to model the potential field's nonlinear variation with distance across the dielectric. The term $-1/r^2$, which has a similar nonlinear variation with distance r, is added to this to represent the DC field bias. The summed electric potential field has a minus sign, the voltage across the capacitor being negative as referenced from the grounded positive plate. This quantity is differentiated to derive the electric field gradient, $\nabla\varphi_E$, which by definition is proportional to the negative electric flux density vector, $-\mathbf{D}$. However, since we are dealing with an asymmetrical capacitor with a positive electrode surface area that is larger than the negative electrode surface area, in considering the total electric flux entering or leaving a given spherical shell increment, we must multiply D times $4\pi r^2$, which accounts for the increased surface area toward the positive electrode. Taking the derivative of this and dividing by $4\pi r^2$ gives the divergence of D in that volume increment. Then, multiplying by –1, we get the virtual-charge density in that increment, $\rho_E(r)$. The negative of this, in turn, gives the gravity potential, $\varphi_g(r)$, which is the quantity plotted in figure 4.5c.

Note that if the voltage potential across the dielectric instead was to vary only as $1/r$, as do fields radiating from a charged sphere, then in that case the divergence would be zero, since the flux per unit surface area would not change with distance. Hence, such a field, although nonlinear, would not produce a virtual-charge-density gradient.

The gravity potential gradient is seen to be steepest at the negative electrode and to rapidly decrease in magnitude as the positive electrode is approached, and the gravitational thrust on the dielectric declines in a similar fashion. Consequently, the thrust developed by the device could be maximized by incorporating high-mass semiconducting particles in the dielectric near its negative pole, where the gravity gradient is highest.

The amplitude of the AC quarter-wave resonance should be kept below 100 percent of the negative DC bias voltage. Otherwise the net electric potential across the dielectric would become slightly positive during the small fraction of the oscillation cycle when the sine wave oscillation was at its positive maximum. This in turn would produce a slightly negative gravity potential having a small positive potential gradient that would generate a thrust directed toward the negative electrode. During the brief time it was produced, this small opposing thrust would subtract from the gravitic thrust developed during the majority of the oscillation cycle.

The results obtained in Brown's Paris vacuum chamber experiment may also be explained in terms of the virtual-charge electrogravitic concept. The sudden rotor thrusts observed after each spark discharge could be due to the creation of a virtual-charge-density gradient across the rotor's capacitor element. The fanning field geometry of the spark discharge would have created a nonlinear electric potential gradient between the capacitor plates that in turn would have created a virtual-charge-density gradient between the plates. This, then, would have momentarily generated a gravity potential gradient across the capacitor element. With the disappearance of the spark, these virtual charges would have also disappeared, the intervening field having become linear once again. While the virtual charges were present, however, they would have generated a substantial gravitational thrust on the rotor.

It is also possible that the rapid recharge of the negative electrode, which took a matter of milliseconds following each spark discharge, served to increase the nonlinearity of the field between the plates thereby increasing the created virtual charge and the accompanying gravitational thrust. Brown's observation that he obtained greater thrusts when he used a barium titanate dielectric between the capacitor plates may be explained on the basis of this virtual-charge concept. In accordance with equation 8 above, the electrogravitic force exerted on an intervening dielectric should vary in direct proportion to the dielectric's permittivity. A dielectric such as barium titanate has a K-value of about 10^4 when slowly charged, but when rapidly charged over a few milliseconds, its K-value will be much lower, perhaps around 1,500. So during the course of a voltage change of a millisecond duration, a 1,500-fold-greater virtual-charge density and 1,500-fold greater thrust would be created, compared to the case in which such a dielectric was absent. The high mass density of barium titanate would be another factor contributing to the production of greater thrust, barium titanate being about six times as dense as water. That is, for a given gravity potential gradient generated across the capacitor, dielectrics having greater mass would produce greater thrust.

4.3 ▪ TOWNSEND BROWN'S ETHER PHYSICS

To account for electrogravitic phenomena, Brown, too, came to theorize about the existence of an ether and to reject the idea of relative frames. His Vega laboratory notebook contains a section titled "Structure of Space," in which he qualitatively explores the subject of the existence of an ether and sets forth some of its more important properties. Although the notebook's cover page is labeled "Vega Aircraft Corp.," these notes on the ether are dated between January and March 1943, which suggests that Brown most likely wrote them when he was teaching at the Atlantic Fleet Radar School in Norfolk, Virginia. Interestingly, the ether theory that Brown explores has some similarities with subquantum kinetics.

In one passage, Brown explains his reason for considering the presence of an ether. He writes:

> For certain phenomena it is desirable and almost necessary to assume the existence of an aether in order to evolve a satisfactory explanation. An example is the force of gravitation, particularly the electrogravitational effects; The phenomenon of the movement of a dielectric is such an example . . . Much of the work [presented in these notes] is based on facts derived from actual experiments which cannot be satisfactorily explained without the existence of an aether possessing substantially these qualities.[26]

Brown proposes that the dielectric constant K and permeability μ, which are electromagnetic properties of free space, be identified with the ether. He then proposes that matter might induce a variation in the magnitude of K and μ, causing these quantities to attain greater values near a massive body. He associates this variation in K and μ with a gravitational potential field gradient and suggests that a mass acted upon by this field has a "tendency to migrate" toward regions of higher K and μ, that is, toward regions where the gravitational potential is more negative. He envisions a low K and μ region as manifesting a "high pressure" and a high K and μ region as a manifesting a "low pressure," and that a gravitating body would be migrating from a high-pressure region toward a low-pressure region.

As is done in subquantum kinetics, Brown proposes that potentials are the real existents and that a body's adjustive response to a field gradient is the essence of force. Brown's suggestion that a body migrates in an equilibrating response to the influence of a gravity gradient very much resembles concepts used in subquantum kinetics. However, he uses a mechanical analogy of a solid body's response to a pressure differential, whereas subquantum kinetics adopts a reaction-diffusion process analogy, which is fundamentally different. I believe the reaction-diffusion system concept is a better framework for application to microphysics because in addition to offering an understanding of how fields are generated and how they exert force, it predicts the autogenetic creation of subatomic particles having charge, mass, spin, and matter-wave properties.

Brown adopts a mechanical model when he suggests that the etheric field creates a pressure upon a material body. A similar concept has been expressed in many of the nineteenth-century ether theories. However, Brown's theory does not bring us any closer to understanding what force is. To say that the observed gravitational force arises from the summed collisional action of myriad energetic etheric particles merely begs the question; one is still left to wonder why these etheric particles should exert an accelerating force. Subquantum kinetics, on the other hand, addresses this question by providing an understanding of how a material body—an etheric reaction–diffusion wave pattern—migrates in response to the influence of an etheron concentration gradient (potential gradient). The wave pattern migrates because the etheron gradient alters the ongoing reaction and diffusion processes that are responsible for generating it and deploying it.

Like subquantum kinetics, Brown's theory makes a significant departure from the traditional general relativistic concept of assuming that masses warp space-time. However, does his theory explain how a mass might alter the K and μ values he ascribes to the ether? Based on the few quotes from his notes that his family has released to the public up to this point, there is no indication that it does. Brown indicates that his ideas about the ether are based on experimental results. Indeed, permittivity and permeability are observable quantities that are used to characterize the electrical properties not only of material media but also of a vacuum transmitting electromagnetic waves. However, it is a major leap of induction to assume that this aspect of the ether is the cause of gravitation. Beginning from observables, it is difficult to extrapolate the workings of an etheric realm, which are inherently inaccessible to direct observation. One risks making the error of the blind men and the elephant.

We know that the speed of light slows down in media having higher K and μ values, and we also know that the speed of a photon decreases while passing through the gravity well of a massive celestial body, which is responsible for the gravitational lensing effect. However, it does not necessarily follow that gravity mediates this effect by increasing the ether's K and μ values. Might not this speed decrease arise because a decrease in the gravity potential (etheron concentration) causes a gravitational clock retardation effect? Subquantum kinetics predicts the latter and proposes that the same retardation phenomenon that relativists term "time dilation" is also responsible for causing the gravitational redshift observed in the spectra of white dwarf stars.*

Subquantum kinetics also describes in detail how a mass locally decreases the G-on concentration to create a gravity potential well in its vicinity and also how a charged particle generates a corresponding decrease or increase in gravity potential, depending on its electric polarity. As such, it is the only unified field theory to predict the existence of electrogravitic coupling at low potential energies. Does Brown's ether theory correspondingly explain how electric charge might produce gravitational force effects by inducing changes in the ether's K and μ? With the small amount of information that has currently been made available, we are left only to wonder. Nevertheless, it is interesting to find that Brown was considering ether physics explanations at this early date in his electrogravitics research.

*Changing the K value of the ether, that is, the value of its electric permittivity, is equivalent in subquantum kinetics to changing the X and Y diffusion coefficients of the Model G ether reaction system. Changing these diffusion coefficients would change the X and Y etheric concentration magnitude (the electric potential). In subquantum kinetics, however, etheric concentration gradients (potential gradients) may be produced without altering the diffusion coefficients.

THE U.S. ANTIGRAVITY SQUADRON

5.1 ELECTROGRAVITIC SECRETS OF THE B-2 BOMBER

For many years, rumors circulated that the United States was secretly developing a highly advanced radar-evading aircraft. Rumor turned to reality in November 1988, when the U.S. Air Force unveiled the B-2 Advanced Technology Bomber (see figure 5.1). Although military spokesmen related some things about the craft's outward design and low radar and infrared profile, there was much they were silent about. However, several years later, some key secrets about the B-2 were leaked to the press. In its March 9, 1992, issue, Aviation Week & Space Technology magazine made the surprising disclosure that the B-2 electrostatically charges its exhaust stream and the leading edges of its winglike body.[1] Those familiar with Brown's work will quickly realize that this is tantamount to stating that the B-2 is able to function as an antigravity aircraft.

Aviation Week obtained its information about the B-2 from a small group of renegade West Coast scientists and engineers who were formerly associated with black research projects, which are defense projects so secret that even their very existence is classified. In making these disclosures, the scientists broke a code of silence that rivals the Mafia's. They took the risk because they felt that it was important for economic reasons that efforts be made to declassify certain black technologies for commercial use. Two of these individuals said that their civil rights had been blatantly abused (in the name of security), either to keep them quiet or to prevent them from leaving the tightly controlled black R&D community.

Several months after Aviation Week published the article, security personnel from the black world went into high gear. That sector of the black R&D community received very strong warnings, and as a result, the group of scientists subsequently broke off contact with the magazine. Clearly, the overseers of black R&D programs were substantially concerned about the information leaks that had come out in that article.

Northrop, the prime contractor for the B-2, had been experimenting for some time with the propulsive benefits of applying high-voltage charge to aircraft hulls. For example, at an aerospace sciences meeting held in New York in January 1968, scientists from Northrop's Norair Division reported that they were beginning wind tunnel studies on the aerodynamic effects of applying high-voltage charges to the leading edges of high-speed aircraft bodies.[2,3] They said they expected that the applied electric potential would produce a coronal glow that would propagate forward from the craft's leading edges to ionize and repel air molecules upwind of the aircraft. The resulting repulsive electric forces would condition the airstream so as to lower drag, reduce heating, and soften or eliminate the supersonic boom.* Their results showed that when high-voltage DC is applied to a wing-shaped structure subjected to a supersonic flow, seemingly new "electro-aerodynamic" qualities appear that result in significant air-drag reduction on the structure and the virtual elimination of friction-caused aerodynamic heating, as well as the elimination of shock wave and wave-drag phenomena.[4] Similar research was carried out in 1965 by the Grumman and Avco corporations. Interestingly, in 1994, Northrop bought out and merged with Grumman as part of its drive to place increased emphasis on defense electronics technologies.

Northrop and Grumman scientists apparently got the idea for investigating this sonic cushion effect either from Brown or from papers describing his work that had been previously circulated. For example, in his 1952 paper describing Brown's electrogravitic discs, Rose wrote, "The Townsend Brown experiments indicate that the positive field which is traveling in front of the saucer acts as a buffer wing which starts moving the air out of the way. This immaterial electrogravitational field acts as an entering wedge which softens the supersonic barrier, thus allowing the material leading edge of the saucer to enter into a softened pressure area."[5] This was accompanied by the diagram reproduced in figure 5.2a, which shows how the supersonic flow would be diverted around leading edge of a wing.

Brown also called attention to this effect in his 1960 electrokinetic apparatus patent, which describes using a flame-jet generator to place a high-voltage positive charge on a needlelike electrode at the front end of a rocket (see figure 5.2b). In one passage, he wrote, "By using such a nose form, which at present appears to be the best suited for flying

*Although the author of that article speculated that Northrop was negatively charging the aircraft's leading edge, the sonic barrier effects could also be accomplished with a positive charge, as Brown originally suggested.

speeds approaching or exceeding the speed of sound, I am able to produce an ionization of the atmosphere in the immediate region of this foremost portion of the mobile vehicle. I believe that this ionization facilitates piercing the sonic barrier and minimizes the abruptness with which the transition takes place in passing from subsonic velocities to supersonic velocities.[6]

Aerospace companies later put Brown's suggestion into use on rockets. A spike was placed at the nose of a rocket and caused to emit a high-voltage arc. Wind tunnel studies showed that the resulting electric field pushed the bow shock front away from the rocket nose so that it no longer contacted the main body of the missile and, hence, substantially reduced air drag. According to one Greek scientist working in affiliation with the U.S. Embassy in Greece, nose electrification is a standard technique used on U.S. rockets to stabilize them during takeoff. Engineers are told to figure a 20 percent weight reduction during the first few kilometers' gain in altitude when determining the rocket's trajectory.

In the late 1970s, Russian scientists at the Ioffe Institute in St. Petersburg led by Anatoly Klimov carried out an interesting experiment that demonstrated how plasmas could reduce air drag. They fired a 3-centimeter steel sphere at a velocity of one kilometer per second through a tube filled with low-pressure argon gas. In one section of the tube, the argon gas was ionized to form a plasma. They found that when the sphere entered the plasma, its shock wave stood twice as far away from the sphere as it would in ordinary gas, and, more important, the sphere's aerodynamic drag was reduced by 30 percent.[7]

Interestingly, Northrop, which had past experience in leading-edge electrification, was contracted by the Pentagon in 1981 to work on the highly classified B-2. Northrop's expertise in this area must have been a key factor contributing to its winning of this contract, for Aviation Week reported that the B-2 uses "electrostatic field-generating techniques" in its wing leading edges to help it minimize aerodynamic turbulence and thereby reduce its radar cross-section.[8] The same article mentions that the B-2 also charges its jet engine exhaust stream, which has the effect of rapidly cooling its exhaust and thereby remarkably reducing its thermal signature.

Although these disclosures were framed in the context of enhancing the B-2's radar invisibility, in fact they are part of its field propulsion drive capability. With a positively charged wing leading edge and a negatively charged exhaust stream (figure 5.3), the B-2 would function essentially as an electrogravitic aircraft. Just as in Brown's model flying discs (see figure 2.1) and in his patented electrokinetic disc (see figure 2.8), the positive and negative ion clouds created ahead and behind the Figure 5.3. The profile of the B-2 as seen from above. The plane measures 69 feet from front to back and 172 feet from wing tip to wing tip. B-2 would produce a locally altered gravity field that would cause it to feel a forward-directed gravitic force. In effect, the B-2 is a realization of the flying disc design Brown described in his electrokinetic generator patent as seen in chapter 2.

Rumors circulating among aviation industry personnel close to the project allege that the B-2 does use antigravity technology. A similar claim was made in the 1970s by Marion Williams, a former Central Intelligence Agency officer who had worked at the highly classified Area 51 facility, where the B-2 was test-flown.[9,10] Just before he died of cancer, Williams confided to his relative Andrew Basiago that design principles from crashed alien antigravity spacecraft were being utilized in the stealth bomber. Thus, our conjecture that the B-2 incorporates an electrogravitic drive may be substantially correct, although its design may actually have originated closer to home than Williams had been led to believe. The B-2, then, may be the first military antigravity vehicle to be openly displayed to the public! It may be the final realization of the kind of craft that Brown had proposed in Project Winterhaven and that the 1956 Aviation Studies report had disclosed was beginning to be developed by the military in late 1954. Consequently, the designation "B-2" might more appropriately stand for Biefeld-Brown effect.

The secrecy that has so tightly surrounded the B-2 most likely does not concern its radar-evading technology as much as it does its antigravity propulsion technology, although the two are probably closely intertwined. The use of such nonconventional propulsion technology would explain the B-2's high price tag, which averaged more than $2 billion per plane.

Although the black-world scientists mentioned nothing about electrogravitics in their Aviation Week disclosure about the B-2, they did admit to the existence of very "dramatic, classified technologies" applicable to "aircraft control and propulsion." They were especially hesitant to discuss these projects, noting that they are "very black." One of them commented, "Besides, it would take about 20 hours to explain the principles, and very few people would understand them anyway."[11] Apparently, what he meant is that this aircraft control and propulsion technology is based on physics principles that go beyond what is currently known and understood by the general public as well as most academic physicists. Indeed, by all normal standards, electrogravitics is an exotic propulsion science. Nevertheless, by beginning with an understandable theory, electrogravitics becomes a lot less mysterious. As mentioned earlier, subquantum kinetics provides one such viable theory.

The B-2's body design also raises suspicions that the aircraft is in fact an electrogravitic vehicle. A primary design criterion for an electrogravitic craft is that it have a large horizontally disposed surface area so as to permit the development of a sufficiently strong antigravity lift force. As Brown's experiments demonstrated, such an aircraft need not necessarily be disc shaped; triangular- and square-shaped forms also exhibit antigravity lift when electrified, although disc shapes give the best performance. The triangular planforms used in the B-2 and other advanced stealth aircraft may have been deemed better for reasons of their much lower radar cross-section.

Interestingly, one of the central features of the B-2's classified technology is the makeup of its hull's outer surface. Authorities tell us that the hull is composed of a highly classified radar-absorbing material. Ceramic dielectrics are a likely choice for the B-2. Unlike many lossy dielectrics that dissipate the energy of incident radio waves and therefore function as radar wave absorbers, ceramic dielectrics are lossless, energetically noninteractive, and, hence transparent to radar waves. More important, ceramic dielectrics also have the ability to store large amounts of high-voltage charge. By covering the hull with such an electric insulator, it would be possible for the B-2 to maintain a high-voltage differential between its positive leading edge and its negative ion exhaust stream. At sea level, the breakdown voltage is about 27,000 volts per centimeter, whereas at an altitude of fourteen kilometers, the breakdown voltage drops to about 10,000 volts per centimeter. So with its 69-foot (21-meter) front-to-back dimension, the B-2 at sea level in dry air should be able to maintain a voltage differential of up to 57 million volts before arcing over, whereas at fourteen kilometers, it should be able to maintain a differential of up to 20 million volts. Military spokesmen have said that the B-2 cannot fly in rainy weather, giving the reason that its coating of radar-absorbing material can be adversely affected. The real reason is that if the hull becomes wet, it can lose its insulating properties, and the leading edge electrode can short out to the rear exhaust duct.

Even after the hull's high-voltage electrification is shut off, the hull dielectric can retain a residual charge for some time because of the dielectric absorption effect mentioned in chapter 1. This could explain rumored incidents of ground crews having been zapped by touching a B-2 too soon after it landed.

The B-2's positively charged leading edge, another key component of its propulsion technology, was also a matter of special concern to Northrop designers. According to Aviation Week, the bomber's leading edges posed a particularly challenging production problem on the first aircraft. The leading edge ionizer is most probably a conductive strip or wire that runs along the B-2's sharp prow and is electrically charged to upwards of many millions of volts. As the craft moves forward, its electrified leading edge deflects the approaching airstream to either side, so that a large fraction of the generated positive ions are carried away from its body surface and are prevented from immediately contacting and neutralizing the negative ions in the B-2's exhaust stream. As a result, the B-2 is able to build up very large space charges ahead of and behind itself that would subject it to a large gravity potential gradient. This artificially produced gravity gradient should become steeper as the B-2 attains higher speeds and deflects its positive ions outward with increasing force. Hence the B-2's electrogravitic drive should operate more efficiently when the craft is moving at higher speeds.

Best results should be obtained when the B-2 is traveling at supersonic speeds. Positive ions from its leading edge should become entrained in the upwind sonic shock front and flow away from the craft through that sonic boundary layer, later to converge on the negatively charged exhaust stream. Military sources, however, claim that the B-2 is a subsonic vehicle. Its somewhat stubby cross-section and the angle of its wings might lead one to believe that this is so. Yet these design features should not pose a problem for supersonic flight, considering that the B-2 uses an electrostatic field to deflect the approaching airstream. Brown's saucer designs similarly had a stubby cross-section and yet were intended for supersonic travel. The Air Force probably avoided disclosing the B-2's supersonic capability to avoid raising curiosity about how the craft would generate the required thrust.

In both subsonic and supersonic flight, the deflected positive ions would form an ellipsoidal sheath as they circuit around the B-2 (figure 5.4). The B-2's forward positive ion sheath would act very much like an extended positively charged electrode whose surface has a parabolic shape. Thus, the electrogravitic force propelling the B-2 would arise not just from the leading-edge electrode, but also from the entire positively charged forward ion sheath. The positive- and negative-ion space charge distributions would very much resemble the charge configuration that Brown employed in some of his later electrogravitic experiments. Compare figure 5.4 with the parabolic electrogravitic devices shown in figure 3.7 that Brown had been testing. Brown noted that he obtained a greater electrogravitic thrust when the positive electrode was curved and made much larger than his negative electrode. At the time they exit the B-2's exhaust nozzles, the negative ions should be spatially much more concentrated than the positive ions emitted along the B-2's leading edge, so the field gradient from front to back would be very nonlinear.

As mentioned in chapter 3, in describing the operation of his vertical-lift test rigs, Brown had voiced the necessity of establishing a nonlinear field gradient across the intervening dielectric to maximize thrust. As in these laboratory test rigs, the B-2 would have established a highly nonlinear field from aft to fore while in flight. The field lines would have a very high flux density at the negatively charged exhaust stream exiting the rear of the craft and would have diverged out to a much lower field flux density at the greatly dispersed, positively charged ion sheath surrounding the front of the craft. This same asymmetry would characterize the polarization of the B-2's ceramic dielectric hull, the field lines being most concentrated toward the negatively charged exhaust ducts and most dispersed toward its positive leading-edge electrode.

The electrostatic field produced by the ions surrounding the B-2 would exert forces on the B-2's polarized dielectric body that would produce a net forward thrust, as shown in figure 5.5. The high concentration of negative charges at the rear end of the craft would repel its negatively charged tail forward. Electrostatic attraction forces would also assist the craft's forward thrust by pulling its negatively charged stern toward its positively charged bow shock. The electric field would fan out and therefore drop in intensity toward the B-2's bow, so opposing forces acting on the front of the craft would be weaker and would have force components vectored mainly crosswise to the craft's direction of travel. The rearward slant of the B-2's positively charged bow shock would also assist the craft's forward propulsion by producing forward vectored repulsive forces on the B-2's nose and wing leading edge. At faster velocities, the craft's bow shock would bend back to a steeper angle, thereby increasing the forward thrust delivered by these repulsive forces.

Although the charges are moving away from the aircraft at a very high velocity, they are continuously being generated and dispersed into the surrounding air. Consequently, their space charge distribution remains stationary relative to the craft. It follows the craft and continues to exert its propelling force. The electrostatic forces depicted in figure 5.5 are arrayed quite differently from the electrogravitic forces shown in figure 5.4, but both would assist the craft's forward propulsion. Not enough is known at this point to say which of these sets of forces would be more important in propelling the craft.

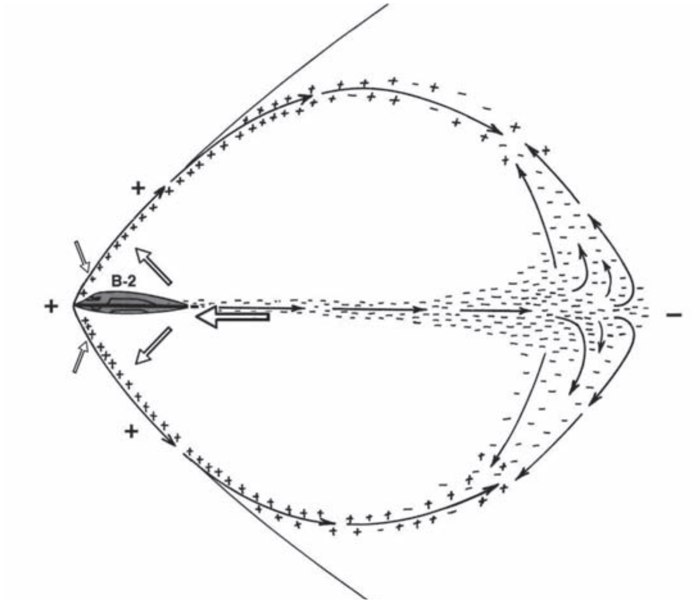

Figure 5.5. Side view of the B-2 showing the direction of the electrostatic repulsion forces (large white arrows) developed between the craft's charged body and the surrounding ion space charge. (P. LaViolette, © 2006)

As seen in figure 5.6, both of the B-2's leading edges are segmented into eight sections separated from one another by 10-centimeter-wide struts. Quite possibly, the struts electrically isolate the sections so that they may be individually electrified. In this way, through proper control of the applied voltage, it would be possible to gravitically steer the craft. Brown had suggested a similar idea as a way of steering his saucer craft.

The leading-edge sections positioned in front of the air scoops are, most likely, sparingly electrified so as to prevent positive ions from entering the engine ducts and neutralizing the negative ions being produced there. These two nonelectrified leading-edge sections would be ideal places to mount forward-looking radar antennae, since the ion plasma sheath produced by the other leading-edge sections would form a barrier that would interfere with radar signal transmission. In fact, the B-2's two Hughes Aircraft radar units are mounted precisely in these leading-edge locations, right in front of the air intakes. The ellipsoidal ion plasma sheath that envelops the B-2 would strongly attenuate incoming radar pulses as well as any signal reflected back by the craft, thereby substantially reducing the B-2's radar visibility. This ion sheath might actually attenuate radar signals better than the ceramic radar-absorbing material that composes the B-2's hull. In fact, the military continues to research ways of using plasmas to absorb radar signals in the hope that a plasma-enveloped plane would be radar invisible.[12]

The Hughes radar units may also be supplying microwave energy to the B-2's leading edge to assist the air-ionization process. Microwave frequencies emitted along the leading edge would readily ionize the approaching air and allow the B-2's high-voltage electric field to discharge a greater flux of positive ions. With increased ion currents, the B-2 would be able to generate a greater ion sheath space charge at a given velocity and thereby increase the electrogravitic and electrostatic thrust propelling the craft. New Scientist magazine reported that NASA's Langley Research Center in Hampton, Virginia, had conducted wind tunnel tests in which they used a microwave beam to create a plasma upwind of an aircraft wing in a Mach 6 airflow and found dramatic reductions in air drag.[13] Quite likely, the B-2 has been using the same technique, although a high-voltage radio frequency field might work just as well.

5.2 ■ THE B-2'S FLAME-JET GENERATORS

The excerpt from the October 1954 Aviation Report article quoted in chapter 2 suggests that there should be a division of responsibility in the program to develop a Mach 3 electrogravitic aircraft, that the "condenser assembly which is the core of the main structure" be developed by an airframe manufacturer and that the flame-jet generator that provides the electrostatic energy for the craft should be developed by companies specializing in jet engine technology. Consistent with that suggestion, we find that Northrop Grumman, a company experienced in aircraft electrostatics, was contracted to develop the B-2's airframe and that General Electric, a company experienced in the development of jet engines and superconducting electric generators, was contracted by the U.S. Air Force to develop the B-2's engines. Recall that the 1956 Aviation Studies report mentions General Electric as one of the companies involved in early electrogravitics work. Also, note that Brown had conducted vacuum chamber experiments at the General Electric Space Center and that the Electrokinetics Corporation, which had hired him as a consultant, was located just several miles away.

The Air Force states that the stealth bomber is powered by four General Electric F-118-GE-100 jet engines similar to those used in the F-16 fighter, but the B-2's engines quite likely have been modified to function as flame-jet high-voltage generators. The propulsive force lofting the craft, then, would come not only from the mechanical thrust of the jet exhaust, but also from the electrogravitic and electrostatic force fields set up around the craft that would be powered by the jet's generators. Such flame-jet generators also would account for the presence of ions, which Aviation Week says are present in the B-2's exhaust stream. As in Brown's saucer, the engine nozzle would acquire a high positive charge as it exhausted negative ions. Presumably, the engine is electrically insulated from the aircraft hull and surrounding ductwork and its positive charges are conducted forward to power the leading-edge ionizers.

The B-2's General Electric engines are reported to each be capable of putting out 19,000 pounds of thrust. Consequently, all four engines together should provide the B-2 with a total output of about 140,000 horsepower, which translates into an electric power output of about 25 megawatts, assuming a 30 percent conversion efficiency.* By comparison, the November 1954 Aviation Report concluded that a 35-foot-diameter electrogravitic combat disc would need to have access to about 50 megawatts of power in order to attain Mach 3 flight speeds. Thus it appears that the magnitude of the B-2's power output is in the right ballpark.

A total of about 50 kilowatts of power (50 kilovolts × 1 ampere) probably would be sufficient to get the engine ionizers started. This could easily be handled by electric generators mechanically driven by the jet turbines. Once the flame-jet generators were operable and power was being extracted out of the ionized exhaust stream, the power draw of the leading-edge and exhaust ionizers could be allowed to rise much higher, to tens of megawatts.

The B-2 may use superconducting generators for its more conventional means of generating power from its turbines. Such generators have the advantage of being nearly 100 percent efficient in converting shaft power to electricity and of being extremely lightweight, weighing less than one-tenth as much as conventional generators. The first superconducting generator was developed in the mid-1970s by scientists at the General Electric Research Laboratory working under an Air Force contract. Subsequently, the generators were being mass-produced for the Air Force.

When the B-2 was unveiled in 1988, one Air Force official commented that it uses a system of baffles to mix cool intake air with its hot exhaust gases so as to cool the gases and thereby make them less visible to infrared-guided missiles. Although infrared invisibility might be one side benefit, most likely the real purpose for diluting the exhaust is to greatly increase the flow volume and, hence, the ability of the exhaust stream to eject negative charges from the craft. Much of the air entering the B-2's intake scoops would bypass the inlet to the flame jet and be allowed to mix in with the jet's hot ionized exhaust (figure 5.6).

*This horsepower estimate is based on the assumption that the jets would be able to propel the craft to a velocity of about 600 miles per hour (Mach 0.8).

Actually, the jet's exhaust has an aspirator effect in that friction between the exhaust stream and the surrounding air creates a sheer layer that naturally entrains the bypassed air into the exhaust flow and thoroughly mixes the two. As a result, the temperature and velocity of the exhaust stream drop as its volume increases. At the same time, the sound that normally emanates from the exhaust's shear layer, which is the prime contributor to a jet's sonic boom, is substantially muffled, for all this occurs within the engine shroud. Aeronautical engineers call this air-mixing exhaust nozzle an ejector-type suppressor nozzle.

A series of electrified conical collars, similar to those described in Brown's patent 3,022,430 (see figure 2.10), located in the exhaust nozzle might inject additional negative ions into the mixed exhaust stream, thereby boosting its ion content. This augmented volume of ionized gases then discharges through the two rectangular exhaust ports positioned near the rear of the B-2's wing and contacts the titanium-coated overwing exhaust ducts, portrayed in figure 5.6. These open-duct sections may function as rear electric grids that collect million-volt electrons from the exhaust streams and recycle them to power the exhaust and wing air ionizers. This might be done in the same fashion as Brown had suggested in his patent (see figure 2.9). Additional high-voltage current could be recovered from the conical electrodes.

As the exhaust leaves the craft, it passes over trailing-edge exhaust deflectors, flaps that can be swiveled so as to direct the exhaust stream either up or down for flight control. This accomplishes more than just vectoring of the exhaust's thrust; it also changes the direction of the electrogravitic force vector. When the exhaust is deflected downward, negative charges are directed below the craft. As a result, the electrogravitic force on the craft becomes vectored upward as well as forward. When the exhaust stream is deflected upward, its negative ions are directed above the craft, resulting in an electrogravitic force that is directed downward as well as forward. Thus, by using these flaps, the B-2 is able to control its force field so as to induce either a gain or a loss of altitude.

Once the B-2 attained a sufficiently high flight speed, it would receive enough airflow through its scoops that it could maintain a relatively high flow rate of ionized exhaust, even with its engine combustion substantially reduced. Since hot exhaust is not essential to its operation, the high-voltage generator could just as well run on cool intake air with fuel combustion entirely shut off. As Brown pointed out in his electrokinetic generator patent, "It is to be understood that any other fluid stream source might be substituted for the combustion chamber and fuel supply."[14]

In such a "coasting mode," in which jet combustion is entirely shut off, the B-2 would be able to fly for an indefinitely long period of time with essentially zero fuel consumption, powering itself primarily with energy tapped from its self-generated gravity gradient. For example, during coasting, the kinetic energy of the scooped airstream would arise entirely from the craft's own forward motion, with this motion being due to the pull of the electrogravitic propulsion field. The kinetic energy of this ionized airstream is responsible for linearly accelerating negative ions down the B-2's exhaust ducts and, hence, for creating the multimegavolt potential difference relative to the positively charged engine body. The craft's high-voltage electron collector grids—the overwing exhaust ducts and other collector surfaces possibly hidden in the exhaust nozzle—recover a portion of this electric power to run the ionizers for the craft's flame-jet generator. Provided that this power drain is not excessive and that the plane's propulsive gravity field can be adequately maintained, the craft would be able to achieve a state of perpetual propulsion. As mentioned in chapter 1, such perpetual motion behavior is possible in devices having the capability to manipulate their own gravity field. Moreover, when the B-2 flies at a sufficiently high velocity, such that the flow rate of its scooped air exceeds many times the exhaust flow rate from its jet turbines, the electric power output of its mixed exhaust will be comparably larger, perhaps exceeding 100 megawatts.

When the B-2 was first put on public display, critics had suggested that it could not risk flying at high altitudes because it might create vapor trails that would be visible to an enemy. Edward Aldridge Jr., then secretary of the Air Force, was asked whether that problem had been solved. He replied, "Yes, but we're not going to disclose how." Clearly, to explain how the B-2 could travel at high altitude with its jet combustion essentially shut off and producing no vapor trail, he would have to disclose the vehicle's nonconventional mode of propulsion. Incidentally, in such a coasting mode, the B-2's waste heat output also would be greatly reduced, hence lessening its chance of being detected with infrared sensors.

The B-2's emergency power units (EPUs) probably play a key role in assisting such high-altitude flight. According to Bill Scott, author of the book Inside the Stealth Bomber,[15] each EPU consists of a small self-contained gas turbine powered by hydrazine, a liquid that rapidly decomposes into gases when activated by a catalyst. The expanding gases are made to drive a turbine that, in turn, drives an electric generator. Public disclosures state that the purpose of the EPUs is to supply electric power to the craft should the B-2's four jet engines happen to flame out or its four electric generators happen to simultaneously fail. More likely, they were designed to function as auxiliary generators capable of operating at high altitudes (or even in space), where the air would be too thin to sustain normal jet combustion. At high altitudes, the decomposed hydrazine gases would take the place of scooped air as the medium for transporting ions from the craft. That is, after passing through the EPUs, these gases would be electrified and expelled from the craft in the same fashion as would the jet exhaust. Brown noted that his electrogravitic propulsion system could run just as well using a compressed gas source such as carbon dioxide as the ion-carrying medium as it could using the exhaust from a jet engine.

When flying between an altitude of twenty-eight and eighty-three kilometers, the B-2 would have to shut off its hull electrification, since in this altitude range the air would become a very good conductor because of the glow discharge effect. By accelerating to an orbital velocity speed in the range of Mach 19 to 23 prior to reaching an altitude of twenty-five kilometers, the B-2 could coast through this forbidden region. Once in space, above an altitude of eighty-three kilometers, the vacuum would be good enough that the B-2's electrogravitic drive could once again be switched on. As mentioned earlier, it would rely on its hydrazine EPUs to power itself in spaceflight.

Figure 5.7 is a picture taken of a B-2 in transonic flight through humid coastal air. At transonic speeds, which range from just below to just above the speed of sound (Mach 0.8 to 1.3), some parts of the airflow over an aircraft become supersonic. In this speed regime, very-low-pressure areas form at various locations around an aircraft, and if the aircraft happens to be passing through humid air near the dewpoint, visible clouds can form in these low-pressure areas and remain with the aircraft as it travels. Figure 5.8 shows a cloud formed around an F/A-18 jet fighter flying at transonic speed.

Northrop Grumman has produced a movie clip showing the B-2 in various flight modes. It is available for public viewing at its website, www.is.northropgrumman.com/windows_media/b2_tx.wmv. One segment near the beginning of the clip, which lasts for one and a half seconds, shows the B-2 surrounded by transonic vapor condensation clouds as it flies through humid air. French astrophysicist Jean-Pierre Petit has posted this segment on his website and notes that the vapor cloud above the B-2's wing visibly luminesces as though it was being excited by a high-voltage field.[16] The reader is also referred to color stills from this video posted on Petit's website. Unfortunately, we were not able to secure permission from Northrop Grumman to reproduce the stills here.

The segments from this video show that the cloud itself has a yellow luminous hue, a color that differs from the white color that such clouds would normally exhibit in sunlight. Since at high voltages fog is more subject to electrical breakdown than is dry air, a high-voltage field could excite a glow discharge in an overwing vapor cloud to appear much like the luminescence seen in the video. An orange hue is also seen reflecting from the portion of the B-2's upper-wing surface that borders the vapor cloud. Interestingly, in the last two frames of the video clip segment, the vapor cloud almost entirely vanishes, yet this orange luminescence or glow reflection is still apparent on the B-2's wing, suggesting that the high-voltage field is still active. It is surprising that this cloud disappearance happens suddenly from one frame to the next, in less than a tenth of a second. It is not clear whether this change is due to a sudden change in air humidity or whether the B-2's electric field was being switched to a lower setting.

The B-2 is not quite as invisible to detection as is often claimed. For example, its flame-jet generator exhaust could generate a radio noise signal. If that's so, the random high-velocity movement of negative ions present in the turbulent exhaust stream would produce radio wave noise emission. This could explain the signal noise that one TV viewer reported at the time of one B-2 sighting. Also, although invisible to radar detection at microwave frequencies, at lower frequencies such as are used in television broadcasting, the B-2 produces a distinct reflection. Just like conventional low-flying airplanes, it causes a local distortion in the TV signals received by residential televisions. In fact, during the war in Yugoslavia, Serbs were monitoring TV disturbance patterns over populated areas as a method of alerting them to when a B-2 was in the area and to determine where one might be located at any given time. In retaliation, the Americans bombed their television transmitting tower.

5.3 ▪ AC ELECTRIFICATION?

It is possible that the B-2 superimposes an AC signal on its DC bias potential. The Aviation Studies "Electrogravitic Systems" report mentions using high-K dielectrics energized with 50,000 kilovolt-amps of power as a means for propelling a supersonic combat vehicle of the sort proposed in Project Winterhaven. This clearly implicates the use of high-voltage AC. So, we might venture that, in addition to the DC bias potential, a high-frequency AC field is applied between the wing leading edge and the rear exhaust ports. If the excitation frequency was chosen to be 30 megahertz, then a quarter wavelength would have fit across the ten-meter distance from the exhaust ducts to the wing leading edge. This would have allowed the applied AC field to resonantly build up to a high voltage potential, similar to what Brown was achieving with his electrokinetic apparatus. This could be done with a high-voltage class C amplifier designed to automatically lock in on the wing's resonant frequency. By repeatedly charging and discharging the craft's dielectric, the AC field would also have kept the craft's dielectric from fully polarizing and building up an electric dipole moment that might cancel out most of the field propulsion thrust effects.

We might venture that the same AC energization technique may also be used to provide vertical thrust to the B-2, thereby allowing it to hover. The B-2 is said to have a weight of about 158,000 pounds (72 metric tons) when empty and about twice that when fully loaded. For a wing area of 460 square meters, this works out to about 16 grams per square centimeter empty or 32 grams per square centimeter when fully loaded. By comparison, Brown's 18-inch-diameter vertical electrokinetic thruster was generating an upward force of 125 grams when energized at 170 kilovolts. This amounts to a lift of about 0.08 gram per square centimeter. So, to generate a force sufficient to support the B-2, a thrust-per-unit area only four hundred times greater would be needed. This could easily be accomplished simply by using a high-K dielectric for the thruster's central insulator and energizing the device at a higher voltage. The "Electrohydrodynamics" report mentions that thrust increased exponentially with voltage, according to the square or cube of voltage. Moreover, the data Bahnson presented in his 1965 patent indicates that thrust on an AC-energized test rig increased according to the 2.6 power of voltage. Extrapolating this, we find that Brown's vertical thruster would deliver greater than a hundred times more thrust if it were energized at 1,000 rather than 170 kilovolts. Also, if Brown had replaced his Pyrex insulator with a material such as barium titanate, having a higher dielectric constant and higher mass density, this would have boosted the thrust by an additional thirty-two-fold. So instead of just 125 grams of force, Brown's thruster could have produced an amazing 400 kilograms of force. If 380 of these asymmetrical capacitors were distributed over the B-2's lower wing surface, they would collectively produce an upward thrust of 152 tons, sufficient to loft a fully loaded B-2. Brown is likely to have made similar thrust projections in proposing his electrogravitics idea to the military. We may be erring on the low side in making this estimate, since dielectrics are known to exist that have K values more than four times higher than the K value of barium titanate.*

To ensure that the thruster electrodes did not arc over at these high voltages, the interior space of the arcuate canopy (shown in figure 3.2) could be filled with a low-K insulator. The entire thruster together with its high-strength canopy, central high-K dielectric, surrounding low-K insulator, and high-voltage step-up transformer might weigh only 20 kilograms, which would amount to 2 percent of the thrust that the device would be producing.

The "Electrohydrodynamics" report states that under vacuum conditions, Brown's electrokinetic capacitor drew just 2 microamps of current at 250,000 volts. At the 1,000-kilovolt potential proposed for the B-2 thrusters, this leakage current would probably extrapolate to about 30 microamps, or about 30 watts of power. Adding in the power requirement for the AC microwave source used to excite the negative electrode, the total power consumption might come to about 100 watts per thruster, or about 38 kilowatts total. Given that each thruster would be yielding 400 kilograms of force, this amounts to a thrust-to-power ratio of about 40,000 newtons per kilowatt, or about 2,700 times that of a jet engine.

As an alternative to Brown's electrokinetic thrusters, the B-2 could be lofted by a series of Lafforgue field propulsion thrusters of the type discussed in chapter 12. Theoretical projections suggest that such a capacitor, measuring 38 centimeters high, 8 centimeters wide, and 1 meter long, made with a K = 4,000 barium titanate dielectric, would be capable of delivering a lift of 2 tons when charged to 100 kilovolts. Currently, there is no laboratory data available on barium titanate Lafforgue thrusters to back up this projection, but if it is correct, it would imply that seventy-five such thrusters would be sufficient to levitate a fully loaded B-2.

*The black-project scientists mentioned earlier in this chapter disclosed information about the development of low-radar-observability dielectric ceramics made from powdered, depleted uranium.[17] The material is said to have approximately 92 percent the bulk density of uranium, which would give it a specific gravity of about 17.5. Thus, this new material would have a mass density about three times that of barium titanate and so would develop a comparably greater electrogravitic pull. Asymmetrical thrusters possibly incorporated in the B-2's wing may use a high-density dielectric of this sort adjacent to their negative electrodes where the field strength and gravitic thrust would be highest.

Earlier, we spoke of General Electric's Air Force–funded development of lightweight superconducting generators, with the Air Force being the prime purchaser. Such generators might not only be used to run the B-2's electrical equipment, but might also be the principle means by which the craft generates AC power for its vertical lofting. Power from these generators would be fed to a network of high-voltage step-up transformers attached to each thruster. High-voltage AC power could also be conveyed between the leading-edge electrode and the overwing exhaust ducts to enhance the B-2's forward thrust. Power applied at a radio frequency of some tens of megahertz would have helped ionize the airstream approaching the wing's leading edge to soften the shock front, having the same effect as a microwave ionizer.

By having a distributed array of vertical thrusters, the potential of each thruster could be made to "float" so that those located closer to the bow of the B-2 would operate at a more positive DC potential than those at the stern. Also, the B-2 could accomplish pitch stabilization by selectively powering these thrusters. Activating more thrusters on its left side, for example, would cause the craft to execute a clockwise roll to its right. Thus, its thrusters would take the place of mechanical flaps on conventional planes. This selective energization could be carried out by an onboard computer, which would automatically control the stability of the B-2 with the help of a fuzzy logic servo system.

After the B-2 bomber was unveiled, scientists at the British Aerospace Corporation (BAE Systems) were eager to reverse-engineer its propulsion system. In 1996, a member of their Advanced Concepts Office privately told one visitor that they were aware that the B-2 flies by means of some form of antigravity propulsion and that the craft has a very massive power supply. Indeed, if the B-2 had superconducting generators and numerous high-voltage transformers on board, its power supply would have been quite massive.

In 1997, a three-star general told retired Air Force colonel Donald Ware he knows that "the new Lockheed Martin space shuttle [National Space Plane] and the B-2 [stealth bomber] both have electrogravitic systems on board"; and that "this explains why our 21 Northrop B-2s cost about a billion dollars each. Thus, after taking off conventionally, the B-2 can switch to antigravity mode, and, I have heard, fly around the world without refueling."[18]

Ware made this comment four years after I had presented my paper on the B-2's electrogravitic propulsion system at the 1993 International Symposium on New Energy.[19] After presenting this paper, I sent a copy of it to Bill Scott, editor of Aviation Week and Space Technology, the same magazine that had made the original disclosure about the B-2 charging the leading edge of its wing with high voltage. Scott, who has formerly worked for the National Security Agency, has himself flown the B-2 bomber during test-flight operations. Some time after sending the paper, I telephoned him and asked him what he thought. His response was, "[V]ery interesting, very interesting." He would say no more.

That same year Ben Rich, the man who had led the development of the F-117 Stealth Fighter at Lockheed's secret research and development Skunk Works, gave an alumni speech at his UCLA alma mater in which he stated: "We already have the means to travel among the stars, but these technologies are locked up in black projects, and it would take an act of God to even get them out to benefit humanity . . . Anything you can imagine, we already know how to do." Rich was right about the difficulty of breaking the military code of secrecy. In October 2007 I heard from a reliable U.S. government source that Boeing recently completed a classified electrogravitics propulsion project for the military that had certain novel features. The technology worked so well that they felt it could be of fantastic benefit if used on their commercial jet airliners. They reportedly applied for declassification of their invention for commercial use, but were denied permission.

GRAVITY BEAM PROPULSION

6.1 ▪ EXPLAINING THE ELECTROGRAVITIC IMPULSE EFFECT

A high-voltage shock discharge produces a momentary gravitational thrust that we may refer to as the electrogravitic impulse effect. One example of this is the train of shock discharges that were emitted from Tesla's high-voltage magnifying transmitter (see figure 6.1). The shocks created thrusts in their direction of travel with minimal reversal occurring during their intervening relaxation periods. Tesla frequently remarked on the force that such impulses would exert on distant objects. He noted that when he stood near the source of the discharges, he could feel them as a great force or sharp pressure striking the whole front of his body.[1] These effects were most apparent as a stinging of the face or hands, which persisted even when he situated himself behind glass and metal shields as far as 50 feet from the shock source. By properly adjusting the discharger on his transmitter, he was able to either project forces outward or direct forces inward.[2]

Tesla referred to these longitudinal force field rays as radiant energy, although the usual use of this term was to signify the radiation of transverse electromagnetic waves. He fashioned a series of long vacuum tubes to project the radiant energy waves he was producing. These "beam-ray tubes" employed a single concave negative electrode in one end and, in many cases, had a thin metallic window, usually aluminum or beryllium, at the opposite end. Despite the hard vacuum that they were initially provided with, these tubes often developed anomalously high pressures and often exploded. In Secrets of Cold War Technology, Vassilatos notes that Eric Dollard, who duplicated many of Tesla's beam-ray experiments in the 1980s, also observed the anomalous force that these tubes developed. Vassilatos wrote that "vacuum bulbs so activated actually ruptured in tiny holes, and yet continued to produce their 'vacuum' discharges! Mr. Dollard and the witnesses of these experiments reported hearing a hissing issuance which emerged from the glass rupture holes. Once the activating energy was removed, the globes simply imploded."[3]

Dollard has demonstrated both mass-repulsion and mass-attraction effects being produced by radiant energy impulses. Tesla conceived these discharges as being waves conducted in a rarefied ether. Vassilatos wrote:

> In his article, Tesla describes the shield-permeating shocks as "sound waves of electrified air." Nevertheless, he makes a remarkable statement concerning the sound, heat, light, pressure, and shock which he sensed passing directly through copper plates. Collectively, they "imply the presence of a medium of gaseous structure, that is, one consisting of independent carriers capable of free motion." Since air > was obviously not this “medium,” to what then was he referring? Further in the article he clearly states that “besides the air, another medium is present.”[4]

Tesla’s reference to etheric sound waves implies an ether medium that is compressible and that transmits waves longitudinally, much as air transmits sound. The ether he visualized was very different from the elastic solid ether proposed by the nineteenth-century ether physicists that was supposed to transmit electromagnetic waves by means of transverse stresses in its lattice, creating forces perpendicular to the direction of wave propagation. Tesla adopted this different view because the forces produced by his shocks were directed longitudinally, not transversely. As such, his concept of the ether comes close to the transmuting ether idea suggested in subquantum kinetics, which views a local energy potential as a localized high or low etheron concentration and an energy potential wave as a propagating etheron concentration magnitude. The alternate increase and decrease of etheron concentration that would characterize a passing wave very much resembles Tesla’s idea of alternate compression and rarefaction of an ether gas.

Tesla ascribed the longitudinal forces he observed to the action of ether currents propelled forward by the ether shocks he was generating. However, as is suggested below, the net force imparted by these impulses is more likely due to the action of the potential gradient (the etheron concentration gradient) rather than to any mechanical momentum-type action arising from an associated ether wind.

Experiments performed by Eugene Podkletnov and his coworkers at a laboratory in Russia provide yet another example of the existence of the electrogravitic impulse effect. Using his knowledge of crystals and ceramic materials, Podkletnov developed a unique superconducting ceramic material, yttrium-barium-copper-oxide ($YBa_2Cu_3O_{7-y}$), and conducted a series of experiments in which he emitted high-voltage discharges from an electrode that had been coated with this superconducting material. In his early experiments, he applied thin coatings of this superconductor to the surfaces of metal spheres having diameters ranging from 25 to 50 centimeters. He would cryogenically cool a sphere, charge it to 500 kilovolts with a Van de Graaff generator, and then allow it to discharge across a gap to a second metal sphere. Both were contained in a helium-filled chamber (figure 6.3).[5] He observed that a weak gravitational pulse was emitted that was able to move a newspaper taped to the wall in an adjoining room. The force did not appear to diminish with distance.

In later experiments, which used a modified version of this spark gap, Podkletnov determined that this force was gravitational in nature. He succeeded in confining the impulse to a narrow beam that was capable of imparting strong longitudinal forces to very distant test masses. For these tests, he elaborated on the technology by enclosing his discharge apparatus in a vacuum chamber. Also, instead of a sphere, he used a 10-centimeter-diameter, 0.8-centimeter-thick superconducting ceramic disc for his emitter (see figure 6.4).[6–8] The disc was cooled to 50 to 70K, and an inner electromagnet coil induced a “frozen-in” magnetic field oriented perpendicular to the face of the disk to assist in collimating the discharge. An outer coil that girdled the discharge chamber was used to generate an auxiliary field to further enhance the collimating effect of the inner magnetic field. Podkletnov then used a Marx capacitor bank to generate a high-voltage electron pulse ranging from 0.5 to 2 megavolts, which he discharged through the disc and across the evacuated gap toward a 1.5-centimeter-thick copper anode of similar diameter.

When the capacitor bank was discharged, a coherent plane wave was emitted from the superconducting cathode as a flat, 10-centimeter-diameter glowing disc covering the entire electrode surface, which then propagated toward the anode. Using a laser beam as a sensor, Podkletnov and his associates were able to determine that the discharge had a rise time of less than 100 nanoseconds and a duration of the order of 10 to 100 microseconds. A gravity shock wave was apparently accompanying this electron discharge. While the electron discharge terminated at the beam generator's anode, a gravitational shock wave, apparently accompanying the discharge, would continue in the same direction, passing through the anode unstopped and emerging as a gravity impulse that was confined to a 10-centimeter-diameter beam matching the anode's cross-section.

When fired with a discharge voltage of 2 million volts, the emitted wave was found to produce a 14-centimeter deflection of an 18.5-gram pendulum bob suspended from an 80-centimeter-long thread and placed at a distance of 150 meters from the beam generator. The beam was able to exert this force after having first passed through a Faraday cage shield, an additional 2½ centimeters of steel, and a 30-centimeter-thick brick wall. This reminds us of Tesla's radiant energy shocks, which exerted forces even after having penetrated shields of copper and glass.

A quick calculation indicates that their pendulum bob experienced a momentary repulsive force of about 500,000 g with the passage of each 100-nanosecond shock front.*

Pendulum bobs of differing masses and made of various materials (e.g., rubber, glass, plastic, metal) were used, but all deflected by the same amount for a given discharge voltage. Since force on the pendulum scaled in direct proportion to the pendulum mass, Podkletnov and the physicist Giovanni Modanese concluded the effect they were seeing was gravitational in nature.[9] This mass effect rules out the possibility that momentum is being imparted to the pendulum by electromagnetic radiation pressure. Furthermore, the amount of electromagnetic energy produced by the discharge is far too small to explain the observed force effects. These pendulum results also rule out the possibility that this force might be due to a longitudinal "electrokinetic force," of the sort proposed by American physicist and professor Oleg Jefimenko, which would act only on free charges present in the target material.[10] If the force produced by the gravity impulse beam were due to such electrokinetic ion forces, differing force magnitudes should have been observed when differing pendulum bob materials were tested, and such was not seen. Figure 6.5 shows the amount of deflection that the pendulum experienced when the gravity beam generator was energized at various voltages.

Experiments conducted with smoke indicate that the air in the path of the gravity beam would briefly move forward and back with the passage of each emitted gravity impulse. Firing the gravity impulses through pressure-sensitive carbon paper at varying distances consistently produced a 10-centimeter-diameter black circle. This indicates that the beam was able to maintain tight coherence over large distances, with the force of the beam cutting off sharply outside of this circular boundary. In this fashion, this impulse beam is comparable to a laser

*In their 2003 paper, Podkletnov and Modanese reported a lower instantaneous acceleration of the order of approximately 500 g. Here they assume that the gravitational force is exerted during the entire duration of the pulse, which has a duration of 10^{-4} second. However, subquantum kinetics suggests that the gravitational force is delivered by the gradient at the forefront of their shock wave, which is of much shorter duration, having a rise time of less than 100 nanoseconds. This implies an instantaneous gravitational acceleration a thousand times larger than they calculate.

beam, but achieves its coherence without the help of a resonator cavity. In an article in Jane's Defense Weekly, Nick Cook reported that a laboratory installation in Russia had demonstrated that, when fitted with a laser sight, this beam was able to knock over a set of books one kilometer away and that it exhibited negligible power loss even at a distance of two hundred kilometers.[11–13]

According to Cook, engineers at the Boeing Aerospace Corporation Phantom Works facility in Seattle were actively interested in investigating this beam technology with the aim of developing it into an R&D project. An internal company briefing document written entitled "Gravity Research for Advanced Space Propulsion" states, "If gravity modification is real, it will alter the entire aerospace business."[14] Other aerospace companies interested in Podkletnov's beam generator included BAE Systems and Lockheed Martin. Cook reported, however, that the Russian government had resisted allowing the gravity beam technology to be exported.

Subquantum kinetics predicts that Podkletnov's gravity impulse beam generator would produce no recoil when fired. That is, the back-directed impulse, which is delivered to the superconducting cathode at the time the electron pulse discharges, is canceled out by the equal and opposite forward-directed impulse delivered to the anode when the anode subsequently absorbs the electron discharge. However, the gravity field pulse, which continues its forward journey through and past the anode, would then produce additional forward thrusts on all masses through which it passed, in apparent violation of Newton's third law of motion. In this case, when these remote thrusts are included, it is no longer true that every action necessarily produces an equal and opposite reaction.

In 2003 I wrote to Dr. Podkletnov indicating to him my belief that his impulse generator should produce no recoil when it is operating and also that, based on subquantum kinetics, I expected that his pulses would propagate at superluminal speeds.[15] He wrote back that I was correct that, in fact, the device produces "no back mechanical reaction" when fired and also that his team had found that the pulses traveled superluminally. He said that they were able to determine that the pulses traveled at close to sixty-three to sixty-four times the speed of light, a result that they planned to check and recheck before submitting it for publication. He also wrote, "It is amazing that you could predict the effects that we have observed. We will be happy to learn more about your subquantum kinetics approach."[16] I subsequently sent him a copy of my book Subquantum Kinetics, and in 2004 he published a very favorable review about it in Infinite Energy magazine.[17]

In their 2003 paper, Podkletnov and Modanese acknowledge that conventional theories of gravity fail to explain the action of their gravity impulse beam. For example, general relativity predicts that gravity waves should induce quadrupolar forces in a target mass that are oriented transverse to the direction of wave travel. Instead, the gravity impulse beam is observed to produce repulsive longitudinally directed gravitational forces, hence, in line with the direction of wave propagation. This is just as Tesla had observed for his shock discharges. It also confirms a key prediction of subquantum kinetics that electrons would produce matter-repelling gravity potential hills (G-etheron hills) and that a change in the electric or gravity potential field should propagate forward as a longitudinal potential wave.[18,19]

Subquantum kinetics offers the following explanation of how these gravity waves might be generated: A shock discharge from a cathode to an anode would produce a wave having a sharp rise in electric field potential, followed by a more gradual relaxation. As described in chapter 4, section 4.1, subquantum kinetics predicts that an electron should generate a gravity potential hill. An electron discharge, then, would be accompanied by an in-phase gravity potential wave. This would appear similar to that shown in figure 6.6, in which the wave is shown traveling from right to left. The front of this wave would consist of a sharp rise in G-on concentration, that is, a rise in gravity potential. Its gradient would induce a gravitational force on encountered masses in its forward direction of travel, shown as from right to left in the figure. Hence, it would have a repulsive effect. The trailing part of the wave, which would have a declining gravity potential, would induce an opposing thrust that would create an attractive force on encountered masses. This drawing is highly idealized, since a pulse discharge typically produces an oscillating decline in voltage as it tails off.

A force (F) applied to an object over a period of time (t) yields a quantity called impulse, the product of force and time (I = F×t), which equals the resulting change in the object's momentum. So if a forward repulsive force exerted during the passage of the leading edge of the wave were to be ten times as great as the reverse attractive force exerted during the passage of its trailing edge but were to last only one-tenth as long as the force exerted during the passage of the trailing edge, the forward impulse would exactly equal the reverse impulse. So the wave's passage would have no net effect on the momentum of the target mass.

Consequently, to explain the findings of Podkletnov and Modanese, another important factor must be involved—virtual charge. The advancing electron discharge would be accompanied by a negative electric potential wave, and not only would the front of this wave have a very steep drop in voltage with distance, but also its voltage would change with distance in a highly nonlinear manner.* So this shock front would be associated with the creation of a very high negative virtual charge density that would produce an enormous matter-repelling gravity field.

This sudden drop in voltage may be modeled with the exponential equation $V = -r^{10}$, which is plotted in figure 6.7a. Relation 7, from chapter 4, predicts that this should produce a gravity potential field varying as $\varphi_g(r) \propto \nabla^2\varphi_E(r)$, hence as $\varphi_g \propto r^8$. This exceedingly steep gravity potential profile is plotted in figure 6.7b. The wave is plotted in the figure as traveling to the left, and its gravity gradient would be producing a force depicted as directed to the left, hence it would be repulsive. The damped sine wave oscillation that trails the shock front would produce a gravitational thrust that was many orders of magnitude smaller and oscillating from a reverse to a forward direction. However, the forward thrusts would always dominate, resulting in a net repulsive thrust.

When the electron discharge is absorbed in the impulse generator's anode, the electric field potential of the discharge goes to zero. Nevertheless, the gravity wave that was generated while the discharge was in flight continues to move forward. It passes through the anode and ultimately produces thrust effects on distant masses.

The steep gravity potential gradient at the shock's leading edge would induce a convective G-on flux in the direction of wave propagation, or, in other words, would create a G-on ether wind. The G-on fluxes described here would be accompanied by X-on fluxes traveling in the same direction (and by Y-on fluxes traveling in the opposite direction). In effect, with each firing of the gravity impulse beam, a puff of *Relativistic length-contraction effects would also contribute to the steepness of this front. For example, at 500 kilovolts, the electron discharge would consist of 0.5 MeV electron with a mass twice as great as its rest mass. Electrons would be traveling at 87 percent of the velocity of light and would have a Lorentz factor of 2. Consequently, the voltage rise time would be compressed by a factor of 2, making the potential gradient twice as steep. At 2 MeV, the electrons would be traveling at 98 percent of the speed of light and would have a Lorentz factor of 5, which would make their potential gradient five times as steep.

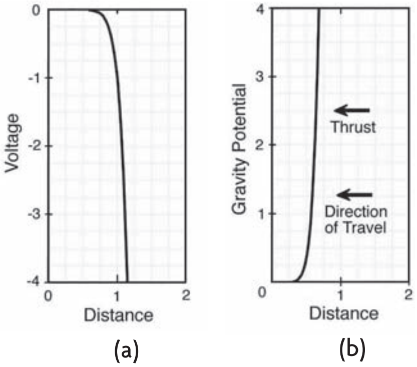
Figure 6.7. (a) Voltage at the front of the electron shock discharge plotted as a function of time or distance. The wave travels to the left. (b) Corresponding gravity potential profile arising from the virtual charge density the wave would generate. (P. LaViolette, © 2007)



G-ons would travel rectilinearly away from the cathode. We may compare this to the firing of a cannon, in which the outward flight of the cannonball is accompanied by a forward-moving slug of air that creates a collimated ring vortex, or smoke ring. In a similar fashion, this G-on puff would be accompanied by an outward-moving G-on ring vortex that may help to collimate the impulse.

Podkletnov's gravity beam generator does not generate gravity impulses specifically because its cathode emitter is made of superconducting material. Rather, the gravitational repulsion effect of its shocks may be attributed to the electrogravitic coupling that exists between charge and gravity. The subquantum kinetics explanation given above for the production of the gravity impulse effect would apply equally well to the repulsion thrusts produced by Tesla's shock discharge pulses. The superconductivity of Podkletnov's cathode emitter more likely contributes to boosting the pulse's imparted force by sharpening and steepening its leading-edge field gradient. Also, it may help to cohere the gravity wave into a nondiverging beam.

We may surmise that this electrogravitic impulse effect manifests in essentially the same way as the Biefeld-Brown electrogravitic thrust effect. That is, it arises due to an inherent coupling between charge and gravitational mass. The impulse effect, though, exerts a much stronger instantaneous force than Brown's gravitators since its field gradient is much steeper. However, because this more intense thrust operates over a much briefer span of time, it must be cyclically repeated to produce a sustained propulsion effect.

In July 2003, Podkletnov had disclosed to me that at a higher discharge voltage, of around 10 million volts, the gravity wave pulse became so strong that it was able to substantially dent a 1-inch-thick steel plate and punch a 4-inch-diameter hole through a concrete block![20] Compared with the pendulum deflection produced by a 2-million-volt discharge, this kind of damage implies at least a thousandfold increase in the delivered force. Such a large impulse is not predicted by the trend line presented in figure 6.5, which shows pendulum deflection plateauing as pulse voltage increases. This trend projects a twofold increase in the impulse strength, not a thousandfold increase. Subquantum kinetics predicts that voltage gradients that are steeper and more nonlinear should deliver greater gravitic thrusts; recall equation 8 of chapter 4. So I theorized that for these more forceful gravity pulses, Podkletnov's research team must have powered their pulse generator with an improved Marx bank, one that was capable of delivering its charge much more rapidly to the beam generator's superconducting disc, allowing it to produce a gravity potential pulse having a steeper rise time.

To check whether my suspicions were correct, in 2007 I wrote to Dr. Podkletnov explaining my reasons for suspecting that he used an improved Marx bank to enable his pulse generator to generate these higher thrust pulses.[21] He wrote back confirming that this was indeed the case, that they had modified their Marx bank so that the pulse voltage on the superconducting emitter rose much more rapidly.[22] He stated that they observed that the faster the increase in voltage at the cathode emitter, the larger the generated impulse force. Since a faster voltage rise time would increase the nonlinearity of the pulse, their observations of a greater resulting thrust are consistent with the predictions of subquantum kinetics. Podkletnov also disclosed that this improved pulse generator exhibited increased thrust power even when energized with 5-million-volt pulses. Also, he noted that these powerful pulses would sometimes bend the generator's copper anode as well as damage the walls of the discharge chamber. It is perhaps because of these higher impulse results that the Russian government is resisting export of the technology. Indeed, technology with such capabilities could be misused as a weapon.

6.2 ■ SUPERLUMINAL PULSES

Let us now examine some astounding evidence that shows that superluminal (i.e., faster than the speed of light) space travel is possible and at the same time refutes Einstein's outmoded special theory of relativity. One example of superluminal wave propagation is found in the gravity shock fronts produced by Podkletnov's beam generator. His research team was able to measure the speed of their gravity beam pulses by using an oscilloscope to mark the moments when the gravity pulse momentarily dimmed two laser beams directed across the beam's path. Knowing the distance between the laser beam cross-points and the times registered for each successive dimming, they were able to determine the speed of a gravity pulse. As mentioned earlier, Podletnov's team found that the pulses were traveling at sixty-four times the speed of light![23] They were only able to determine a lower-limit value since the speed of the pulses surpassed their oscilloscope's time resolution limit.

This controversial finding stands as a blatant disproof of the special theory of relativity, which maintains that nothing can go faster than the speed of light. However, the high speeds of these pulses becomes understandable when considered in the context of subquantum kinetics. According to subquantum kinetics, a light wave should have a speed of c, the velocity of light, relative to the local ether rest frame. Now, suppose that the field gradient of the advancing gravity potential wave accelerates a slug of ether to a high velocity relative to the surrounding laboratory ether reference frame. Let us say that it attains a velocity of 63 c. Theoretically, this should be possible since the ether is not bound by the same speed limit rules that apply to electromagnetic radiation. Now, if a light ray or shock front was moving within this ether wind slug in the same direction as the ether wind, we should find that, relative to the laboratory reference frame, this light ray would be traveling at sixty-four times the speed of light, 63 c for the speed of the ether wind slug plus 1 c for the light ray moving forward within it.

Podkletnov's team measured a far higher velocity for the concrete-smashing gravity impulses produced by their improved Marx bank pulse generator. Using a pair of synchronized atomic clocks to measure the arrival time of the impulses at separate locations, they were able to determine that the impulses were traveling at least several thousand times the speed of light, perhaps faster![24] Their faster speed may be attributed to their steeper field gradient, which would have propelled G-ons forward to a very high velocity.

In the 1980s, well before the experiments of Podkletnov and Modanese, American engineering physicist Guy Obolensky investigated the speed of electric field shocks to test Tesla's claims that his radiant energy shocks had traveled at superluminal speeds. In that work, Obolensky had shown that the sudden discharge of a 16-square-foot, high-voltage air-gap capacitor produced a surface wave that was able to travel along the length of a 7.07-meter-long transmission line at a speed of 1.23 c, hence 23 percent faster than light.[25]

In 2005 and 2006, I worked with Obolensky at his laboratory in upstate New York to investigate the superluminal speed of shock discharges. For this we used a high-voltage magnifying transmitter that Obolensky had built some years earlier and that incorporated many of Tesla's design features. Like Podkletnov's apparatus, Obolensky's magnifying transmitter is energized by the discharge of a Marx capacitor bank (figure 6.8). The electron shock discharge is conducted down the length of a horizontal, oil-filled tube called a Teslatron, which contains a lengthwise coil that helps to sharpen the shock front. Thus, it performs a function similar to that of Podkletnov's superconducting disc. The tube terminates inside a 1.2-meter-diameter, mushroom-shaped dome electrode that has a geometry similar to the dome on Tesla's Wardenclyffe tower. The electric potential of this dome "floats" at the shock's potential, so it functions much like the cathode in Podkletnov's beam generator, although it has no superconducting coating.

The shock discharge induces a damped sinusoid oscillation along the length of the Teslatron column, such that the initial negative swing in potential is followed by a positive swing, then a negative swing, and so on. This AC oscillation imprints itself on the advancing shock wave, with a typical AC pulse appearing, as shown in figure 6.9. Upon reaching the dome, the electron shock begins to fan out as it moves forward away from the electrode, forming an electric potential wave termed a Coulomb wave. This differs from a conventional electromagnetic wave in that the Coulomb wave exerts primarily longitudinal forces on charges it encounters, rather than transverse forces.

The negative swing in electric potential at the forefront of the Coulomb wave would carry a forward-moving negative virtual-charge density. The subquantum kinetics electrogravitic coupling relation predicts that this would induce a gravity wave having a rising G field and a positive gravity potential gradient. Like Podkletnov's gravity impulse, this would exert a longitudinal repulsive force on masses it traversed. The positive swing in electric potential that immediately followed it would carry a forward-moving positive virtual-charge density that would induce a decreasing G field and an attractive force on masses it encountered. As the field continued to oscillate from negative to positive, the induced gravitational force would change between repulsion and attraction. Since the individual cycles in this wave train are sawtooth shaped, with differing rising and falling slopes, they should produce a net longitudinal gravitational force that presumably is repulsive. At a later date we hope to report measurements of the gravity impulse produced by this device.

In the case of the Podkletnov gravity beam, the beam's cross-section does not appreciably increase with distance from the beam generator. As a result, the pulse forefront should maintain its initial sharp gravity field gradient as it travels forward and should maintain its ability to accelerate G-ons in its path up to the same high speed. Hence, the beam's initial superluminal speed should not appreciably diminish with travel distance. However, subquantum kinetics predicts a different circumstance for impulses radiating outward from the dome electrode of Obolensky's magnifying transmitter. Unlike the collimated shock discharges emitted by Podkletnov's gravity impulse generator, those produced by Obolensky's magnifying transmitter fan out as they radiate away from the transmitter's dome electrode. In this case, because the impulse wavefront expands radially outward as it travels forward, the velocity of its generated ether wind would decline inversely with the impulse's distance from the dome (see box on page 181).

Since the speed of a superluminal wave would be the sum of the impulse's velocity (c) relative to the local ether wind frame plus the velocity (v) of the local ether wind relative to the laboratory frame, one would expect that the wave's net velocity would begin at a superluminal speed and decline toward c as the shock wave advances and the ether wind velocity tends toward zero.

The Decline of Ether Wind Velocity with Distance

In the case of an isotropic electrostatic or gravitational field, such as extends outward from the center of a particle, the field's potential gradient is observed to decrease as the inverse square of radial distance from the particle's center. However, in the case of an electric or gravitational shock wave, the gradient should decline according to the inverse of radial distance.[26] That is, provided that the width of the pulse does not change, the gradient should decline in accordance with the $1/r$ decline of the electric or gravity field potential. In these tests, the pulse width was found to remain relatively invariant, so one would expect a $1/r$ decline in field gradient.

In fact, tests that Obolensky and I performed showed that the velocity did decline with increasing distance as predicted. The data were best matched if ether wind velocity decreased according to the inverse of distance from the electrode grounding point.[27] This was the first experiment of its kind to determine whether a shock's superluminal speed might change with increasing distance from an emitting electrode. Obolensky's test arrangement was able to measure the shock wave's time-of-flight to six collinear antenna locations. These were situated at distances ranging from 61 to 322 centimeters, as measured from a reference point located where the current impulse from his Marx bank passed to the ceiling ground plane through a ceramic disc resistor (see figure 6.8). So this experiment was able to test the validity of the subquantum kinetics prediction that the speed of the shock wave should begin at an initial superluminal value and should subsequently decline in an asymptotic approach to the speed of light (c). It also simultaneously tested a specific claim made by Tesla that the impulses from his magnifying transmitter initially departed at a theoretically infinite velocity and subsequently slowed down, slowing rapidly at first and later at a lesser rate.

Obolensky's test setup used a 1-gigahertz-bandwidth LeCroy oscilloscope able to sample data at 250-picosecond intervals. It was much faster than the oscilloscope he had used in his earlier experiments. He used two monopole antennae to detect the electric field component of the ground current shock wave as it passed by. Each antenna was made from a single 12-centimeter-long wire attached to a 50-ohm coaxial cable terminator that led to the oscilloscope, both cables being of equal length and jacketed with ferrite surface wave suppressors. The oscilloscope, in turn, determined the time lapse between the two signal currents, and knowing the distance between the antennae, the pulse's propagation speed could be calculated.

Obolensky positioned one monopole antenna pickup immediately behind the ceramic disc grounding resistor that was close to but behind the dome's rim. This antenna sensed the positive impulse current that flowed into the laboratory ceiling ground plane with the shock wave's departure. He placed the other antenna pickup at one of the predetermined locations in front of the dome antenna. On successive test runs, he moved this second pickup to each of six antenna port locations to get pulse arrival time readings at these various distances from the ground-current-sensing reference antenna.

The lower trace in figure 6.9 depicts a typical shock current pulse detected by the reference antenna that is displayed as a positive voltage rise, its voltage maximum being indicated by an arrow. The upper trace in figure 6.9 shows the corresponding superluminal surface wave shock pulse detected by the second monopole antenna pickup positioned 189.5 centimeters from the ground-current-sensing reference antenna. Its first negative potential peak is also marked with an arrow, the surface wave's polarity being the inverse of the detected ground plane current impulse. The time interval between the two arrows indicates the time-of-flight of the superluminal surface wave. The timing of a given marker was accurate to approximately 125 picoseconds. The temporal width of the shock's lead wave cycle varied very little as it moved outward, the wave cycle having a duration of about 1.77 ± 0.09 nanoseconds.

Figure 6.10 shows the time-of-flight of the pulses as measured at various distances from the dome electrode's ground. The measurements are marked as black circles and a suggested model fit is represented by the small black diamonds. The 61-centimeter data point was given a zero time lapse since the oscilloscope measurements indicated that the pulse spanned this near-electrode distance virtually instantaneously.

distances from the impulse generator's ground point based on the time-of-flight model fit performed in figure 6.10. This shows that at 80 centimeters from the ground-current-sensing reference antenna, the shock had a superluminal speed of approximately 2.32 times the speed of light, its speed progressively dropping toward the rest frame light speed (c) with increasing travel distance. The model shown assumes that ether velocity (v) varies with distance (d) as: $v = kc/(d - 61)^{1.1\pm0.1}$, in which k equals 33.6 centimeters and a distance 61 centimeters from the ground reference point is chosen as the model's zero point. Superluminal velocity (c') is then given as: $c' = c + v$.

The data strongly support the subquantum kinetics prediction that the superluminal speed of such a wave should decrease with increasing distance when radiated from a magnifying transmitter dome. Furthermore, they show that superluminal speed is a characteristic of shock discharges regardless of whether the discharges are emitted from a superconducting electrode of the sort used in the experiment by Podkletnov and Modanese. Finally, these results lend support to the unpublished findings of Podkletnov and Modanese that their gravity wave impulse had traveled at a high superluminal speed. In other words, taking the work of Tesla and that of Podkletnov and Modanese in context, we see that superluminal shock front propagation speeds are the norm rather than the exception.

Superluminal propagation speeds have also been observed in atomic bomb tests. Scientists working for the military have known since the early bomb tests in the late 1940s that the electromagnetic pulse shock wave from a nuclear explosion propagates outward at superluminal velocities when measured near the explosion epicenter. The enormous energy released in the explosion accelerates the fireball's free electrons radially outward at a relativistic velocity, generating a radially propagating shock pulse that, like a shock discharge from Obolensky's magnifying transmitter, moves outward at superluminal speeds. Subquantum kinetics attributes this breaking of the "light barrier" to the creation of a tremendous radial ether wind generated by the electric gradient of the advancing shock. For an isotropic explosion, the velocity of this ether wind would decline approximately as the inverse of the distance traveled, and similarly, the velocity of the electromagnetic pulse shock would be expected to follow this decline in an asymptotic approach to the velocity of light. At such a time when the data are declassified, it would be worth checking to see if the subquantum kinetics velocity decline prediction was born out.

Clearly, the results of Obolensky's magnifying transmitter experiment violate the fundamental premise of special relativity that energy cannot be transmitted faster than the speed of light. Beyond 1 meter from the dome's ground-current connection, the shock front travel distance exceeded the shock front's wavelength. Moreover, by the time the pulse had reached the 3-meter mark, its flight distance exceeded five pulse wavelengths. Hence, the superluminal speeds observed cannot be explained away as an allowable violation arising from quantum entanglement of the photon quantum, nor can they be ascribed to a change in shape of the shock wave profile. Thus, Einstein's theory is certainly disproved and the subquantum kinetics ether theory is vindicated.*

6.3 ▪ INTERSTELLAR SPACE TRAVEL

By itself, the electrogravitic impulse effect could serve as an excellent drive for use in interstellar space travel. One could imagine a spacecraft outfitted with a large-aperture Podkletnov gravity beam projector that would be powered by a set of very high-power Marx capacitor banks operating at potentials of up to 2 million volts and conveying its discharge to a superconducting electrode seventy times larger in diameter than the superconducting disc Podkletnov fabricated for his beam generator, that is, 7 meters in diameter instead of 10 centimeters. The beam generator would be mounted at the rear of the ship and would direct its gravity pulses forward toward the ship's bow. Suppose that, like Podkletnov's laboratory apparatus, the ship's gravity beam generator were to produce impulse accelerations of greater than 500,000 g over the brief 100-nanosecond pulse interval. Also suppose that the ship's capacitor banks have sufficient time to recharge to deliver these pulses once per second, a rate sixty times greater than Podkletnov's apparatus was able to achieve. Averaging this gravity impulse over the 1-second interval between successive pulses, we find that this would be the same as if the ship experienced a continuous acceleration of about 0.05 g, or 5 percent of the Earth's accelerating force.

*Because of the revolutionary nature of these findings, we conducted a separate experiment that incorporated a double-check of our measurements. We measured the time the wave took to go from point A to point B, and the time was also measured for the wave to go from B to C. These points were collinear with the direction of shock wave propagation. The total of these two flight times was then compared with the measured time for the wave to go from A to C. The summation accurately corresponded to the observed A-to-C value. This indicated that the current pulses that the cables conveyed to the oscilloscope were reflecting the actual passage of the shock wave away from the dome electrode and that the wave's instantaneous position was being faithfully sensed by the pickup antennae.

However, to run such a propulsion unit would require an enormous amount of power, 6,000 megawatts, which is 300,000 times more than the 20 kilowatts that Podkletnov and Modanese were using. Such power could be supplied by a set of large-sized nuclear power plants, similar to those operated by some electric utilities. Or it might be provided by an onboard "free energy" generator such as the gravity wave power generator described in the next section or by a Searl effect generator such as that described in chapter 10.

The beam would need to be designed to produce a very uniform acceleration across the surface of its electrode so as to minimize the development of gravitational sheer forces. If the craft's occupants were seated in the path of such a beam, they would feel no acceleration since every atom of their bodies, and the entire ship as well, would be uniformly accelerated by the gravitic pulses. The aperture of the beam would need to be made slightly larger than the craft so as to avoid the rapid drop-off in the accelerating force at the periphery of the beam. There would be no fear of meteor collisions because the beam's forward-directed gravitic pulses would clear out a path ahead of the ship that would be free of interstellar debris. By negatively charging the ship's bow, a repulsive gravitic field could be built up there that could deflect any meteor that happened to make a last-minute entry into the ship's flight path.

With an acceleration of 0.05 g, the journey to even the nearest star would take far too long to be practical for manned interstellar space flight. Such an endeavor would require engines capable of delivering gravitational accelerating forces on the order of 10 g. If the Podkletnov-Modanese beam generator was used, a pulse repetition rate two hundred times greater would be needed, or about one pulse every 5 milliseconds. However, the power demand would rise to the enormous figure of 1,200 gigawatts, which is three times the average rate of power consumption of the United States or six times the thrust power produced by the first stage of a Saturn V rocket.

Let us for the moment overlook the practicality of generating such a large amount of power on board a spaceship. Propelled by 10 g of acceleration, a ship would be able to accelerate to 2.8 percent of the speed of light in just one day. By one week, it would be up to 20 percent of the speed of light, and after one month it would be traveling at about 85 percent of the speed of light. Once up to this subthreshold light speed, having consumed three times the annual power consumption of the state of California, the crew could shut off the beam propulsion system and coast for the remainder of the journey. The time to reach Alpha Centauri, the nearest star system, lying 4.37 light-years away, would be just five years and two months. Upon nearing the Alpha Centauri system, the spacecraft would rotate itself 180 degrees and then would once again turn on its gravity propulsion beam to decelerate. Navigation could easily be done by using the "galactic GPS system," the network of pulsar beacons that is deployed throughout the galaxy. (See my book Decoding the Message of the Pulsars for more about the use of pulsars for interstellar flight navigation.)

Gravity beam technology, in its current state of development, is impractical from the standpoint of energy efficiency. A spacecraft having a mass of 700 tons, accelerated at 10 g with an energy consumption of 1,200 gigawatts, would have a thrust-to-power ratio of about 5×10^{-3} newtons per kilowatt, or about fifty times less than that of the NASA Lewis Research Center ion engine. Perhaps a hundredfold-higher efficiency might be secured if the craft's superconducting discs were powered by improved Marx capacitor banks of the sort Podkletnov used in generating the 10-million-volt concrete-smashing pulses. However, this would still not be much of an improvement over the efficiency of an ion engine.

If used alone, the gravity beam technology would be more practical if the beam generator and its power supply were to be located at a stationary spaceport facility with the beam being directed toward a specific destination to which one wished to travel. The spaceship would then simply need to be navigated to keep it positioned within the beam.

One advantage of the gravity beam technology would be its ability to propel the ether forward to a very high velocity within the confines of its beam, thereby creating an ether-frame dragging effect that would allow a ship to approach or even exceed the speed of light without harmful consequences to its passengers. As we have seen in the previous section, it is possible to transmit shock waves at superluminal speeds, presumably because of their ability to surf the forward-moving ether wind. So, we may conclude that it should also be possible to accelerate a ship to superluminal speeds. Unlike special relativity, subquantum kinetics allows the possibility that both matter and energy waves could be made to propagate at superluminal velocities. The gravity beam would not only propel the ship forward, but it would also push forward the ether within its superluminal tunnel. In standard physics terms, the gravity beam, in effect, would be accelerating the ship's local rest frame to superluminal velocities. As noted earlier, the Podkletnov gravity beam generator has been observed to produce gravity shocks that travel at enormous superluminal speeds. Based on this, we may conclude that it is technically possible to accelerate a "beam ship" to similar speeds, allowing it to travel toward its destination at hundreds or even thousands of times the speed of light.

Perhaps interstellar space travel could be made practical if Brown's electrokinetic thrusters, considered in chapter 3, were used in conjunction with the gravity impulse beam drive, thereby tremendously reducing the energy requirements. The power requirements for a trip to Alpha Centauri might then be brought down to around 50 megawatts, comparable to the output of a nuclear submarine reactor.

The initial phase of acceleration would be accomplished mainly through the operation of the electrokinetic thrusters. During this time, the gravity beam drive would be operated in a low power mode to conserve energy. Its main purpose would be to propel the ether forward so that the ship would not be exposed to an opposing ether wind. Then, after accelerating for several weeks up to a sublight speed of say 85 percent of the speed of light, the gravity impulse engine would be brought up to maximum impulse power, allowing the ship to accelerate through its ether wind tunnel to a superluminal speed of 200 c. The remaining journey to the Alpha Centauri environs would then take only one week. If there ever were a Star Trek–style impulse engine, this would be it, except instead of saying "Warp 5, Scotty," the captain might say "Grad 5, Scotty," consistent with the ether gradient concept of subquantum kinetics.* For longer interstellar journeys, a spaceship might accelerate to speeds exceeding 3,000 c, equivalent to Warp 11. Then a journey to our nearest satellite galaxy, the Magellanic Cloud, which lies 180,000 light-years away, would take only sixty years.

Is superluminal space travel possible? The answer is a resounding YES! It is no longer science fiction. It can be done using off-the-shelf technology coupled with a minimal amount of R&D. Commit $500 million and one hundred engineers and technicians to the project, and an interstellar drive unit could be built within, say, ten years' time.

*The warp factor scale developed for the Star Trek series calculates the attained superluminal velocity from the warp factor number, using the formula: speed = c X (warp factor)$^{33.3}$. Hence, Warp 5 would allow a ship to attain a speed of 214 c.

PROJECT SKYVAULT

7.1 ■ EARLY MICROWAVE RESEARCH

One evening in 1986, I went out for a beer with a friend of mine, a naturopathic physician by the name of Thomas Chavez. Like myself, Thomas had a keen interest in alternative, cutting-edge science. The topic of our conversation eventually turned to electrogravitics, and at this point my friend shared an interesting story. He told me that during the late 1950s, his father had worked as a physicist at the Rocketdyne Aerospace Corporation in Southern California and had been involved in some sort of super-secret antigravity research. At that time, Thomas had been just a young boy. He said his father normally told him nothing about what he did at work because of an oath of secrecy he had taken, but one evening, after returning home from work he had been unable to contain himself. Very exuberantly, he had exclaimed, "We got it to work, we got it to work!" When my friend inquired what it was that was made to work, his father drew him a picture showing a lens-shaped craft suspended in midair. He said, "We got it to lift off!" He would not say anything more about it, but that moment stuck in Thomas' mind and now he shared it with me. I knew him well enough to know that what he told me was entirely genuine.

Rocketdyne was first formed in the post–World War II era as a rocket engine R&D company. For most of its history, it was associated with North American Aviation. It was spun off from North American Aviation as a separate division in 1955. Then in 1984, it remerged with its former company, which by then was named North American Rockwell as a result of the merger in 1967 of North American Aviation and Rockwell International. North American's aerospace and defense business had, among other things, developed the Apollo spacecraft and the space shuttle. At the time of the merger in 1984, Rocketdyne was producing most of the rocket engines used in the United States, but it appears it was developing much more than conventional rockets for its aerospace propulsion business. As we will discover below, its scientists were working on a next-generation propulsion system, a technology that goes far beyond the conventional rocket. At the end of 1996, Rockwell sold off its Rocketdyne division, along with most of its space and defense business, to Boeing Integrated Defense Systems. Then in 2005, Rocketdyne was resold to Pratt and Whitney, a business unit of United Technologies Corporation.

I frequently thought about my friend's story about this Rocketdyne project. It implied that the United States successfully demonstrated a field propulsion vehicle by the late 1950s, a time when Townsend Brown was still trying to interest the Pentagon and aerospace companies in his own electrogravitics research. The 1956 "Electrogravitics Systems" report did mention that North American was studying electrogravitic propulsion but that the company had not yet openly declared that it was working in this exotic field. No mention was made of its Rocketdyne division, which indicates that, at that early date, a very tight lid was already in place on Rocketdyne's antigravity project.

Some years later, in the summer of 1994, another piece of the puzzle dropped into place. At the time, I was attending a Tesla science symposium in Colorado Springs, where I was an invited speaker. I had just finished delivering my lecture on NASA's apparent suppression of electrogravitics technologies (discussed in chapter 13) and was surrounded by a small group of people asking various follow-up questions when someone handed me a quickly scribbled note, which I had a chance to read only much later. The note read:

> Sir, I've worked with the Biefeld-Brown effect for a number of years. I may be of help to you on verifying the effect. I believe I know your > mistake with the discs. I did correspond with T. Brown by mail and phone. Also associated with Project Winterhaven was a project with a slang name of "Sky Vaulting," a government funded project with North American Rockwell. If you are interested contact me.

> P.S. NASA data is shared with the Department of Defense. Your key is with the Air Force. They are many years ahead of civilian research. NASA is a PR or a front to obscure Air Force research.

For purposes of confidentiality, I have chosen to withhold this person's name and refer to him only as Tom. The story he later told me about the Skyvault project was quite astounding. He said that he first heard about it in the fall of 1974, when working for an engineering firm in Texas. His supervisor, with whom he had come to be very good friends, one day told him about a top-secret government project that he had worked on between 1952 and 1957 while at North American Aviation, a company that was later renamed North American Rockwell. The project had been initiated by the Defense Department through North American's Rocketdyne division. Although Tom's boss had already passed away, Tom did not wish to reveal his name, so to facilitate the discussion, we will call him Murray. Well, Tom had heard from Murray that the purpose of this project was to develop an antigravity vehicle that used microwave beams as its means for propulsion. It is uncertain whether Skyvault was the official name of the project, but at least this is what the scientists at Rocketdyne used to call it.

Although Project Skyvault was initiated by the government in the early 1950s, investigations into this exotic microwave propulsion technique actually dated back to the late 1940s. Murray, who held a Ph.D., said that in those earlier days he had worked on projects that were associated with an initial phase of this research and that later he had continued this work at Rocketdyne, where he worked up until the 1960s. This microwave antigravity propulsion research project was still in progress in 1974, because Tom learned that a close friend of Murray's was then still working on the project at North American Rockwell, presumably in its Rocketdyne division. At that time, the whole matter was still very secret, because there was a lot that his boss couldn't tell him about the project.

Later, in 1975, Tom obtained what he felt was additional confirmation for the existence of Project Skyvault when the military sent his Texas-based engineering firm a bid request for building a vehicle launch gantry in New Mexico. From the blatant description of the shape of the gantry and the way it was to be built, he recognized that this was to be a launcher for a microwave beam antigravity craft. In this particular version, the power was generated on the ground and sent up to the craft as a microwave beam. The beam was emitted from upward-pointing microwave horns that were supported by the launch gantry. The craft was made of a special kind of material that was repelled by microwaves and, hence, was to be buoyed upward by the beam (see figure 7.1). A portion of the beam was returned to the ground to modulate the outgoing microwave beam. The craft was to be able to go straight up and down and could deviate only a small amount to either side of vertical.

In 1996, two years after my conversation with Tom, CBS-TV aired a weekly spy thriller called Mr. and Mrs. Smith, which starred Scott Bakula, an actor who also has had leading roles in various science-fiction series such as Quantum Leap and Star Trek. Interestingly, the "Space Flight Episode," number nine in the series, which aired on November 8, 1996, came very close to portraying Tom's story about the propulsion beam craft and launch gantry his firm was asked to bid on. The plot of this particular episode was based on the testing of an experimental disc-shaped vehicle called a "beam rider." The launching took place from a secret desert location. The test vehicle was lofted on a powerful microwave beam that was directed vertically upward toward the craft from a ground-based parabolic mirror. Since much of the early Rocketdyne research on Project Skyvault was done in the Los Angeles area, it is not surprising that this idea would one day find itself worked into a Hollywood script. However, even though there were four more episodes left to run, to the disappointment of many, Mr. and Mrs. Smith was canceled immediately after this episode had aired. As we shall see, the notion of using microwave beams for aerospace propulsion is not science fiction.

The discussion about Project Skyvault that is presented here and in the next chapter is based on notes I made of my conversations with Tom and on some material Tom had sent me. The latter includes copies of notes that he made of his 1974 discussions with Murray and a copy of a letter written by Murray's friend who was at the time still working on Project Skyvault (see appendix E).

According to Murray, the first indication that microwaves could be used for propulsion came about when it was discovered that microwave beams could move objects if the objects happened to be made from the right kind of material. The scientists believed that the microwave beam was somehow inducing a gravitational force on the object. The idea that microwaves could move objects was believable to Tom since he had heard of something remotely similar from a radar engineer friend of his who worked at Homestead Air Force Base in Florida. His friend had witnessed an experiment in which a low-power microwave beam from a klystron tube was aimed at pencils placed on a table and caused them to move around. Tom theorized that the microwaves must induce electric charge gradients in certain materials having nonlinear electrical properties and that the observed movement was actually due to the Biefeld-Brown effect imparting a thrust to the material.

The group that Murray had worked with had experimented with a whole lot of different kinds of samples to find out which ones worked best. Paper, silk, and some kinds of wood, for example, showed no movement. Brick and concrete also exhibited no movement, being essentially transparent to the microwaves. They found that some materials would move quite violently, whereas others would just vaporize. Aluminum foil would move but would disintegrate upon exposure. They carried out extensive tests, subjecting various kinds of materials to microwave waveforms of varying shapes, and accumulated data on the destruction and burning of the materials and on the effect of shock waves on those materials that responded. They found that the best propulsion effect occurred in materials that had a particular magnetic property. Tom attempted to find out more specifically what these types of materials were, but was told that the information was classified.

Murray said that their group had found that the effects were very frequency-sensitive, that is, that they were observed only within certain frequency bands that were characteristic of each material. If the frequency was off by a slight amount, the object could suddenly vaporize. He described an experience they had in their lab one time when they were experimenting with various frequencies—they had turned on their microwave generator and it had produced a bluish microwave beam that blew a hole through their laboratory wall and continued through an adjoining outside embankment as well. The beam was going into another building before they managed to shut it off. He said it “scared the living daylights out of them.”

7.2 ■ ELECTROMAGNETIC RESONANCE

Although Murray would not reveal what this unique class of materials was that could respond with a strong propulsive force, it is apparent that he was talking about materials that exhibit a strong resonance at a particular frequency. Such materials respond to incident microwaves in an unusual way. Take as an example a material that exhibits a resonant response to the electric component of an electromagnetic wave. Over most frequencies, the material's permittivity will have a positive value, and as a result, the applied electric field will induce a polarization in the same direction as its own field vector, as is commonly observed in most materials. Near a resonant frequency, however, the induced polarization will become very large, the material's large response being due to its accumulation of energy from the microwave beam over many wave cycles. The energy stored in the resonating medium can then greatly exceed that delivered by the incident-driving field. It can be so large that even changing the phase or sign of the incident wave would have little effect on the polarization oscillation.[1] As a result, when the frequency of the incident wave is increased slightly above this resonant frequency, the applied electric field will be out of phase with respect to the induced polarization oscillation, and as a result, the material will respond by exhibiting a negative permittivity, the induced polarization now being out of phase with the applied electric field. The electrons oscillating in the material will now resist the applied electric field, and as a result, the electromagnetic wave will exert a repulsive force on the material.

Physicists John Pendry and David Smith illustrated this repulsive force phenomenon by considering the example of a person pushing a swing. In an article in Scientific American, they wrote:

> Think of a swing: apply a slow, steady push, and the swing obediently moves in the direction of the push—although it does not swing very high. Once set in motion, the swing tends to oscillate back and forth at a particular rate, known technically as its resonant frequency. Push the swing periodically, in time with this swinging and it starts arcing higher. Now try to push at a faster rate, and the push goes out of phase with respect to the motion of the swing—at some point, your arms might be outstretched with the swing rushing back. If you have > been pushing for a while, the swing might have enough momentum to knock you over—it is then pushing back on you.[2]

In the same way, electrons in a material with a negative permittivity, ε, go out of phase and resist the "push" of the electromagnetic field. Such materials include silver, gold, and aluminum, whose resonances usually occur at optical frequencies.

The same repulsive force phenomenon occurs in materials that resonate with the magnetic component of an incoming electromagnetic wave. The magnetic permeability of the material, μ, which normally would be positive, becomes negative at frequencies slightly above the material's resonant frequency. The material's response then is to magnetically resist the magnetic field of the applied electromagnetic wave. Materials that naturally exhibit negative μ domains include ferromagnetic or antiferromagnetic materials that exhibit resonances. Such resonances usually occur at frequencies in the gigahertz range and tail off at higher frequencies in the terahertz-to-infrared range. For example, a group of Japanese scientists have reported negative permeability in a granular composite material consisting of 70 percent Permalloy when the material is exposed to microwave frequencies higher than 5 gigahertz.[3]

The special microwave propulsion materials that Murray said were being researched by the Project Skyvault engineers, which "had a particular magnetic property," were most likely materials of this sort exhibiting magnetic resonances in the gigahertz range. This would account for Murray's comment that the propulsion effects were very frequency-sensitive, that is, that each material had its own frequency band at which it would respond by developing a propulsive force. As mentioned earlier, negative μ domains in such materials are limited to a specific frequency range, with the greatest repulsive effects occurring when the incident wave has a frequency close to a material's magnetic resonant frequency. If the microwave beam was adjusted to have a frequency slightly lower, so that it matched the material's resonant frequency, then the material would absorb an enormous amount of energy from the beam and would store this energy in its resonant oscillation. In cases in which the material was being exposed to a very powerful microwave beam at this resonant frequency, it is possible that the energy that the material would capture would be great enough to vaporize it, just as Murray had said.

According to Pendry, the force that microwaves exert on a material at a given frequency depends on the strength of the material's interaction with that beam, which is proportional to the beam's scattering cross-section.[4] This force is always rather weak but can be significantly enhanced by tuning the beam to have a frequency close to one of the material's resonant frequencies. When the beam is at the material's resonant frequency, the material would present a high scattering cross-section and would strongly absorb the incident beam. At a slightly higher frequency, the scattering cross-section would continue to be high, but the ε or μ would now become negative and the material would begin to exert a repulsive force relative to the exciting beam.

A material would respond with an even stronger repulsive force if it were to exhibit electric and magnetic resonances in the same frequency range, allowing both ε and μ to become negative at a slightly higher frequency range. Such a material would have a negative index of refraction. The index of refraction (n) of a material is determined by the values of its permittivity and permeability; that is, $n = \sqrt{\varepsilon\mu/\varepsilon_o\mu_o}$, in which the constants ε_o and μ_o are the permittivity and permeability values in a vacuum. Most commonly occurring refractive materials such as plastic and glass have a positive index of refraction, with either one or both of their ε and μ parameters being positive. Materials with a negative index of refraction are not normally observed in nature, since electric resonances producing negative ε values and magnetic resonances producing negative μ values occur at differing regions of the electromagnetic spectrum. However, with proper engineering, it is possible to produce special materials, called "metamaterials," whose permittivity and permeability both are simultaneously negative over a specific frequency range, causing them to exhibit a negative index of refraction. Since negatively refracting materials are full of resonances, these resonances can be exploited to enhance the scattering cross-section and hence the propulsive force on the material.

The idea that it might be possible to produce a material with a negative index of refraction was first suggested in the open literature in 1967 by the Russian physicist Victor Veselago.[5] Beginning in the mid-1990s, researchers began experimenting to see if Veselago's prediction might be true. Finally, by 2001, Smith and his colleagues at the University of California San Diego successfully demonstrated the production of one such artificial metamaterial, which they made by constructing an array of straight wires and wire-loop split-ring resonators.[6–8] Using lithographic techniques, they fabricated a series of resonator elements into printed circuit boards having a straight wire on one side and C-shaped split-ring resonator patterns on the other side (figure 7.2).[9] These elements were then assembled in rows having a spacing of the order of 0.5 centimeter to compose a metamaterial matrix (figure 7.3). The array was found to exhibit both electric and magnetic resonances, causing the material's ε and μ values both to become negative over a frequency range of 10.3 to 11.5 gigahertz. They showed that a 10.5-gigahertz beam (2.8 cm wavelength) refracted negatively as predicted. Soon after, Claudio Parazzoli, Kin Li, and coworkers at Boeing's Phantom Works Division constructed a three-dimensional wire lattice in the form of a 2.7-millimeter cube that negatively refracted a 10-gigahertz microwave beam.

Many such elements together would be used to compose the metamaterial. The dimensions of the pattern are specially chosen to give the desired resonance effect. (After R. Shelby, et al., "Microwave Transmission through a Two-Dimensional Left-Handed Metamaterial," Applied Physics Letters, 78[4] [2001]: 489–91, fig. 1)

Another group, at Bartol Research Institute at the University of Delaware, created a metamaterial in a very different manner by incorporating metallic magnetic nanoparticles into an appropriate insulating matrix.[10] This sounds similar to Brown's idea of embedding massive semiconductor particles, such as lead oxide, in the conical dielectric member of his electrokinetic apparatus. A diagram taken from his 1965 patent and included here in chapter 3 as figure 3.8 shows these particles as speckles concentrated near the tip of the dielectric cone. Brown disclosed that it would be advantageous to incorporate such particles to improve the thrust of his device when it was excited at microwave frequencies. His dielectric was made so that the particles became increasingly concentrated toward the tip, his intention being to progressively decrease the permittivity of the dielectric so that the voltage gradient at its tip would become increasingly high.

Although the term had not been invented at the time, Brown was in fact fabricating a metamaterial. Moreover, like the Bartol group, he may have been experimenting with embedding ferroelectrics in dielectric media to cause magnetic permeability to vary along the length of the dielectric. For example, in his patent he wrote:

> In applying potentials to these various embodiments, it has been found that the rate at which the potential is applied often influences the thrust. This is especially true where dielectric members of high dielectric constant are used and the charging time is a factor. In such cases, the field gradient changes as the charge is built up. In such cases where initial charging currents are also high, dielectric materials of high magnetic permeability like-wise exhibit varying thrust with time.[11]

In either case, by embedding such particles in his dielectric, Brown would have been producing domains having electric and/or magnetic resonances over a range of microwave frequencies, which, in turn, would have created regions where the dielectric's permittivity and/or permeability would be negative.

So, many decades before the University of California San Diego group demonstrated negative index of refraction in a metamaterial, Brown was experimenting with similar artificial materials but with the aim of enhancing the thrust in AC-excited dielectrics. He made no mention of resonances or negative ε and μ values, so maybe he was not entirely aware of all the reasons why these semiconductor particles were improving the lift of his dielectrics. He was conducting these investigations almost a decade after the Project Skyvault scientists had begun their highly classified early experimentation with similar materials, so it is not surprising that Admiral Rickover advised him to drop his electrogravitic investigations. Brown was apparently getting too close to work already in progress in Project Skyvault. Interestingly, in the early 1950s, Brown was conducting electric disc experiments at his Los Angeles laboratory, which was in the same metropolitan area where Project Skyvault was under way. One wonders if he had heard rumors of the Skyvault work.

Metamaterials have strange new properties not normally seen in nature. First of all, they refract electromagnetic waves more strongly than naturally occurring materials that have a positive index of refraction. The diagrams in figure 7.4 compare the trajectories for a beam passing: (a) through a medium having a positive index of refraction and (b) through a medium having a negative index of refraction. Regardless of their refractive index, materials with a positive index always refract incident rays into the right quadrant, which lies on the opposite side of the line that is normal to the refracting surface. Materials with a negative index (e.g., $n = -1$) always refract incident rays into the left quadrant, which lies on the same side of the normal line. For this reason, materials

Another unusual property of left-handed materials is that they can be used to make a lens that resolves far greater detail than one made out of a material with a positive index of refraction. Such a lens can depict details even smaller than the wavelength of light used to illuminate the object and can be made much lighter compared with the bulging convex lenses of conventional optical devices. Metamaterials refract light so strongly that a planar sheet serves as a convex lens, with the incident rays coming to a focus within the sheet. In order to allow the beam to come to a focus outside the lens, the metamaterial must be fabricated in a concave shape.

Also, metamaterials can be designed to be total absorbers of the incident radiation, making them ideal as radar-absorbing materials. In 2003, Yong Zhang and coworkers at the National Renewable Energy Laboratory demonstrated negative refraction in a common ferroelastic material made from a "twinned" alloy containing yttrium, vanadium, and oxygen.[12] They found that this crystal would negatively refract light of any frequency with no back reflection at the medium interface, which raises the possibility of making reflection-free optical lenses.

The U.S. Air Force Research Laboratories has supported a number of research projects with the recent upsurge of interest in metamaterials. Also, the Defense Sciences Office (DSO) of the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency has an ongoing program for funding metamaterials research. In fact, as of July 2006, the description of its metamaterial program that DSO gave on its website frankly stated that one of the intentions of its research program was to develop magnetic metamaterials for "electric drive and propulsion":

> Metamaterials are engineered composites that exhibit superior properties not observed in the constituent materials or nature. The objective of the MetaMaterials Program is to develop, fabricate, and implement new bulk metamaterials that will fill the tremendous voids that exist in the design space for a number of applications of critical importance to the military Services. In particular, this program will develop (1) magnetic metamaterials for power electronics and electric drive and > propulsion, and (2) microwave and optical metamaterials for antenna, radar, and wireless communication applications.[13]

Thus, the notion that Rocketdyne was developing metamaterials in the early 1950s for an aerospace electric propulsion application seems plausible.

Interestingly, by early November 2007, DSO had removed this webpage and replaced it with a rewritten version that made no mention of its interest in using negative index materials for propulsion. It now mentions only the application of negative index materials to optics and to the development of "lightweight, compact RF structures," with an additional broad reference to "practical application" of the technology. Obviously, sometime between July 2006 and November 2007 Defense officials must have decided that the propulsion part of their metamaterial program was too sensitive to be mentioned publicly. One wonders whether this website modification might have been triggered by their becoming aware of the impending publication of this book. In early August 2007, a draft catalog copy announcing its forthcoming publication and noting its disclosure of Project Skyvault had been e-mailed to me for author review and by early October 2007 the finalized copy of the book announcement had been posted on the publisher's website.

7.3 ■ SAWTOOTH WAVES

Murray said the Skyvault team found that the kind of response they got with a given material depended on the particular wave shape used. They achieved the best results with a sawtooth-shaped waveform consisting of asymmetrical triangular waves that have either a steep voltage rise or a steep voltage decline. As noted in chapter 6, the shock wave pulses produced by Podkletnov's gravity impulse beam generator have a sharp rise at their leading edge and are capable of generating strong repulsive forces. Tesla also observed longitudinal repulsive forces being produced by the energy wave shocks radiated from his magnifying transmitters.

Subquantum kinetics predicts that the magnitude and direction of the accelerating force depend critically on the shape of the sawtooth wave since different wave shapes generate different virtual-charge distributions, which in turn generate differing gravity potential gradients. Consider, for example, the wave shape shown in figure 7.5a. This plots the voltage potential profile, $\varphi_E(r)$, for a capacitor that is gradually charged through a resistance, R_1, and then rapidly discharged through another resistance, R_2, in which R_1 is greater than R_2. This produces a wave with asymmetrical rise-and-fall slopes (see figure 7.5 legend). When the x axis is chosen to indicate distance instead of time, the graph shows how the electric potential gradient varies with distance from the front to the back of the wave, in which the wave travels from right to left at the speed of light. The sawtooth profile in figure 7.5b (left) is a similar type of waveform, but one depicting voltage potential in a capacitor that charges rapidly and then discharges more gradually. In effect, the values for resistances R_1 and R_2 have been interchanged from those used in generating the curve shown in figure 7.5a. In this second example, R_1 is less than R_2.

Profiles 7.5c and 7.5d in figure 7.5 plot the corresponding gravity potential profiles, $\varphi_g(r)$, that would accompany each of these electric potential waves, based on the assumption that the virtual-charge densities that this wave creates generate corresponding virtual-mass densities and associated gravitational potentials. These are obtained by taking the negative second derivative of the voltage potential equation plotted in figure 7.5a or figure 7.5b. This is in accordance with the subquantum kinetics electrogravitic relation specified by equation 7 in chapter 4. The wave profile shown in figure 7.5a that charts a gradual voltage ascent followed by a rapid voltage decline is seen in the gravity potential plot, figure 7.5c, to initially produce a weak attractive gravitational force (small arrow) followed by a very strong repulsive force (large arrow). For the particular waveform plotted here, the repulsive impulse (force multiplied by time) is twenty-five times greater than the attractive impulse, even though the repulsive impulse lasts only about one-fifth as long. Thus, this wave would produce a net repulsive force on material bodies that it passes through. Changing the wave shape to that shown in figure 7.5b yields a gravity potential wave that has a very steep attractive gravity gradient at its leading edge and a gradual repulsive gradient at its trailing edge and produces a net attractive gravitational force (see figure 7.5d).

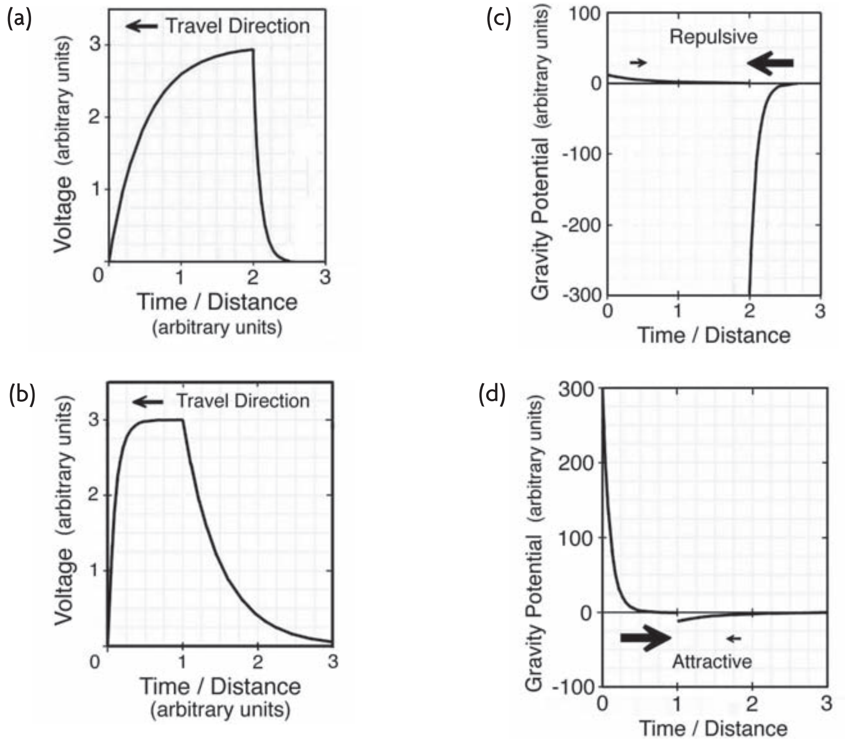

Figure 7.5. (a) left: Voltage profile for an asymmetrical RC-RC-type sawtooth wave having a gradual exponential voltage rise and rapid exponential voltage fall. (b) Voltage profile for an RC-RC wave adjusted to have a rapid exponential voltage rise and gradual voltage fall. (c) Gravity potential profile generated by the virtual-charge distribution of the RC-RC wave shown in 7.5a. (d) Gravity potential profile generated by the virtual-charge distribution of the RC-RC wave shown in 7.5b. Arrows in 7.5c and 7.5d indicate the magnitude and direction of the resulting electrogravitic thrust. (P. LaViolette, © 2007)

The voltage potential in 7.5a is represented by the following equations: $V = 3(1 - e^{-2x})$ for voltage ascent and $V = 3e^{-10x}$ for voltage descent, in which x represents time from left to right or distance from the front to the back of the wave. Thus, the wave has a descent rate that is five times its rate of ascent. The voltage in 7.5b is represented by the following equations: $V = 3(1 - e^{-10x})$ for the voltage ascent and $V = 3e^{-2x}$ for the voltage descent. Thus, the exponents in the equation for figure 7.5a have been interchanged in producing the equation for figure 7.5b. The corresponding gravity-potential profiles, 7.5c and 7.5d, were plotted by taking the negative second derivative of these voltage relations.

If the wave was made symmetrical so that its voltage rose at the same rate as it fell ($R_1 = R_2$), then the attractive gravitational force produced during passage of the wave's leading edge would just balance the repulsive force produced during passage of its trailing edge, and as a result, the net gravitational force would be zero.

If the polarity of the wave shown in figure 7.5a was changed so that its voltage was negative instead of positive, as shown in figure 7.6a, then the electrogravitic coupling relation predicts that the gravitational potentials would also reverse polarity, as shown in figure 7.6c. The gravity gradients would now change sign, making the net thrust attractive rather than repulsive. The same gravitational polarity reversal would occur if the profile shown in figure 7.5b was to go negative. Instead of producing a net attractive force, it would produce a net repulsive force.

Stavros Dimitriou, professor of electrical engineering at the Technical Education Institute in Athens, Greece, has investigated whether capacitors energized with sawtooth waves in the radio frequency range might exert gravitational forces on nearby masses.[14–16] In his master's thesis, he discussed an electric intensity waveform having shapes similar to those shown in figures 7.5 and 7.6, which he named an RC-RC waveform.[17] The RC acronym implies that the wave shape is determined by a capacitor of capacitance (C) being charged through a resistor of resistance (R). His electrogravitic wave research is discussed in chapter 11.

Another waveform shape that Dimitriou has investigated is shown in figure 7.6b. This one is similar to the RC-RC sawtooth wave shown in figure 7.5a, except that in this case voltage declines linearly, rather than exponentially.* The wave's voltage descent is created by discharging the charged capacitor through a constant-current (Norton) element; hence, Dimitriou refers to this type of waveform as an RC-Norton wave. The subquantum kinetics electrogravitic coupling relation predicts that such a wave would produce an attractive gravitational force during its voltage ascent and no gravitational force on voltage descent. That is, since voltage declines linearly, its second derivative would be zero. Hence, no virtual charge and no mass density would be produced during this decline phase.

*The wave in figure 7.6b is represented by the following equation: $V = 4(1 - e^{-x})$ for the voltage ascent and $V = 4(1 - 5x)$ for the voltage descent.

If the gravity field is generated primarily by the electrogravitic effects of virtual charge, then a triangular sawtooth wave having a linear voltage rise and fall should produce no gravitational thrust, either on the voltage ascent phase or on the voltage descent phase. In another example, thrust will not be produced if the wave has a voltage profile that rises as the square of distance. Such a profile would have a concave parabolic leading edge similar to that of profile 2 in figure 7.7a. In this case, the negative second derivative of its r^2 voltage profile gives a negative gravity potential that remains constant over time (see profile 2 in figure 7.7b). Hence, its gravity gradient would be zero, resulting in no force exertion.

If we change the exponent characterizing the wave's profile so that the exponent is not equal to 1 or 2, but to a fraction or any other whole number, then the wave would be able to exert a gravitational force. In the case in which the profile varies as $r^{1.5}$, the gravity potential gradient creates a repulsive thrust in the same direction as the gravity wave's motion (see curve 1 in figure 7.7b). If the profile were to vary as $r^{2.5}$, the gravity potential would develop a slope of opposite sign that would produce an attractive force opposed to the direction of wave motion (see curve 3 in figure 7.7b). If the profile instead were to vary as r^3, the gravity potential would develop a steeper slope that would produce an even stronger attractive force (see curve 4 in figure 7.7b).

The shock discharge emitted from Podkletnov's superconducting cathode would similarly have been characterized by an exponential voltage rise at its leading edge, but one with a very large exponent. Hence, such discharges would have produced much steeper gravity gradients

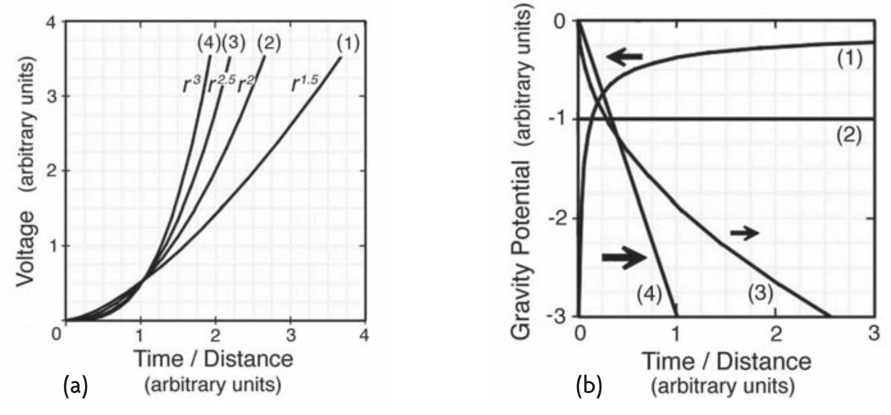

Figure 7.7. (a) Leading-edge profiles for waves whose voltage rises exponentially with varying degrees of nonlinearity, as: $r^{1.5}$ (curve 1), r^2 (curve 2), $r^{2.5}$ (curve 3), and r^3 *(curve 4). and greater gravitational forces than those modeled here. Also, being a negative voltage rise, the gravitational force exerted by Podkletnov's beam is predicted by the electrogravitic coupling relation to be repulsive rather than attractive, as is observed.

The above analysis assumes that the gravitic effect of these sawtooth microwaves arises primarily from the virtual charges that these waves produce, which themselves arise from the second derivative of the variation of voltage along the direction of wave travel. If, on the other hand, the gravity field of the emitted microwaves is produced mainly by the real electric charges that generate the wave, then the electrogravitic thrust would be proportional to the first derivative of the wave's voltage variation, and in this case linear sawtooth profiles and r^2 exponential profiles would produce gravitational thrusts. Further research is needed to know which of the two electrogravitic relations better characterizes gravity wave production at microwave frequencies, or whether thrust effects arise from a mix of both virtual- and real-charge electrogravitic effects.

One characteristic of the virtual-charge electrogravitic relation is that voltage profiles having a more nonlinear variation should produce greater gravitic thrusts. For example, a wave whose voltage rises as r^3 is predicted to produce a gravitational force 2.8 times greater than a wave whose voltage rises as $r^{2.5}$. Also, a wave whose voltage rises as r^4 is predicted to produce a gravitational force six times greater than a wave whose voltage rises as r^3. Those with exponents less than 2 would produce very weak forces. For example, a wave such as that in profile 1 in figure 7.7a whose voltage rises as $r^{1.5}$ is predicted to produce a gravitational force fifteen times weaker than that produced by a wave whose voltage rises as $r^{2.5}$. Corroborating this, Brown observed that the electrogravitic force developed by an electric field in fact increases as the nonlinearity of the field's voltage profile increases.

Dimitriou claims to have generated gravitational forces by energizing capacitors with sawtooth waves having an amplitude of around 15 volts (see chapter 11). Our attempts to duplicate his work in this low-voltage range, however, did not meet with success. Most likely the wave amplitude must exceed tens of kilovolts before this sawtooth wave thrust effect becomes large enough to be significant. This is consistent with the findings of Brown and Podkletnov, both of whom used waves in the range of 50 to 2,000 kilovolts to get their thrust effects. As we shall see, the Project Skyvault team was also using waves in the kilovolt range to get its propulsion effects.

In summary, the kind of propulsion results that Murray's Skyvault team would have been getting would have depended critically on the shape of the microwave waveform it was using. One question that should be examined is whether metamaterials develop a greater propulsive force (exhibit a larger interaction cross-section) when exposed to a microwave beam having an asymmetrical sawtooth wave shape as opposed to a symmetrical sine wave shape. If so, it is likely that the frequency-sensitive materials they were using in their research were in fact metamaterials.

7.4 ▪ THE BEAM GENERATOR

According to Murray, during the early stages of their research, the Project Skyvault group used magnetron vacuum tubes to generate their microwave source beam. They worked with frequencies ranging from 7 gigahertz (7,000 megacycles) to upward of 1,000 gigahertz. By comparison, the magnetron tubes used in microwave ovens typically have frequencies of 2.54 gigahertz. The cavity magnetron has a central electron-emitting cathode surrounded by a positively charged copper plate, the anode (see figure 7.8). An axial magnetic field causes electrons emitted by the cathode to cycle in a circular orbit. They revolve at a frequency that depends on the applied voltage potential and the strength of the magnetic field. As they cycle, they induce microwave frequency oscillations in a series of cylindrical cavities spaced around the anode's inner circumference. Just as the length of an organ pipe tunes the pipe to a certain pitch, the diameter of these cavities can efficiently tune microwaves to a particular wavelength. These oscillations transfer to the cycling electron cloud and are then channeled out of the magnetron to form a microwave beam.

The microwave signal from the magnetron tubes used by the Skyvault group was sent into a wave amplifier cavity. This was essentially a metallic duct of rectangular cross-section whose long dimension was such as to fit a whole number of wavelengths of the microwave signal along its length. For example, if the magnetron emitted waves at a frequency of 100 gigahertz, the emitted wavelength would have been 3 millimeters. So if the cavity was made to have a length that was some multiple of 3 millimeters, then, as these waves reflected back and forth inside this cavity, they would develop a condition of resonance allowing them to build up a high-voltage amplitude.

By adding various types of microwave radar-absorbing materials to the resonator cavity, the inputted microwave signal could be changed from a sine wave into a sawtooth-shaped wave. For this, the Skyvault group may have used ceramic dielectrics such as barium titanate polarized with a high-voltage DC potential on the order of 10 kilovolts per centimeter. Once polarized, the high-K dielectric would have presented a highly nonlinear environment for the microwaves. The same wave transformation into a sawtooth shape would have occurred in Brown's AC-energized vertical-thrust apparatus described in chapter 3. The dielectric would have changed the shape of the input wave, causing it to have a more rapid rise of potential in the direction of the dielectric's polarization and a more gradual fall of potential during the other half of the cycle. The polarity of the sawtooth wave, whether it would rise sharply to a positive or to a negative potential, would depend on the polarity applied to the high-K dielectric. Microwave power from this amplifier would then have been conducted down a waveguide tube to a microwave horn, the horn's dimensions having been chosen so that its impedance would match that of the surrounding air to allow a microwave beam to efficiently radiate from the horn. Once polarized, the dielectric would have been able to retain its polarization without any outside input of DC power. In fact, the sawtooth waves would have acted to bias the dielectric's voltage potential.

The Skyvault team did not power their tubes continuously, but pulsed them about a thousand times per second using a mechanical pulser. This was a wheel in an evacuated chamber that spun at 60,000 to 100,000 revolutions per minute (1,000 to 2,000 hertz) and on each revolution actuated a set of platinum electrical contacts that briefly turned on high-voltage DC to power the magnetrons. The proper pulsing rate would depend on how much voltage and power one wished to extract from the tube. If the pulser was cycled at a faster rate or was in its on state for a longer fraction of the cycle period, more power would be radiated from the magnetron.

Murray said that they needed to make fine adjustments to the pulser's "square wave" signal envelope to get its pulse cycle amplitude and timing just right. In particular, the magnetron would have had to be turned on at just the right moment so that its waves would match the phase of the waves already reflecting back and forth in the microwave amplifier waveguide, thereby allowing its energy to properly add to the amplified signal. Magnetrons are very sensitive. If the pulse timing is wrong, the tube's energy potential can build up so high that the tube will burn out. Failure occurs when an arc jumps from the tube's cathode to its anode, burning off the cathode's electron-emitting thorium coating and rendering the tube useless.

Radar researchers later replaced this older mechanical pulser technology with thyrotron tubes, which were able to produce shock discharge pulses having a much sharper rise time. Thyrotrons had a fixed spark gap enclosed in sealed glass tube filled with hydrogen and used a third ignitor electrode to trigger the gap to discharge. These discharges would be much like Tesla's shock discharges, except that the magnetrons would convert these pulses into microwave frequency shocks. In Secrets of Cold War Technology, Vassilatos commented about the explosive forces that these radar bursts can produce, noting, "As these pulse methods were reaching their state of refinement, engineers found it possible to produce single DC impulses of extraordinary power. Components often ruptured when these explosive electrical applications were employed. Wires exploded. Gaskets and sealed electrodes ruptured. Magnetron tubes, high vacuum vessels, literally exploded. Here was that phenomenon of which Tesla spoke so highly."[18] The microwave bursts that the Skyvault engineers were experimenting with were most likely of this sort.

Murray said they were using the very best magnetron tubes they could find, which at that time were being used on military radar systems. To maximize the gravity wave propulsion effect, they had to operate these tubes well beyond their voltage specifications, powering them with up to 250 kilovolts. Murray did not say what the normal voltage range was for these special radar magnetrons, but for comparison, one unclassified research paper published in 1956 described the development of a 1.3-gigahertz magnetron that operated in the range of 50 to 75 kilovolts and delivered power outputs on the order of 10 megawatts during its ten-microsecond pulse period.[19] Magnetrons available in military black projects likely had achieved higher power outputs than this at a much earlier date.

In this "out-of-spec," high-voltage operating region, the tube's characteristics would have become highly nonlinear and prone to develop what is called the longitudinal sawtooth instability, which causes electrons circulating in the magnetron to begin to bunch up into clusters, transforming the tube's normal sine wave output into a series of sawtooth spikes. A similar effect has been reported to have been seen in the operation of the Synchrotron Ultraviolet Radiation Facility (SURF III).[20] When the sawtooth instability was present in SURF III, researchers observed bursts of coherent microwave radiation that were 10,000 times more intense than the normal synchrotron beam radiation and which consisted of sawtooth-shaped waves in the 10-gigahertz frequency range.

By operating the tubes beyond their specifications, the Skyvault team was apparently attempting to produce microwaves having a maximally abrupt rise time—hence, a very nonlinear negative potential onset curve. This in turn would have maximized the electrogravitic thrust that these waves were producing. As seen in our analysis of the gravity shocks produced by Podkletnov's gravity impulse beam, the subquantum kinetics electrogravitic relation indicates that such waveforms would have been repulsive.

Murray said that as a result of running the tubes beyond their specifications, the research team was blowing out magnetrons by the thousands. Members were willing to take this risk because they knew that this propulsion effect existed. Apparently, someone in the past fortuitously got the frequency and wave shape right and discovered the effect.

Initially, the equipment generating the Skyvault propulsion beam was quite bulky. The entire set up, which included high-voltage power generators, microwave generators, waveguide ducts, and wave-shaping resonators, required a building the size of a barn. Murray disclosed that in this early version, the conical test beam was projected upward and made to buoy a test vehicle that had a concave bottom wide enough to receive the beam. He disclosed that this concave portion was made from a ceramic similar to CorningWare.

Although CorningWare is optically opaque, it is partially transparent to microwaves. Thus, given the proper shape, it could be made to act as a microwave lens, which would look similar to an optical lens but would not necessarily be optically transparent. Such a lens could be made out of paraffin, ceramic, or glass. The important thing is that it be made of a material having the proper permittivity and permeability. So the Skyvault team could have used the craft's ceramic bottom as a lens to refract the microwaves that were being beamed up to it.

However, for a diverging microwave beam, one would expect that they would have used a converging lens to bring the waves to a focus inside the craft. One wonders whether this concave ceramic was actually a metamaterial that was engineered to have a negative index of refraction. One characteristic of left-handed (negative index) materials is that they have a concave shape in order to bring a microwave beam to a focus on the other side of the lens.

Although the beam generator for the Skyvault prototype craft was initially very bulky, with time the Skyvault team was able to make its equipment more compact. Murray said that eventually they got the apparatus small enough to put inside the craft. However, he didn't specify what kind of power supply was used. The craft were circular in shape and emitted a greenish blue microwave propulsion beam toward the earth. The beam was made to pass through an "iris type of convex lens" toward the ground, where it would reflect back up to buoy the craft upward. It is unclear what Murray meant by an "iris type of convex lens." An iris is a small opening at the end of a waveguide that allows microwaves to pass out.

Perhaps the microwaves were emitted through an iris at the end of the wave amplifier conduit and were then focused by a ceramic convex lens. The microwaves leaving the iris would have diverged and would have needed a convergent lens to refract them into a microwave beam. The diameter of the beam at the ground target region could have been adjusted by controlling the position of the lens relative to the iris.

This experimental version of the Skyvault craft, which was being developed in the 1960s, was apparently much more advanced than its forerunner, the version that Tom's engineering firm was asked to bid on in 1975. That is, by carrying its own onboard beam, it was far more mobile. Murray said that the craft was remotely controlled by signals relayed from a radio transmitter, probably situated on top of a mountain. The transmitter sent out encoded signals 6,400 times per second that controlled the craft's pitch, yaw, bank, and velocity. The vehicle had a range of nearly three hundred miles over the desert and could attain altitudes of 50,000 feet or more. Murray said that it could attain "extreme speeds." Initially, they did test flights of an unmanned craft. Later, they built and flew around a craft having a crew on board. Murray told Tom the vehicles he worked on had an estimated propulsion efficiency of 60 percent, and he imagined that by 1974 much higher propulsion efficiencies had been obtained. By comparison, a jet aircraft has a propulsion efficiency of only about 20 percent.

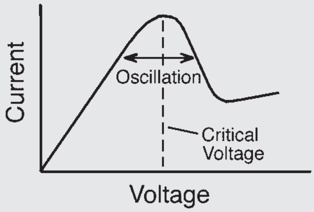
In the mid-1960s, after Murray had left the project, the Skyvault team began replacing their magnetrons with solid-state oscillators, called Gunn diodes, that were much more reliable. Murray had learned about this from a friend who had continued to work on the Skyvault project. Wanting to know more, Tom asked his boss if it would be possible for him to speak to Murray's friend. Murray contacted his friend, who told him that he would instead write Tom a letter, which he would send via Murray. The letter, which is written in a somewhat whimsical style, is reproduced in appendix E.

Murray would not divulge his friend's name, but for practical purposes let us call him Don. In his letter, Don said that Gunn diodes normally require less than a watt of power to operate, but that by working with the manufacturers they were able to engineer special high-power Gunn diodes suited to their project. These were able to produce up to 10,000 watts of microwave power, and the various diodes that they fabricated functioned over a frequency range of 1 to 500 gigahertz. Don did not specify whether this power rating referred to the average power of a single pulse or to the power that was put out when operating in a continuous mode.

The Gunn diode was first developed in 1963. Later, much higher-power, more-efficient devices called impact ionization avalanche transit-time diodes (IMPATT diodes) were developed that were capable of higher microwave power outputs. However, IMPATT diodes have the shortcoming that their signal has a much higher phase noise, meaning that their oscillation cycles may not be as precisely timed. (A description of how these devices operate is given in the accompanying text box.) Such diodes have the advantage of being simpler to use than magnetrons, and they are more reliable in that they do not burn out as easily. They are also able to produce much higher frequencies. In the case of gallium nitride Gunn diodes, frequencies as high as 3,000 gigahertz have been achieved. Commercially available Gunn diodes have an efficiency of only 2 to 5 percent, while IMPATT diodes have a somewhat higher efficiency of about 10 percent. This is low in comparison with magnetrons, which are able to achieve efficiencies of 60 percent.

Gunn and IMPATT Diodes

The Gunn diode is named after J. B. Gunn, the physicist who in 1963 discovered that a crystal of gallium arsenide would spontaneously oscillate at microwave frequencies when a sufficiently high DC voltage was applied to either side of it. This became known as the Gunn effect. Gunn found that gallium arsenide exhibits a negative resistance when subjected to an electric field of greater than 3,000 volts per centimeter. That is, below this critical threshold, the electric current passing through the crystal progressively increases with increasing voltage, as it does in most electrically resistive substances. In this low-voltage region, the crystal is said to exhibit "positive resistance." However, at a critical threshold, the current-voltage curve plateaus and begins to bend downward such that the current now decreases with increasing voltage, a phenomenon called negative resistance.



Due to this peculiar characteristic, when a gallium arsenide Gunn diode is biased above its critical threshold at about 5 kilovolts per centimeter, it will spontaneously oscillate at a specific gigahertz frequency. Some other substances found to exhibit this oscillatory effect are indium phosphide, cadmium telluride, zinc selenide, and wurtzite gallium nitride. This latter material oscillates when biased at a higher potential of about 150 kilovolts per centimeter.

An IMPATT diode is a silicon p-n junction diode that normally operates in a reverse-biased mode. Its principle of operation is different from a Gunn diode in that it involves impact ionization, which results in an electron avalanche electrical breakdown. It is similar to the Gunn diode in that it is a negative-resistance device that begins to spontaneously oscillate when its bias voltage is increased past a certain point.

Commercially available Gunn and IMPATT diodes most commonly have power outputs in the milliwatt range, although it is possible for civilians to purchase Gunn diodes that produce up to 30 watts of power. A thorough search for manufacturers of such solid-state oscillators carried out in the mid-1990s revealed that such diodes having power much higher than 30 watts are unavailable for public sale. The story is quite different in the case of oscillators being used for military applications. For example, in 2002 I learned through a personal contact that one defense aerospace avionics distributor had shipped out an experimental 1,040-gigahertz (300-micron) oscillator that reportedly had a rated output of 40 kilowatts! This company routinely shipped items marked as "microwave oscillators" to defense aerospace corporations such as Northrop Grumman, Boeing, Lockheed Martin, and BAE Systems as well as to defense R&D contractors such as Raytheon and SAIC (Science Applications International Corporation).

A survey of cutting-edge developments in the field of solid-state microwave devices indicates that the high powers quoted for the modified Gunn diodes used in Project Skyvault are not all that out of line. One literature review written in 1995 noted that gallium arsenide Gunn diodes were being combined to form units that could achieve the kilowatt level at frequencies above 30 gigahertz.[21] Also, in 2000 Purdue University researchers announced that they had developed a silicon carbide IMPATT diode that was able to achieve microwave power outputs four hundred times higher than silicon-based IMPATT diodes. Their simulations projected the possibility of achieving power outputs as high as 4.2 kilowatts at 10 gigahertz.[22] A lightweight microwave-emitting tube called the Pasotron (for plasma-assisted slow-wave oscillator), developed in the early 1990s at Hughes Research Laboratories and Hughes Missile Systems Co., was able to achieve even higher outputs.[23] This uses an electron gun that generates high-energy electrons that emit a beam of microwaves as they pass through a low-pressure glow discharge. The device produces microwave pulses lasting 100 microseconds with pulse voltages of 220 kilovolts, pulse power outputs of 1 to 5 megawatts, and effieciencies of between 20 and 50 percent. More recently, Pasotrons have been reported to produce 100-nanosecond pulses with microwave powers of 7 gigawatts. Although it is not a solid-state device, it has the advantages that it does not require a magnetic field for its operation, is much lighter in weight, and does not burn out easily. It is not known whether the Project Skyvault team tested Pasotrons at some point in its research.

7.5 ■ THE BEAM AMPLIFIER

According to Murray's friend Don, the high-power Gunn diode used in the Skyvault vehicle, like the magnetron, was mounted in a waveguide box. This had an opening at one end and dimensions that matched the diode's oscillatory characteristics. In other words, the conduit's length was made to equal some multiple of the wavelength of the microwaves emitted from the Gunn diode so that the waves would resonantly reinforce one another as they reflected back and forth along the length of the waveguide. This resonance would increase the beam's voltage.

Although Don did not mention their voltage requirements in his letter, Tom told me that he had learned that these special Gunn diodes were designed to operate in the range of a few hundred thousand volts to a million volts. These voltages are unusually high in comparison with the voltages that commercially available Gunn diodes normally operate at, which is in the range of 5 to 100 volts DC. One is left to wonder whether this voltage might refer to the voltage rating of the diodes, that is, the voltage they were designed to withstand that could be generated in the amplifier cavity. The voltage of the amplified microwave beam, then, may have ranged up to several million volts.

As noted earlier, a simple waveguide cut to the proper dimensions would be able to increase the voltage of a microwave beam but not its total energy. But in his letter, Don seems to be talking about a different sort of amplifier, one capable of increasing the total energy of the beam. He said that this "amplifier" was needed to "extend the use" (i.e., the ability) of the Gunn diode so that it could "launch the . . . vehicle" (see his letter in appendix E). Although the modified Gunn diodes used in Project Skyvault had a power output far greater than those commercially available today, even a power output of 10 kilowatts would likely have fallen short of what was needed. The magnetrons that the project had been using in their earlier work must have had power outputs several orders of magnitude higher than this. So to match this, they would have had to boost the power of the Gunn diode beam in an "energy amplifier."

Most likely the Skyvault project was doing this with a parametric amplifier, a device commonly used by microwave engineers to boost signal strength. A parametric amplifier consists of a cavity containing a nonlinear medium such as a varactor capacitor diode. The beam to be amplified is allowed to enter and exit the amplifier cavity through a port, and while in the cavity it passes through the diode where its energy is pumped up as the result of the action of a second microwave beam called the pump beam. The pump beam typically has a frequency twice that of the main oscillator beam and is oriented at 90 degrees to the main beam so as not to directly interact with it (figure 7.9).

The pump beam affects the main oscillator beam indirectly by varying the diode's parameter, its dielectric constant, at just the right time in the main beam's oscillation cycle.* For example, by decreasing the varactor's dielectric constant (K), the pump beam signal reduces the diode's electric permittivity (ε); this, in turn, decreases the diode's capacitance ($C \propto \varepsilon$) and increases its voltage ($V \propto 1/C$). By doing this at the phase of the cycle in which the main beam's voltage is approaching either a positive or a negative voltage maximum, the amplitude and power of the main beam may be boosted. In this way, the pump beam is able to progressively step up the power of the main beam. Often, the parametric amplifier is interfaced with a circulator that allows the main beam to circulate in a loop with some of its energy being diverted into the parametric amplifier for amplification. Parametric amplifiers are able to amplify a beam's energy anywhere from one hundred to one thousand times. Thus, a 10-kilowatt microwave oscillator signal could be boosted to create a 10-megawatt microwave beam.

One interesting thing about parametric amplifiers is that their energy output can greatly exceed their energy input. The amount of energy that the pump beam requires to alter the permittivity or permeability of the amplifier's nonlinear medium can be much less than the amount of energy that the amplified beam gains through the parametric excitation process. The amount of this overunity output versus input depends on the type of nonlinear medium and its response in the frequency range used.

*Parametric amplifiers can also use a ferrite material as their nonlinear medium and work by instead varying the magnetic permeability μ of the ferrite. The outcome is essentially the same.

The magnetic resonance amplifier is an example of one such amplifier that operates in the audio frequency range rather than at microwave frequencies. It is based on the work and theories of the ninteenth-century American inventor John Ernst Worrell Keely and has been extensively researched by hobbyists. Circuit diagrams and research results on its operation are available on the Internet.[24–28] It uses a high-K dielectric such as a barium titanate capacitor hooked in series with a coil wound around a barium ferrite ceramic magnet core. By exciting it at a frequency of around 20 to 40 kilohertz, this nonlinear tank circuit is made to oscillate at its resonant frequency of around 8,000 to 11,000 hertz. Thus, the excitation frequency is chosen to be three times the resonance frequency, that is, three octaves (nine harmonics) above resonance. Power is drawn from the oscillating ferrite core through a secondary winding that is connected to a bridge rectifier. One such device built and tested by American researchers Joel McClain and Norman Wootan achieved a power output of 2.75 watts, for an input power of 0.7 watt or an overunity ratio of about 4.[29] At resonance, the voltage across the tank circuit ranged up to 1,000 volts when excited with a 30-volt AC pump signal.

Even higher outputs than this have been reported for parametric amplifiers in the audio range. For example, in 1949, Obolensky built a parametric amplifier that used Super Permalloy ferrite as its nonlinear medium and was able to achieve an overunity ratio of about a million to one when he pumped it at frequencies of 60 and 400 hertz.[30] Where does this excess energy come from? Physicists aren't really sure. Obolensky suggests that the energy is cohered from noise present at the atomic level in the amplifier's nonlinear medium and in the immediate space environment.

While it is possible to use a separate power source to generate the pump beam fed into the amplifier, it is also possible to draw off some of the energy surplus in the main beam that is being amplified and to recycle this to power the parametric excitation process. This could be done by connecting the pump beam waveguide tube to a fourth port on the circulator cavity (figure 7.10). The circulator would contain not only the fundamental frequency of the main beam but also its harmonics. So by making the length of this connecting waveguide equal to an odd number of half wavelengths of the main beam's second harmonic frequency, the fundamental frequency would be blocked and just the second harmonic (i.e., $2f_o$) would pass through to the parametric amplifier. As the fundamental frequency becomes more intense, so would its harmonics, and a greater amount of power would become available in the second harmonic for parametric excitation. As a result, the beam intensity would progressively increase.

Such a system, however, runs the risk of being unstable in that without proper regulation it could create an exponential buildup of energy that would ultimately result in an explosion. That is, energy could be created in the amplifier faster than it could be removed. Making such an amplifier work properly so that it is able to boost the wattage of the microwave beam without blowing the amplifier apart is quite tricky. It requires ingenious engineering—such as incorporating a fast-acting servo control that automatically changes the phase of the pump beam frequency when the amplifier's output power level gets too high. This would squelch the amplification process and halt the exponential rise in energy production.

Don did not mention the use of a sawtooth wave–shaping dielectric, so we do not know whether the wave-shaping dielectric was placed in the wave amplifier cavity or whether it was put in a separate wave-shaping resonator cavity. We will suppose the latter was the case. So once it had become amplified, the craft's Gunn diode beam would have exited the circulator and entered a waveguide containing a polarized high-K dielectric that would have shaped the wave into a sawtooth waveform. As in Brown's vertical-lift electrokinetic apparatus, the incident microwave beam would have exerted a substantial electrogravitic thrust along the length of the dielectric that would have helped loft the craft. Hence, this wave-shaping chamber was likely securely anchored so that its thrust would be transferred to the vehicle-support structure.

If the beam in the interior of the craft was directed upward through the wave-shaping dielectric, it may then have been made to pass into a convex slab of metamaterial having a negative index of refraction. As mentioned earlier, a microwave beam tuned close to the material's resonance would exert a strong repulsive force, so an upward-directed microwave beam would produce an upward propulsive force on the metamaterial slab as well. Metamaterials have also been found to efficiently refract microwave beams through tight turns. In fact, Pendry and Smith showed how a metamaterial slab having a convex lens shape refracts a beam through a 180-degree turn. In a similar manner, the metamaterial thruster at the same time could have been used to redirect the beam downward through an adjacent waveguide, from which it would ultimately exit the saucer via a focusing lens and proceed toward the ground (see figure 7.10).

Chapter 8 further examines Don's disclosure about Project Skyvault. We will find that, besides pushing upward against the craft, it was necessary that the microwave propulsion beam also project downward and scatter back to the craft from a ground reference point. In so doing, the beam could be made to resonantly store vast quantities of energy for supporting the craft, and the flight of the craft could be more precisely controlled.

MICROWAVE PHASE CONJUGATION

8.1 ■ PHASE-CONJUGATE MICROWAVE PROPULSION

As mentioned in the previous chapter, my contact Tom had received a letter from a friend of his supervisor, a fellow we have called Don. In 1974, when Tom received this letter, Don was actively involved in Project Skyvault. The letter gave only a rough sketch of the project's microwave propulsion technology, since much of that work was then still classified. Nevertheless, Don gave enough information that, shortly after hearing Tom's story, I was able to come to an important conclusion about a key aspect of the craft's microwave beam propulsion technology. I was able to connect it to a field of optics research that in 1994 was just beginning to emerge in the open literature, but which apparently had been secretly under full development for aerospace applications back in the early 1950s. Before discussing this optical phenomenon, called phase conjugation, and how it might be applied to vehicle propulsion, let us summarize some additional details that Don provided about the propulsion system.

Don said that the microwave energy from the microwave amplifier cavity was directed into a horn-shaped waveguide that controlled or shaped the wave radiation pattern. Although he did not specifically mention it, this horn antenna was most likely situated between the iris and the ceramic convex lens that, as Murray had described, was used to control the diameter of the beam.

After leaving the lens, the microwave beam was allowed to pass through the air to a target area, which was presumably a ground surface location. Microwaves that reflected back up to the vehicle from this target region were then allowed to enter a cavity that contained a mixer diode (figure 8.1). There they were mixed with a portion of the outgoing microwave beam that had been locally diverted from the craft's beam generator. A mixer diode is a radar-absorbing material with nonlinear electromagnetic characteristics that is able to combine waves of slightly differing frequencies to produce a more complex wave having frequencies that are the sum and difference of the two frequencies. Interestingly, one material that has such nonlinear properties is barium titanate, the piezoelectric ceramic that Brown employed in his experiments. Don noted that a stable DC-voltage source was connected across the mixer diode to bias it and that the Gunn diode oscillator was biased in a similar manner.

Don described two types of antigravity microwave systems. The simpler version, called a homodyne, used the same conduits for both transmitting and receiving. He commented that this system "suffered from a lack of range" since its microwave beam typically targeted at no more than thirty miles. The second type of configuration, which he called the "Micro-X unit," used separate transmitting and receiving antennae and presumably could achieve a greater targeting range. It was probably named the Micro-X because it originally operated in the X microwave band, which extends from 8 to 12 gigahertz.

Up to this point, the apparatus that Don described sounds much like a basic radar unit. In the case of radar, the transmitter emits a powerful microwave pulse that then reflects back from the distant target and enters the radar receiver. This weak reflected wave is then combined in the radar's mixer chamber with a portion of its original outgoing signal. Suppose we let f_o represent the reference frequency of the outgoing signal and f represent the return signal that reflects from a target such as a distant aircraft. If the target is moving, the return signal frequency f will be slightly different from the original outgoing signal f_o, for an approaching target $f > f_o$ and for a receding target $f < f_o$. The two frequencies will differ by an amount Δf, equal to twice the Doppler frequency shift, that is $\Delta f = f - f_o = 2f_o v/c$, in which v is the velocity of the target relative to the radar transceiver and c is the velocity of light. A frequency φ (phi), equal to this frequency difference, $\varphi = \Delta f$, would come out of the radar's mixer chamber. Its magnitude and sign would indicate how fast the target is moving and whether it was approaching or receding. The greater the frequency difference, the greater would be the relative velocity inferred for the target.

However, the nonlinear media used in a radar mixer, as it turns out, can also act as a phase conjugate mirror. That is, when illuminated with a radar pulse echo coming in from the target, it produces an outgoing microwave pulse that exactly retraces the path of the incoming target echo signal. This is very different from normal mirror reflection.

Consider an example in which visible light reflects from a conventional mirror. When a laser shines its beam on a target object and some of that light scatters off from the object and strikes a conventional mirror at some angle to its surface, that light will then reflect away from the mirror's silvered surface at a similar angle. The reflected light will continue on a divergent path that takes it increasingly farther from the mirror and the light-scattering object (see figure 8.2a).

In the case of a phase conjugate mirror, on the other hand, the silvered mirror surface is replaced with a translucent piezoelectric crystal such as barium titanate, which has nonlinear optical properties. Again, consider an example in which a laser illuminates the target object and some of the light that scatters from the target enters this crystal, but in addition, part of the light coming directly from the laser is diverted and made to enter the crystal as beam P_1. This laser beam passes through the crystal and reflects back from a mirror on the other side to form a second beam, P_2, propagating in the opposite direction (see figure 8.2b). These counterpropagating beams are called the pump beams. The light that scatters from the target object toward the crystal is called the probe beam. The light waves forming the probe beam enter the interior of the crystal and interact there with the counterpropagating pump beams. The interaction of the probe beam with each of the pump beams produces an interference pattern that alters the index of refraction within the crystal to form a complex pattern of light-refracting surfaces collectively called a holographic amplitude grating. The holographic grating formed by pump beam P_2 then refracts the oppositely directed pump beam P_1 to form an outgoing phase conjugate beam. In contrast, the grating formed by beam P_1 refracts beam P_2 to again form an outgoing phase conjugate beam, with complementary characteristics. This combined phase conjugate beam is represented in figure 8.2b by the gray wave fronts. The phase conjugate beam has the special attribute that its light waves move outward from the crystal along trajectories that precisely retrace the trajectories that had earlier been followed by the probe beam's incoming waves. Hence, the phase conjugate beam converges back to the original light-scattering locations on the target object, and from there its waves rescatter back to the original laser beam light source.

The phase conjugate mirror, in effect, generates a new set of light waves that have the same angle, wave shape, and phase as the incoming light waves scattered from the target object but travel in a reverse direction, moving back toward the target. The effect appears as though time had been made to run backward, causing the incoming scattered

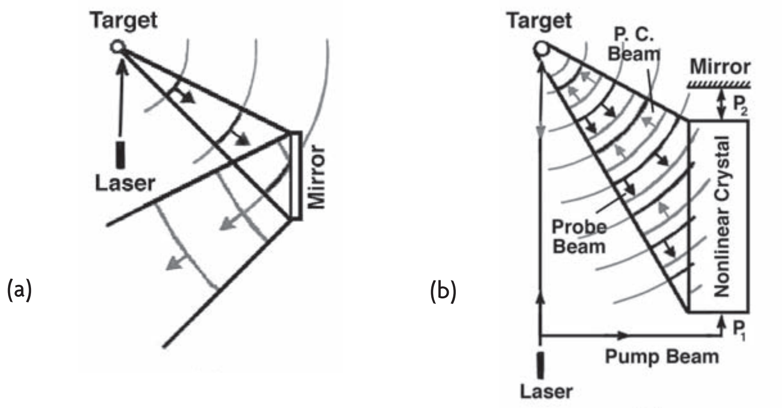

Figure 8.2. Comparison of an ordinary mirror and a phase conjugate mirror. (a) Light waves reflecting from an ordinary mirror. The black wave fronts represent the incident rays and the gray wave fronts represent the reflected rays. (b) Light waves reflecting from a phase conjugate mirror. The black wave fronts represent the incident rays and the gray wave fronts represent the phase conjugate rays that travel "in reverse," converging toward the upper left. light waves to reverse in their tracks. However, here the effect is accomplished with time running forward as it usually does and with light waves different from the incoming waves since the incoming waves are what are generating the grating pattern. Thus, unlike conventional mirror reflection, in which the reflected light continues to spread out into the surrounding environment, with phase conjugate reflection the light stays bottled up, confined to a beam that extends among the laser light source, its illuminated light-scattering object, and the nonlinear medium of the phase conjugate resonator. Since the light waves have no immediate exit, the energy trapped in this phase conjugate resonator can build up to very high intensities.

Physicists have come to call this arrangement a four-wave mixer since four beams intersect in the nonlinear medium: the incoming probe beam, the two counterpropagating pump beams, and the outgoing phase conjugate beam. Although the probe beam initially would be relatively weak, energy supplied by the two pump beams would emerge from this four-wave mixer as a powerful outgoing phase conjugate beam. Upon entering the laser resonator cavity, this phase conjugate beam would stimulate a more powerful outgoing laser beam that would be specifically directed toward points on the target that preferentially scatter light into the four-wave mixer. As a result, the probe beam entering the mixer crystal would progressively increase in intensity. Over time, a high-intensity light path would resonantly build up among the laser, the target object, and the four-wave mixer, and very little if any of the laser's light would be scattered into the environment.

The second law of thermodynamics tells us that in closed systems, order always tends toward disorder, that is, it predicts that light scattered from an object should disperse into space and eventually dissipate its energy. This is not so with light striking a phase conjugate mirror. The grating records the information carried by the incoming probe beam concerning where its light waves originated and in turn refracts (steers) the pump beam to create an outgoing phase conjugate beam whose waves precisely retrace the paths that had been followed by the incident rays of the probe beam. Thus, a state of initial disorder is made to tend toward a subsequent state of greater order. The scattered light is returned in a more concentrated state toward the point from which it emerged.

In most media, the electromagnetic wave interference pattern formed between the incoming probe beam and the pump beams would have no effect on light wave propagation, but in a polarized piezoelectric medium such as barium titanate, these field potentials are able to physically alter the index of refraction of the piezoelectric medium at a microscopic level. Through this multifarious patterning of its index of refraction, the crystal is able to complexly scatter light waves passing through it so as to reconstruct the "time-reverse" phase conjugate beam. If we were to think of the crystal as a computer hard drive, then the probe beam striking this crystal would, in effect, be writing data into this hard drive about all of the directions and phases of its various light rays. This stored information refracts the pump beam, directing it to form an outgoing phase conjugate beam.

The pump beams entering the mixer need not be formed from a laser beam split off from the illuminating laser. Rather, they may be spontaneously seeded from the probe beam, provided that mirrors are placed on either side of the mixer crystal at the proper angle. How such a passive phase conjugate resonator works is summarized in the text box on page 231.

The academic scientific community first became aware of optical phase conjugation through its members' work with lasers. Such laser experiments were conducted in 1972 at the Lebedev Physical Institute in Moscow. Subsequently, scientists in the United States and other countries began investigating the phenomenon.[1,2] This technology found a military application in the development of a Star Wars weapon that can track an enemy missile target by illuminating it with a beam of laser light and subsequently destroy the target by sending out a powerful laser pulse that converges onto the target, retracing the path of the light rays that had reflected from the target.

In 1994, when I first heard about Project Skyvault, the only reference to phase conjugation was in experiments that were being conducted at optical wavelengths with lasers, but Don's discourse on microwave beam mixing immediately led me to conclude that Project Skyvault was performing microwave beam phase conjugation. I conducted a literature search, but it turned up no references to the use of phase conjugation at microwave frequencies. Nevertheless, I concluded that if phase conjugation worked at optical wavelengths, it should work just as well at microwave wavelengths. Since that time, a significant amount of research on microwave phase conjugation has been published, indicating that my earlier conclusion was indeed justified.

Optical Phase Conjugate Resonance in Barium Titanate

When a probe laser beam, or "seed" beam of coherent laser light (see ray 1, figure 8.3), is directed to pass into a nonlinear dielectric medium, such as an electrically polarized crystal of barium titanate, and this dielectric is placed between two parallel mirrors, this probe beam will excite two counterpropagating "pump beams" (see rays 3 and 4, figure 8.3) to build up between the mirrors. These pump beams interact with the incoming probe beam to produce a stationary periodic electric field and refractive index pattern termed a holographic amplitude grating. Experiments have shown that the counterpropagating pump beams can self-excite to intensities sixty times that of the input signal beam without any additional energy input.[3,4] Higher amplification coefficients could be achieved by reducing the losses of the resonator cavity and by taking advantage of natural resonances in the nonlinear dielectric.

This passive resonator also functions as a phase conjugate mirror. The holographic amplitude grating produced by the interaction of the pump beam (ray 3 in figure 8.3) with the incoming probe beam (ray 1) refracts the counterpropagating pump beam (ray 4) to yield an outgoing time-reversed beam (ray 2), also called a phase conjugate beam. Similarly, the grating produced by the interaction of the beams (rays 4 and 1) refracts the counterpropagating pump beam (ray 3) to produce a similar outgoing phase conjugate beam (ray 2) in phase with that produced by the other pump beam (ray 4). The electromagnetic wave fronts in the outgoing beam (ray 2) are identical to the ordinary wave fronts in the probe beam (ray 1), except that they propagate backward instead of forward, precisely retracing the paths followed by the forward-moving wave fronts of the ordinary beam. Consequently, the barium titanate crystal functions as a self-pumped optical phase conjugate mirror. If the probe beam were to originate from a certain point, this phase conjugate mirror would reflect a beam that converges back to that point. This principle is used in Star Wars weapons designed to track and destroy missiles by using a laser beam.

However, if microwave phase conjugation was indeed being used in Project Skyvault, we get a very different picture of the historical development of this branch of science. It indicates that about two decades before academia discovered phase conjugation in laser experiments, this phenomenon was under intense investigation by aerospace black-project scientists studying its ability to amplify and bottle up microwave radiation into intense downward-directed beams from aircraft.

If made to function as a microwave phase conjugate resonator, a radar unit could be able to automatically lock on to and track its target and also to exponentially amplify the intensity of the incoming radar echo. Instead of being dispersed into the environment, most of the radar signal's energy would become confined to a nondispersing beam extending between the radar unit and the target. This has the advantage of allowing very intense microwave beams to be built up with very little input power, clearly an advantage if one needed to generate intense microwave beams for vehicle propulsion. Thus, Don's rather cryptic description of the Skyvault vehicle propulsion unit makes quite a bit of sense if he was describing a microwave device that operates similar to a phase conjugate resonator.

With some knowledge of how a phase conjugate resonator functions, we can understand Don's description of the Micro-X unit as follows. The Skyvault vehicle has a high-voltage DC power source on board that drives a high-power Gunn diode mounted within a resonator conduit mounted below the craft. Coherent microwave radiation emitted from the Gunn diode repeatedly reflects back and forth along the length of this conduit and becomes amplified in voltage. Dielectrics placed in the conduit transform the signal into a sawtooth-shaped waveform. The microwave radiation from this resonator passes through an iris and radiates downward through a microwave horn. A convex lens focuses the radiation into a beam that shines on the ground (see figure 8.4). A fraction of this radiation is absorbed in the ground and the remaining fraction is scattered upward, of which a small portion scatters back toward the craft. A second convex microwave lens mounted below the spacecraft intercepts a portion of this scattered radiation, which constitutes the incoming probe beam, and focuses it through another iris into another resonator cavity that contains the mixer diode. The mixer diode is essentially a block of material such as barium titanate or some other substance that has nonlinear electric properties and is electrically polarized with high-voltage DC. Since microwave wavelengths are about a thousand times larger than visible wavelengths, the mixer medium need not be a transparent or translucent crystal; an amorphous barium titanate ceramic works just as well.

Furthermore, a portion of the microwave radiation in the Gunn diode resonator cavity is diverted into the mixer diode cavity, where it enters the mixer diode. This pump beam passes through the mixer diode and reflects from the far end of the resonator cavity. The cavity is designed to have a length that is a whole-number multiple of the Gunn diode wavelength to ensure that resonance is achieved. This establishes two counterpropagating phase-locked pump beams within the cavity. The mixer diode's electric polarization axis is oriented at the proper angle relative to these pump beams.

Within the mixer diode medium, the probe beam interacts with each of the two counterpropagating pump beams to produce a holographic electrostatic grating pattern. In turn, the grating pattern produced by a given pump beam interacts with the opposing pump beam to produce an outgoing microwave beam that is the phase conjugate of the probe microwave beam, or, in other words, is the phase conjugate of the radiation scattered back to the craft from the ground target site. As was the case with laser light phase conjugation, the waveform, angle, and phase of the phase conjugate microwave beam are configured just like those of the incoming probe beam, except that the waves propagate in a reverse direction. As such, these phase conjugate rays exactly retrace the paths followed by the ground-reflected rays and ultimately converge back to the probe beam's point of origin. That is, this time-reversed beam converges on the ground-reflection site and then continues to retrace the probe beam's path, ultimately entering the spacecraft's Gunn diode oscillator cavity.

This arrangement of two counterpropagating pump beams, an incoming probe beam, and outgoing phase conjugate beam, all interacting within the craft's nonlinear mixer diode, constitutes a four-wave mixer. Since the oscillation phases of the probe and phase conjugate beams are precisely matched, these ordinary and time-reversed waves reinforce one another to produce a resonantly amplified stationary wave pattern, or soliton, between the craft's mixer resonator cavity and the ground and between the ground and the craft's Gunn diode resonator cavity. As a result, the electromagnetic energy beamed to the ground from the Gunn diode amplifier cavity and also the energy beamed back to the ground as the outgoing phase conjugate beam become efficiently stored in this soliton beam. Based on the large body of knowledge that has been accumulated about the phase conjugation phenomenon, we know this energy storage soliton phenomenon to be fact.

This stationary wave in effect behaves as a giant energy capacitor. The soliton's intensity progressively builds up to a very high value, limited only by absorption energy losses when the microwave beam contacts surfaces that partially absorb the microwave radiation. The soliton beam develops specifically between high-reflectivity ground scattering surfaces. Ground scattering sites illuminated by the beam that are very absorbing to microwave radiation will return little radiation to the mixer, and hence, those ray paths will carry an insignificantly small fraction of the soliton beam's total energy flux.

Considering that passive phase conjugate resonators using barium titanate crystals have developed sixtyfold power gains over their seed (probe) laser beam intensity, we might speculate that Project Skyvault was able to achieve microwave beam intensity gains of at least two orders of magnitude and perhaps higher. If they used a Gunn diode that operated at a power of 10 kilowatts, then the soliton beam could have stored 1 to 10 megawatts of energy. If, on the other hand, the craft used a parametric amplifier to amplify the Gunn diode beam to a power of several million watts, then the soliton beam could have stored several gigawatts.

We can only speculate how much beam power was needed to lift the Skyvault craft. Don did not disclose this, nor did he mention the size of the Skyvault craft. Obviously, the power needed for a given propulsion beam would depend on the weight of the craft and on how many beams it used for levitation. With this method, it should be possible to lift a craft even the size of an aircraft carrier.

As mentioned earlier, sawtooth-shaped waves having a sharp rise in negative electric potential will produce repulsive forces on bodies they encounter. Also, artificial metamaterials having electric or magnetic resonances close to the microwave beam frequency are capable of responding with very large repulsive thrusts. As mentioned in chapter 7, the Skyvault craft very likely used such a material for its wave-shaping diode and in a beam refractor that reversed the path of its main beam to pass through a lens toward the ground. The mixer diode may also have been made out of such a metamaterial so that, in addition to producing an outgoing beam that would be the phase conjugate of the incoming probe beam, the diode would also be lofted by both the incoming probe beam and the downward-refracted pump beams.

Consequently, the sawtooth-shaped waves emitted from the Gunn diode resonator cavity will exert upward forces in the wave-shaping diode, in the beam reflector, and in the mixer diode that will together act to levitate the craft. The microwave beams that strike the ground will produce a downward force on the ground, but this force will not be as great as that lofting the craft's dielectrics, since it is unlikely that soil material typically encountered in the ground would have any resonant frequencies near the craft's microwave beam frequency.

Based on Don's testimony, we can conclude that this microwave-induced thrust would not be just an electrostatic effect, but also an electrogravitic effect in that it would repel the mixer diode through a mass effect. In such a case, this phase-locked soliton beam could induce a gravitational force on the craft that was opposed to the Earth's downward pull, thereby reducing the craft's weight and causing it to levitate. The idea that a microwave beam should have gravitational effects is not entirely unexpected. As discussed earlier, research by Brown and Podkletnov indicates that sawtooth electric potential waves produce gravity-like thrust effects. This electrogravitic coupling phenomenon is also a key prediction of subquantum kinetics.

A Skyvault spacecraft could maintain proper pitch stability by using three microwave beam generators spaced from one another so as to produce a tripodlike beam arrangement (see figure 8.5). A single mixer could be located at the center of the craft's lower hull to phase-conjugate the three beams. Alternatively, three mixers might be used, one near each of the craft's microwave beam generators.

In summary, by using phase conjugate technology, a craft would be able to build up a resonant energy beam between itself and the ground that would have a cumulative power far in excess of that which the craft would be feeding into it. Its advantage for propulsion may be readily seen when compared with a conventional microwave system that uses an onboard maser (*m*icrowave *a*mplification by *s*timulated *e*mission of *r*adiation) as a microwave transmitter. In the case of a conventional maser system, the emitted radiation would simply leave the craft, strike the ground, and scatter in various directions, with a minute fraction of the original radiation scattering back toward the craft. To get a reflected beam by this method that would exert a measurable propulsive force, the craft's transmitter would have to be so powerful and its energy source of such a large size as to make this method of microwave propulsion totally impractical.

However, in the case of a craft employing phase conjugation technology, the initially minute amount of microwave radiation scattered from the ground and striking the craft would be phase conjugated and sent back to the ground as a time-reversed beam. This time-reversed beam would retrace the path of the scattered rays, targeting just those facets on the ground that were reflecting microwaves toward the craft and reflecting back from those facets to the craft's maser transmitter. So out of all the microwave rays being scattered from the ground, the phase conjugator would pick out just those that were striking the craft and send out its energy to trace in reverse the trajectory of those rays back to their transmission source. As the microwave energy was resonantly reflected back and forth among the craft's transmitter, the ground, and the craft's phase conjugator, a soliton beam would form specifically between the craft and the ground and begin to progressively increase in intensity. The waves would remain coherent despite repeated reflections, so losses would be minimal. Eventually, this beam would accumulate an intensity far in excess of the power being outputted from the craft's AC maser source and possibly would even draw in energy cohered from the surrounding environment. Given that this soliton beam exerts an upward repulsive force on the craft, with sufficient resonant amplification it would produce an upward force sufficient to support the craft. In effect, this microwave phase conjugate resonator would act as a gravity wave amplifier to generate an enormous electrogravitic thrust for supporting the craft. Ray, the black-project physicist I had spoken to, said that in the black R&D world, this resonant amplification effect is referred to as "field-induced soliton phenomenon."[5]

8.2 ▪ VEHICLE FLIGHT CONTROL

Another purpose of projecting beams out from the craft to the ground surface would be for flight control. As mentioned earlier, the ground-reflected probe beam enters the mixer diode, where it is mixed with the beam from the craft's main Gunn oscillator to produce sum and difference frequencies, the difference frequency being the Doppler output signal, whose frequency is determined by the speed of the vehicle's motion relative to the ground. Don said that in both the homodyne and Micro-X units this difference signal was fed into what he termed the "processing circuit," where it was amplified and processed "to produce the vehicle in motion." Unfortunately, he gave no additional information as to the nature of this processing or how it might result in moving the vehicle. He stated that the frequency of the Doppler output signal not only depends on the speed of the vehicle, but also "controls the speed of the vehicle" (see page 3 of Don's letter in appendix E).

In his letter, Don wrote that the Doppler frequency, φ, caused by the vehicle's movement in a 100-gigahertz microwave radiation field (f_o) was given by the equation:

$$\varphi = 2f_o\, v/c$$

in which φ is the frequency difference due to Doppler shifting of the outgoing signal, f_o is the frequency of the outgoing microwave signal generated by the vehicle, v is the speed of the vehicle in centimeters per second, and c is the speed of light (3×10^{10} centimeters per second). Unless he was just using an analogy here, Don seems to imply that they were using a 100-gigahertz oscillator for their propulsion beam—hence, one that operated in the W microwave band. The φ in the above equation represents the difference frequency, Δf, that would be produced by the mixer diode as a result of combining the incoming probe beam signal with the spacecraft's local oscillator reference signal, the pump beam.

If the vehicle was stationary relative to the targeted region, the waves scattered back to the craft would have the same frequency as the original outgoing microwave signal. Don noted that in this case the output in the mixer diode would be relatively simple; that is, no difference frequency would be produced. However, in a case in which the vehicle was moving relative to the ground, the reflected signal would be Doppler shifted, causing its frequency to differ slightly from the spacecraft's local oscillator frequency. In this case, he said the signal output from the mixer would be more complex, that is, there would be a difference signal output.

As an example, if the vehicle was beaming down a signal of $f_o = 100$ gigahertz and was receding upward from the ground at a speed of 1.5 meters per second, this 100-gigahertz signal would arrive at the ground redshifted by 500 hertz (10^{11} Hz × v/c), presenting a frequency $f_o - 500$ hertz. Upon being reflected from the ground up toward the receding vehicle, this redshifted microwave beam would appear to be redshifted by an additional 500 hertz relative to the vehicle. As a result, the incoming reflected signal would be redshifted by 1,000 hertz compared with the signal originally sent out by the craft's local oscillator. Consequently, when this redshifted frequency f is combined in the microwave mixer with the pump beam frequency f_o from the local oscillator, the mixer would produce a 1,000-hertz difference signal, which is the Doppler output frequency, φ. Harmonic multiples of this fundamental Doppler beat frequency would most likely also be present, although in a lesser amount.

It is quite likely that such a phase conjugate propulsion system would emit sound, since piezoelectric media physically move and oscillate when they are excited by electromagnetic waves. In fact, such materials are used in telephone speakers and sonic alarms. Similarly, the piezoelectric mixer medium in the Skyvault spacecraft, excited by this difference frequency, would emit a sonic vibration. If such a craft was to hover up and down at only 15 centimeters per second on its 100-gigahertz microwave beam, the fundamental harmonic of its beat frequency would have a very low value of around 100 hertz. Sonically, this would be at the lower end of the audible spectrum. As the vehicle proceeded to climb at an increasing speed, the sound pitch emitted from its mixer diode would accordingly increase, passing up through the audible range to ultrasonic frequencies. At an upward velocity of 30 meters per second (sixty-seven miles per hour), the craft would be generating a 20,000-hertz beat frequency (i.e., in the ultrasonic range).

Unconventional flying objects, however, have been sighted that emit somewhat lower microwave frequencies. For example, in one aerial chase of a UFO that took place near Meridian, Mississippi, in July 1957, electronic countermeasures equipment on board an RB-47 plane was able to pick up a 3-gigahertz microwave frequency emanating from the UFO. The signal occurred in 2-microsecond-long bursts that repeated six hundred times per second.[6] UFOs have generally been observed to radiate electromagnetic waves in the 0.3 to 3 gigahertz range, hence in the UHF band.[7] If the craft was to transmit a 1-gigahertz maser signal and travel upward at a velocity of 30 meters per second, its beat frequency would be felt in the low frequency audio range at 200 hertz.

Let us next attempt to interpret Don's laconic statements describing how the Skyvault craft's microwave receiver operates when the ship is in motion. As we noted above, when the craft is moving upward, the ground will be receding from the craft and, hence, upon reflection from the ground, the local oscillator frequency f_o will be Doppler redshifted to a slightly lower frequency by an amount $-\Delta f = -f_o(v/c)$. Also, as the ground-reflected probe beam enters the mixer diode, it will experience an additional Doppler redshift due to the craft's upward receding motion. Thus, upon entering the mixer, the probe beam will have been Doppler shifted relative to the local oscillator frequency by a total of $-2\Delta f$, which is equal to $-\varphi$.

However, the mixer diode will compensate for this frequency shift. That is, because the incoming redshifted probe beam and the pump beams differ in frequency by $2\Delta f$, they will generate a moving holographic grating pattern within the medium of the four-wave mixer diode. This is well known from experiments with optical phase conjugation. Upon interaction with this moving grating pattern, the pump beams will produce an outgoing phase conjugate beam that is frequency shifted relative to the local oscillator (pump beam) frequency by an amount equal to the frequency shift of the incoming probe beam, but opposite in sign.[8] Hence, the four-wave mixer will automatically produce a phase conjugate beam that is blueshifted in frequency by an amount $\varphi = +2\Delta f$. That is, the outgoing beam will be reverse Doppler shifted. The incoming redshifted probe beam and outgoing blueshifted phase conjugate beam then differ in frequency by $4\Delta f$ in the mixer diode reference frame. After reflecting from the ground and converging into the Gunn diode resonator cavity, the blueshifted phase conjugate beam will have been redshifted by an amount $\varphi = -2\Delta f$. So upon reaching the receding craft, its frequency will end up precisely matching the local oscillator frequency. Thus, a condition of resonance will be established with the outgoing local oscillator frequency.

In the Earth's reference frame, the frequencies of the ground-reflected probe beam and the phase conjugate beam will differ by an amount $2\Delta f$, numerically equaling the difference frequency, or beat frequency, that the ground-reflected probe beam generates in the four-wave mixer. As a result, these two counterpropagating beams will build up a phase-locked soliton beam between the craft and the ground that in the ground reference frame will have a beat frequency $\varphi = 2\Delta f$. This is equivalent to the frequency that Don's formula specifies to be the "frequency caused by movement of the unit" (or vehicle). Its value depends on the speed of the craft relative to the ground. This beat frequency will likely induce an audible sound in any material body on the ground that it happens to push against. This could explain UFO sightings in which witnesses have reported hearing humming sounds.

If we properly interpret Don's letter, he appears to say that the mixer's Doppler output signal may be used to control the speed of the vehicle. He talks of amplifying and processing this signal. Presumably, this amplified Doppler signal is fed back into the mixer. The amplified signal, in turn, would add its power to the outgoing phase conjugate beam and ultimately to the soliton beam. Thus, by controlling the amount by which the Doppler signal is amplified, a pilot would be able to control the soliton beam intensity and the amount of thrust that the beam would develop. In this way, he could control the speed of the craft. With more amplification, the craft would accelerate away from the Earth and with less amplification it would decelerate or even enter a descending flight mode. As the craft moved horizontally, its velocity relative to a beam's particular ground target location would continually change and as a result the frequency of the mixer diode's Doppler output signal would be changing accordingly. Whatever frequency the mixer happened to be outputting, the amplifier would be amplifying that signal at the amplification level that the pilot had set.

Thus, although the power level of the Gunn diode beam generator could also be changed, for finer adjustments the craft guidance system would be controlling the power level of the much-lower-frequency Doppler signal. This is reasonable since lower-frequency waves in the audio or radio frequency range are much easier to control than those in microwave frequencies. If the craft supported itself on three microwave beams, it would need some very sophisticated computer hardware to coordinate and properly control the Doppler signal power levels of all three beams.

It is conceivable that the same technique could be used to produce a tractor beam that would lock on to objects and draw them toward the craft. A microwave beam could be changed from a repulser beam into a tractor beam simply by inverting its sawtooth waveform to have a sharp increase of positive potential followed by a gradual decline. This could be done by reversing the polarity bias on the Gunn diode and on the barium titanate dielectric that would be used to shape the wave. If the craft had several phase conjugate resonators (i.e., more than one local oscillator and several mixer diodes), some might be used to create repulsive beams to support the craft, leaving another free to phase conjugate an attractive soliton beam that might be used to target a transportable object. By adjusting the power applied to its tractor soliton beam, the craft could control the movement of the targeted object as it made its approach. Similar technology could explain UFO sightings in which cars or people have been picked up by a force field and drawn toward a hovering craft.

In summary, the development of microwave field propulsion technology combines three areas of research: (a) research into the production of high-power microwave beams, (b) research into metamaterials that exhibit a negative index of refraction or strong electric or magnetic resonances at microwave frequencies, and (c) research into microwave phase conjugation. With the proper engineering development, it should be possible to produce a vehicle capable of free levitation.

8.3 ■ AEROSPACE INDUSTRY INVOLVEMENT

Is there evidence that companies have been doing work in the field of microwave phase conjugation in more recent years? Indeed, a survey of unclassified literature indicates that Rocketdyne has been relatively active in this field. For example, in 1990, scientists associated with Rocketdyne and with Rockwell International coauthored a paper titled "Microwave Phase Conjugation in a Liquid Suspension of Elongated Microparticles."[9] The nonlinear electric properties of the particle suspension described in the article would allow it to serve as an ideal medium in which four-wave mixing could take place. Also, it is not a secret that Rocketdyne has been interested in the development of high-powered microwave beams. For example, in 1993, scientists affiliated with the Rocketdyne division of Rockwell International and with the Titan-Beta Corporation reported tests of a high-power maser system capable of delivering a 2.86-gigahertz pulsed microwave beam having a peak power of 65 megawatts![10] The system used an SLAC 5045 linear accelerator klystron tube that functioned as a free-electron laser and was powered by a modulator unit developed by Titan-Beta. The unit delivered 3.5-microsecond pulses at a rate of 180 pulses per second. The paper does not mention what the beam was to be used for, but its power would have greatly surpassed that of the magnetrons used in the early days of Project Skyvault.

Hughes Aircraft is another company that was active in the field of microwave phase conjugation. Recall the story told by my friend Thomas whose father had worked at Rocketdyne, presumably on Project Skyvault, and had drawn him a picture of a lenticular levitating vehicle that had been successfully tested. His father had later moved on to work at Hughes Aircraft, also in deeply classified projects. When Thomas later asked his father if Hughes was doing research in electrogravitics, his father's terse answer was, "They are the world leaders." Later in 1992, I had the occasion to ask one high-ranking Hughes manager whether Hughes Aircraft was still pursuing its electrogravitics R&D. He answered, "Yes, but they keep their work very quiet."* The same could probably be said for the other aerospace companies that today continue to work in this field.

It is also known through papers published in the open literature that give author affiliations that a considerable amount of research was going on at Hughes in optical phase conjugation. One military application of such technology, mentioned in chapter 7, is the targeting and destruction of missiles by means of a pulse from a high-powered laser. Thus, considering that Hughes was also doing cutting-edge research in electrogravitics, it stands to reason that it was also applying its phase conjugation knowledge to microwave phase-conjugating systems on projects involved in developing vehicle propulsion systems. In fact, Hughes has had a long involvement in military radar systems. The forward-looking radar used on the B-2 bomber, for example, was developed by Hughes. We may conjecture, then, that Hughes Aircraft was heavily involved in Project Skyvault's research.

An indication that Hughes had been conducting research on microwave phase conjugation came in 1993 with the granting of its patent for radar cross-section enhancement using phase-conjugated impulse signals (U.S. patent 5,223,838). Researchers were applying the principle to radar as a way of locking on to a distant target. By receiving a radar echo that normally would be too weak to properly detect, mixing it in a mixer diode with a pump maser beam to create a holographic grating, and pumping the grating with a radar pulse to create an outgoing phase conjugate beam, they were able to create a soliton beam between the radar transceiver and target that would resonantly amplify the original radar echo to a detectable level. The patent makes no mention that similar technology could be used to create a soliton beam beneath an aircraft for the purpose of levitation. Any patent disclosing such an aerospace application would likely have run the risk of being classified, so there is no way of knowing whether such a patent in fact exists.

*Prior to its dissolution through corporate merger, Hughes had a long history of being involved in the development of very advanced, leading-edge technology. About 90 percent of its work was defense related, most of which is highly classified R&D. During the early 1980s, when the U.S. Government Accounting Office was cracking down on defense contract fraud, evidence surfaced that an astounding two-thirds of Hughes's contract costs could not be accounted for, far more than for any other corporation surveyed. Whereas other contractors received stiff fines for their unaccounted costs, Hughes managed to emerge virtually unscathed. Could federal authorities have understood that these excess cash flows were not cost overruns, but rather funds whose specific black-programs destinations could not be revealed or even admitted to?

When all the above evidence is considered as a whole, a pattern emerges that points to Hughes having made a major effort in developing microwave phase conjugation field propulsion technology. Hughes has since been split up and sold off to a number of companies. The Hughes research facility in Malibu was a former hotbed of research on antigravity propulsion according to the testimony of a "Dr. B." in Steven Greer's book Disclosure (2001, p. 262). The laboratory, which currently goes by the name HRL Laboratories, is today jointly owned by Boeing and General Motors.

The technology of microwave phase conjugation is also being applied to aerospace communications. Ideas along these lines were discussed by University of Michigan researchers Leo DiDomenico and Gabriel Rebeiz in a paper they published in 1999.[11] The technology has several advantages. First, compared with standard maser beam technologies, it is very energy conserving since the transmitted microwave energy is restricted to a tight beam extending between the ground communication station and the spacecraft. Unlike a standard maser beam, very little radiation is lost into space. Second, the link is very secure since, unlike radio broadcasts, it is very difficult for anyone to eavesdrop unless he places his receiver in the path of the beam. Third, the phase conjugate beam locks on to the spacecraft and, hence, is able to automatically track the spacecraft, even though the spacecraft is moving. The DiDomenico and Rebeiz paper is interesting because it talks about phase conjugation of an incoming signal that has been Doppler shifted due to motion of the target. So, many of the same considerations involved in a vehicle propulsion system are already being discussed in the context of communication systems. The mathematics are somewhat involved, requiring the use of Heaviside operators or Laplace transforms.*

8.4 ■ TESLA'S MAGNIFYING TRANSMITTERS

Tesla's magnifying transmitters also functioned as phase conjugate resonators, and this was most likely known to him, although the specific concepts behind the phase conjugation phenomenon would not be developed for many decades. These devices were known for their ability to generate exceedingly high voltages and to occasionally produce violently destructive ball lightning sparks. The Wardenclyffe tower was the largest of his generators (see figure 8.6).[12] Tesla built it to show that it was possible to transmit megawatts of power over global distances to power entire cities and air vehicles as well.[13] Construction of the tower began in 1901 on Long Island near the town of Shoreham. The central part of its resonator consisted of a large, flat spiral coil mounted horizontally and shielded within a 68-foot-diameter mushroom-shaped dome electrode, this whole structure being perched 187 feet above the ground at the top of a wooden tower. The center of the coil was electrically connected to the dome electrode to form a resonator. Power inductively supplied to the coil would surge in resonance between the coil and the dome electrode, pulsing the dome with extremely high voltages. The dome electrode consisted of a honeycomb array of 1-foot-diameter parabolic shells whose small-curvature radii facilitated ionization of the surrounding atmosphere. Thus, when electrified, the entire dome would have become enveloped in an ion halo. The nitric oxide gases that would have formed in this halo have electric properties that are very nonlinear and would have served as an ideal phase-conjugating medium.[14]

*Those interested in preparing themselves for a career in field propulsion technology should consider going for an undergraduate degree in physics with a minor in electrical engineering. Then, go on to get either a master's or doctoral degree in electrical engineering, specializing in microwave or radar engineering. Make sure to take courses, among other things, in optical and microwave phase conjugation, Fourier analysis, and Laplace transforms. The best universities to pick are those at which professors are already working in the area of microwave phase conjugation applied to radar or communication systems. Examples that come to mind are the University of Michigan and the University of California Los Angeles. In particular, the California professors have in the past coauthored papers in this area with Rocketdyne scientists.

We may deduce, then, that this ion halo would have phase-conjugated the tower's resonant oscillations, allowing it to function as a phase-conjugate resonator and to generate field powers far in excess of the power used to run it. Since the dome electrode would have been radiating longitudinal waves to the Earth's ionosphere, an immense soliton would have formed between the halo and the ionosphere, and since the halo would have phase-conjugated the waves returning from the ionosphere, the tower would have been able to draw on energy cohered from a vast region of space.

Unfortunately, this miraculous structure was never completed because Tesla's sponsor cut off the project's funding, but earlier, Tesla had built and operated smaller-scale versions. These magnifying transmitters emitted a repeating series of very high-voltage shock fronts from their dome-shaped negative electrodes. Unlike hertzian waves, these wave fronts had little transverse polarization. Their electric field profile was sawtooth-shaped with a very sharp rise in potential and a subsequent more-gradual decay, and the field gradients were oriented longitudinally in the direction of wave propagation. When operating, his transformer would gradually build up immense field potentials, approaching 100 million volts, as a result of the cumulative effect of repeating pulse cycles. The progressive amplification of these phase-conjugated waves is an example of what we earlier referred to as the field-induced soliton phenomenon. The high voltage that accumulated as a result of these repeating waves would have been apparent as a growing luminescence. In his book Secrets of Cold War Technology, Vassilatos wrote:

> He [Tesla] had already observed how the very air near these Transformers could be rendered strangely self-luminous. This was a light like no high frequency coil ever could produce, a corona of white brilliance which expanded to ever enlarging diameters. The light from Tesla Transformers continually expands. Tesla described the growing column of light which surrounds any elevated line which has been connected to his Transformers. Unlike common high frequency alternations, Tesla radiant energy effects grow with time. Tesla recognized the reason for this temporal growth process. There were no reversals in the source discharges. Therefore the radiant energy would never remove the work performed on any space or material so exposed. As with the unidirectional impulse discharges, the radiant electric effects were additive and accumulative. In this respect, Tesla observed energy magnifications which seemed totally anomalous to ordinary engineering convention.[15]

Further on, Vassilatos wrote:

> Tesla performed outdoor experimental tests of broadcast power in the northernmost reaches of Manhattan by night. Sending metallized balloons aloft, he raised conductive lines. These were connected to the > terminals of his Transformers, and activated. When properly adjusted, the white luminous columns began covering the vertical aerial line and expanded by the second. Enveloping Tesla, his assistants, and the surrounding trees, this strange white luminosity moved out into the countryside to an enormous volume of space. Tesla described this phenomenon in several of his power transmission patents, the obvious artifact of a non-electrical energy.[16]

Like Tesla's transformers, the Project Skyvault vehicle may similarly have made use of a nitric oxide halo to phase-conjugate its microwave beams. If part of the pump microwave beam signal was used to energize the outer surface of the craft, the resulting high-frequency, high-voltage field would have ionized the air immediately around the craft, enveloping it in a phase-conjugating layer of nitric oxide gas. Then, the entire lower surface of the craft would have served as a secondary mixer, and the three incoming ground-reflected probe beams would have become time-reversed (phase-conjugated) on the craft's hull rather than in its interior mixer diode. This could explain why the bodies of many UFOs are seen to be luminous and radiating microwave radiation in the 0.3-to-3-gigahertz frequency range. The observation that UFOs often visibly pulsate when hovering or taking off could be explained if they were pumping their surfaces with a low-Doppler beat frequency that modulated the brightness of their luminescence.

It is also possible that the hull of such a spacecraft could itself be fabricated out of a metamaterial such that any microwaves impinging on its lower surface would result in a propulsive force. The unusual, layered bismuth and magnesium metal known as Art's Parts, reportedly retrieved from the hull of a crashed UFO, could be an example of such a material (see chapter 9).

Such material could also have the dual purpose of functioning either as a radar-absorbing or as a radar-diverting material, one that would bend incident electromagnetic waves around an object in such a way as to give the impression that they had passed through the object completely unobstructed. For example, physicists David Smith, John Pendry, and David Schurig announced in May 2006 that within five years their team would be able to demonstrate a metamaterial cloaking shield that would render a craft within it completely invisible to electromagnetic waves at microwave frequencies.[17]

Ray's comment in chapter 4 that black-world antigravity propulsion technology was based partly on Tesla's work further supports the notion that phase-conjugate microwave resonators have been developed for aerospace propulsion. Ray was apparently quite familiar with phase-conjugate resonance technology because he said that one of the highly secret R&D projects he had been assigned to involved working on the application of this technology in the field of cryptography. Apparently, his group had developed a way to encrypt an electronic message by degrading it into unrecognizable noise and then later recovering it by using a phase-conjugate resonator to time-reverse that noise back to the original ordered message. He felt that this same technology provides some of the key concepts that can explain how these antigravity propulsion craft work the way they do. Discussing a version of this phase-conjugation technology, he stated, "I have seen demonstrations of this stuff—of the raw technology. One of them breaks the second law of thermodynamics, the law of entropy. It breaks that law!"[18] Statements that the first or second law of thermodynamics might be broken amount to blasphemy to the mind-set of the conventional academic physicist. In the world of black-project engineering, however, they are routine facts of life.

8.5 ■ BROWN'S PHASE-CONJUGATING MICROWAVE DISC

Brown's levitating disc would have operated much like the Project Skyvault vehicle. The disc-shaped antenna attached to the bottom of the conical dielectric (see figures 3.2, 3.3, and 3.8) would have radiated microwaves at a frequency of a few gigahertz and would have acted much like the Gunn diode in the Skyvault vehicle. The positive electrode, which would have had either a parabolic or a cone shape, would have served as a wave amplifier cavity since a portion of the microwave radiation reflected downward by the electrode would have been reflected back at the mouth of the cavity. As a result, its signal would have resonantly amplified and built up to a high intensity across the high-K piezoelectric dielectric cone located inside the hornlike cavity. This dielectric cone, which would have been polarized with high-voltage DC, would have had very nonlinear electrical characteristics and would have functioned in a manner similar to the mixer diode in the Skyvault vehicle. Since the dielectric was being pumped with the resonantly amplified microwave beam that was reflecting back and forth along its length, microwaves reflected up from the ground would have acted as a probe beam that would have interacted with the pump beam to produce a holographic grating pattern in the dielectric. At the same time, the pump beam would have produced a phase-conjugate beam that would have traveled downward to the ground, precisely retracing the pathway followed by the ground-reflected waves. The upward-reflected ordinary beam and the downward-propagating phase-conjugate beam would have been phase-locked to produce a soliton wave.

As in the Project Skyvault vehicle, the soliton wave extending between the ground and the mixer dielectric in Brown's saucer would have resonantly amplified to a very high intensity. This would be an example of the field-induced soliton phenomenon. Much of the microwave radiation radiated by the saucer's disc electrode, then, would have been bottled up in this beam.

It is possible that the ion discharge surrounding the positively charged umbrella electrode also served as a phase-conjugating medium, in addition to the barium titanate dielectric. As mentioned above, nitric oxide ions surrounding a high-voltage electrode would have very nonlinear electrical properties and could phase-conjugate waves, much like the glow discharge that surrounded the dome electrode of Tesla's magnifying transmitter.

With Brown's saucer, the DC polarization along the length of the dielectric would have progressively build up to a high voltage due to the dielectric's tendency to rectify some of the AC signal. As a result, a very steep potential gradient would have formed and would have exerted an upward thrust. This ramping up of the dielectric's potential gradient would have been helped by the tendency of the saucer to function as a phase-conjugate resonator with self-amplifying pump beams. In addition, if the oscillator could have been made to emit sawtooth-shaped waves, the saucer would have experienced more upward thrust due to the electrogravitic impulse effect.

Brown made no mention of phase conjugation in his electrokinetics patent, which he applied for in 1958. At that time, the phase-conjugation effect was unknown in the unclassified engineering world. The maser was invented in 1954 by Charles Townsend, and the rubidium optical laser was invented in 1960 by Ted Maiman at Hughes Aircraft. The field of laser holography began developing shortly after that, in the early 1960s, and it was not until 1972 that optical phase conjugation began to be discussed in the open literature. Thus, Brown was most likely unaware of the phase-conjugation principle behind the levitation effect he had experimentally discovered. Bahnson came close to the idea when he inferred that energy from the AC waves was being resonantly stored in the ether surrounding his saucer's electrodes. Indeed, the ether very likely also plays an important role, but the effect finds a ready explanation in terms of the phase-conjugating properties of the saucer's ceramic dielectric and its electrode's plasma sheath.

By 1957, when Brown had begun experimenting with the idea of pulsing dielectrics at microwave frequencies to get electrogravitic thrust, he was apparently rediscovering a microwave propulsion phenomenon that for some time had been known to Project Skyvault scientists and that by that time was in an advanced stage of secret development. His vertical-thrust apparatus would have functioned much like the homodyne version of the Project Skyvault vehicle. This is the version that incorporated the microwave transmitter and mixer in the same conduit. Since Brown was a latecomer with a history of conducting independent investigations that did not adhere to normal security protocols, he could have been regarded as a threat to efforts to maintain the secrecy of this area of R&D investigation. This may explain why his attempts to obtain military funding were continually rebuffed by the Pentagon and why Admiral Rickover had advised him to drop his work on electrogravitic propulsion.

8.6 ■ THE RUNAWAY MODE

Phase conjugate resonance and its related field-induced soliton phenomenon appear to be key to understanding this futuristic aerospace technology. However, this technology is not without its hazards. One important problem that engineers have had to face is ensuring that their microwave-powered vehicle does not enter a runaway mode such that the energy of its soliton field increases exponentially and finally explodes.

Guy Obolensky, one of the early researchers in microwave phase conjugation, has observed firsthand this explosive resonant amplification phenomenon in the phase-conjugating systems he has worked with. He coined the term "faser phenomenon" to refer to this exponential energy increase, "faser" being an acronym that stands for "*f*orce *a*mplification by *s*timulated *e*nergy *r*esonance."[19] His term, in effect, describes the field-induced soliton phenomenon concept.

The phase-conjugate resonator Obolensky was testing in his laboratory in 1958 was so highly efficient that it entered this runaway energy-increase mode, which ended in a violent explosion.[20,21] The phase-conjugate resonator he had constructed, which he termed a "limit cycle faser," consisted of a long surface-waveguide resonator of a size that could be placed on top of a desk. The waveguide was made of an aluminum sheet approximately 0.25 millimeter thick laid over an aluminum slab and separated from it by an insulating Mylar film that was hermetically sealed on either side with layers of distilled water. The separation of the waveguide walls had to be accurate to within a few ten thousandths of an inch. At one end of the waveguide, a 17-kilovolt spark discharge was made to jump across a series of spark gaps, tuned so that their sparks were self-quenching. The resulting spark oscillations generated longitudinal microwaves that traveled down the waveguide, skimming between the top and bottom metal surfaces. Normally, waves reflecting back from the end of the waveguide would disturb the spark discharge, causing it to become noisy and have excessive energy losses. Yet by placing five evenly spaced strips of Permalloy tape at the far end of the waveguide, Obolensky was able to create a phase-conjugate mirror. The nonlinear electrical properties of these strips altered the waveguide's characteristics in such a way that they phase-conjugated the surface waves coming from the spark and reflected them back as time-reversed waves, thereby making the spark oscillations coherent, that is, totally ordered.* As a result, his resonator had a phenomenally high output efficiency—far over unity. A powerful soliton consisting of nine harmonics of the fundamental submillimeter wave was able to build up within it.

Apparently, Obolensky's waveguide was optimally tuned and its Permalloy magnetic grating was optimally configured, because the energy resonance process became self-reinforcing, causing the waveguide's stored energy to increase exponentially. The current gain was so enormous that ball lightning–like sparks began to erupt from the waveguide and actually perforate its aluminum wall. Finally, in a blinding flash, the whole resonator assembly explosively discharged its accumulated energy and fragmented itself. Surviving pieces showed that the waveguide's submillimeter-thick wall was perforated with clusters of tiny holes spaced apart by a certain precise distance-multiple of the planar waveguide's thickness to form a periodic pattern. The dendritic pattern connecting these holes traced out the branching path of the immense electrical discharge that had formerly traveled down the full length of the conduit. Judging from the amount of energy required to vaporize the quantity of aluminum that was missing from the perforated section, Obolensky concluded that it would have required several hundred thousand joules (~100 watt hours) of energy, about 100,000 times greater than the 7 joules (~2 calories) of coulombic energy in the DC charge that his power supply had fed into his waveguide.[22] In subsequent experiments, Obolensky found that this field amplification technique could be properly controlled by means of a feedback circuit that would temporarily detune the oscillator powering the resonator whenever an excessive energy began building up in the resonator. He found that circuits employing normal hertzian signal conduction functioned much too slowly to effectively control the resonator, that only longitudinal shock front waves could travel fast enough.

*That is, the permaloy strips produced a series of impedance discontinuities that formed a current dependent electromagnetic grating pattern along the waveguide. The grating modulated the surface conduction of the waves in such a way that it would reflect them back as phase-conjugate waves. Tesla had also discovered the secret of making coherent spark discharges characterized by negative resistance; he once commented that an arc is not working properly when it is noisy: to be efficient it should "sing," i.e., be coherent.

In another experiment, Obolensky used such self-regulating faser circuits to achieve a 20 percent increase in light output from a 500-watt sodium vapor arc lamp, at the same time eliminating its flicker.[23,24] He attributed its increased efficiency to the nonlinear reactance element that he placed in series with the lamp that phase-conjugated the plasma oscillations of its arc.

Obolensky theorizes that his resonators derive their excess power by "cohering" incoherent energy present in their wave shape and possibly even entraining the zero-point energy in the surrounding ether.[25] He feels that this may have something to do with the resonator's ability to excite multiple harmonics of its fundamental frequency. Whereas a normal resonant electric circuit amplifies only the fundamental resonant frequency, these phase-conjugate resonators also exchange energy among and amplify up to nine harmonics.[26,27] Since these harmonics mutually interlink in the resonator's nonlinear elements, noise energy present in the environment that happens to excite certain of these harmonics would become entrained and cohered into this multimode resonance. That is, the phase conjugator's nonlinear elements would send time-reversed waves back to those "noise" fluctuations, creating a coherent soliton that would entrain incoherent energy into the self-amplifying energy resonance pattern, thereby reversing the entropy of that "noise." Since the soliton not only resides within the resonant circuit but also extends outward to surrounding space, its resonance would entrain the surrounding energy and cool its immediate environment.

Obolensky observed an environmental temperature drop when operating the 200-kilovolt pulse discharge magnifying transmitter described in chapter 6. He noticed that when he switched on his device, the temperature immediately dropped in the surrounding room. He attributed this to the ability of the ionized medium surrounding his dome electrode to phase-conjugate shock fronts reflected back from the environment, creating a soliton wave pattern that entrains environmental noise fluctuations. Like the dome of Tesla's magnifying transmitter, Obolensky's scaled-down replica creates a luminous aura that is ideal for phase conjugation.

Unlike Obolensky's limit cycle faser experiment, the energy entrainment rate of his magnifying transmitter was sufficiently low as to pose no danger of explosion. Oscillograms showed that the accumulated energy produced a 50-kilovolt negative bias on the dome electrode, which otherwise should have maintained a zero voltage. To control the energy buildup, he uses a series of high-ohm resistors immersed in an oil cooling bath to continually drain off power from his antenna dome to ground. He says that in so doing, he bleeds off excess power that his transmitter is cohering from the environment, a blatant example of entropy reversal. If Tesla's technology could be used on a large scale for power generation, the threat of global warming would indeed be a thing of the past.

It is possible to conceive that the Project Skyvault vehicle was similarly phase-conjugating and entraining environmental noise energy into its soliton pattern. If so, its Gunn diode may have initially been operated at full power to seed the microwave beam and get the soliton field established. Once deployed, the soliton beam would have drawn upon entrained energy as its supplementary power source.

Other researchers experimenting with nonlinear resonators also have reported observing environmental cooling effects. In the late 1980s, Russian physicists Vladimir Roshchin and Sergei Godin were testing a version of the Searl effect generator that they refer to as the magnetic energy converter (MEC; see chapter 10). They reported observing a seven-degree Centigrade drop in room air temperature when the MEC was in operation, with the temperature drop being confined to a series of concentric, shell-like cylinders surrounding the MEC's spinning rotor and spaced from one another at intervals equal to the rotor radius. This suggests that the MEC was setting up a radial stationary wave pattern, that is, a soliton. Like Tesla's dome electrode, their disc developed a luminous aura when operating, providing an ideal environment to phase-conjugate incoming waves reflected from the environment. The disc was likely entraining energy from the environment, because above a certain critical rotational velocity, the rotor was observed to self-accelerate and had to be forcefully restrained with a braking system.

The temperature drop in the environment was probably a consequence of this energy entrainment.

One day I received a telephone call from a physicist named Greg who wanted to discuss subquantum kinetics, but as the conversation turned to electrogravitics, I quickly learned that he had considerable inside knowledge about UFO propulsion technology. He told me his interest in this subject began as a young boy, since his father had served as a consultant on secret military projects that were attempting to reverse-engineer UFOs. Greg agreed that many of the antigravity vehicles being developed use microwaves to generate their propulsive force through interaction with certain kinds of nonlinear materials. However, he underscored the problem that these kinds of antigravity drive systems are inherently unstable. Referring to phase-conjugate technology, he said:

> I know why some of this stuff is dangerous and I agree with it being kept secret. Because, while achieving a desirable effect of free body levitation is relatively easy to do, . . . there is an energetic mode in addition to the force mode and the energetic mode has to be controlled with some finesse. It is far easier for the setup that they would create to blow up in their face and wipe them out, and perhaps their neighbors, before they would figure out that such a thing is a potential problem. Anything that has an exponential rise with a few microsecond time constant is not something to take trivially.[28]

Greg said someone would need a very sophisticated knowledge of mathematics to be able to design such a system so that it could operate safely. The reason is that linear mathematics, the kind most physicists use when they solve explicit function equations on the blackboard, does not adequately represent the behavior of the nonlinear interactions that characterize how individual parts of such a system mutually interact with one another and how they are affected by the system as a whole. He said:

> You have to be into nonlinear partial differential equations, and you have to be good with your numerical analysis. You can't go out and > use anybody's canned algorithm. You have to get all the auxiliary functions, analog solutions; anything that remotely smells of a linearization scheme to approximate what the nonlinear solution would be is likely to overlook the runaway solution, the one that's going to end up getting you. You can read about this in IEEE. They've come across this sort of thing in their microwave simulation studies before . . .

> When you're doing high-frequency stuff . . . you will find that standard second-order linear differential equations are incapable of modeling the behavior. You will readily see that there are terms that you are neglecting of how the whole system is interacting with itself. It's wrong to think about it as "field" being separate from "material." You have to think of it as an implicit function system . . . Suppose you say that Z is a function of X and Y and Z, then you have to know what the Z function is before you can say what the answer to it is, that's an implicit system . . . For any of these nonlinear systems, especially the interesting ones, you end up with an implicit function system. So if you are making an approximation, guessing the behavior of the function in a nonrigorous way, and if you violate any of the convergence criteria, then what you'll end up with is a spurious solution. You have to go into the differential topology of the system. Chaos mathematics and stuff like that come in there.[29]

The phase-conjugation demonstration that Ray, the black-project scientist, had witnessed convinced him of the need to keep the details of this technology secret. In his 1992 phone conversation with me, he said, "When I saw the demonstration, it proved radically to me that this stuff has got to be kept under wraps. I agree with the secrecy."[30]

I said I had read about the weapons applications of phase-conjugate technology and had wondered, if this is true, are we really ready for this sociologically?

Ray responded, saying, "We're not. We are not. Let me tell you why. The engineering applications of this stuff are extremely simple, very fundamental, and there is no way to control it. What it amounts to is giving out the recipe to make an atomic bomb by going to the local drugstore. We don't want to broadcast this kind of stuff. At this point in time, its not good to do that."[31]

I felt that Ray may have been exaggerating a bit. The explosion that blew up Obolensky's limit cycle faser certainly could not have been more powerful than that produced by a cherry bomb or M-80 pyrotechnic. It appeared that this was more a concern for the personal safety of the experimenter than it was an issue of a destructive bomb that could potentially be used by a terrorist. Certainly it is nowhere near the hazardous potential of nuclear fission, which now is in common use worldwide. I then commented that, looking at the other side of the coin, there are many problems this technology could help to solve, such as providing an alternative to fossil fuels that could eliminate air pollution and ultimately do away with the global warming greenhouse effect.

Ray responded that there were economic considerations for introducing such a major shift in energy technology. He said, "But the problem exists also that we cannot switch from the way things are to the way things should be instantly, because one interferes with the other completely. You have to have a slow evolution with this."[32]

When I commented that this slow evolution did not seem to be happening since the technology was encapsulated within the black-R&D world, Ray said, "That's because there are political considerations at the moment. You are going to find a little bit more of this exposure beginning, of course, with some of the articles like the one in Aviation Week & Space Technology and other articles you're going to see. By the year 1995, you're going to hear a lot more about it, according to the grand plan, according to what I can tell. So it's coming out slowly but surely."[33]

However, 1995 has long passed and the existence of field propulsion technology is still being kept quiet.

UNCONVENTIONAL FLYING OBJECTS

9.1 SIGHTINGS

Information gathered from a variety of sightings suggests that many UFO disc craft support and propel themselves by means of phase-conjugate microwave beams similar to those used in Project Skyvault. In his book Unconventional Flying Objects, Paul Hill reviews a number of sightings of craft that propelled themselves by means of downward-directed force field beams. One example is a case that occurred in Norway in 1970 in which a 10-meter-diameter disc was hovering above a man standing next to his car.[1] The craft was steel blue and shimmered yellow all around its circumference. Suddenly, it began to leave, and as it did, an invisible force knocked the man to the ground and imploded and pulverized his car windshield. The man did not feel any pain from the impact of the force field, which suggests that it acted uniformly on every cell in his body.

In a similar fashion, the phase-conjugated microwave beam projected from a Project Skyvault craft would have exerted a repelling force on the ground and on ground-based objects or people as it supported the craft. Since the microwave beam would have been targeted over a large region of the ground and would have penetrated some distance into the objects it touched, its force would have been distributed diffusely, as was apparently the case in the Norwegian encounter.

Hill mentions several other sightings. The force field from an overhead UFO in one example gave a soft push to a moving vehicle; in another, rocked a vehicle from side to side; and in yet another, actually flipped over a stopped truck.[2] In another encounter, which happened in 1959 in the Greek villages of Digeliotica and Agio Apostolou, the field from a low-flying disc repelled several ceramic roof tiles off the roof of one house as the craft passed overhead. The village priest, Pappa Costas, who was inside the dwelling at the time, reported that the whole house seemed to shake, making him think there was an earthquake, but it could not have been an earthquake since other houses had not experienced a similar shaking. All of these force field effects would be expected if the UFO was projecting a microwave beam capable of exerting a repelling force on solid objects.

Downward forces have also been observed on underlying vegetation.[3] One bullet-shaped UFO, approximately 45 feet in diameter, was sighted in Maryland in 1958. As it moved at about thirty miles per hour at an altitude of 300 feet, it emitted a steady hum and its skin illuminated the surrounding terrain with a green glow. Tree branches lying along its flight path were bent down and in some cases broken. In another sighting, which occurred in 1974, four UFO discs were spotted hovering only a foot off the ground in a field of rape plants. Approaching to within 15 feet of one rotating craft, a man named Edwin Fuhr noticed that the grass below was being swirled down. The four craft departed vertically about fifteen minutes later, after which he noticed that the grass below where each had hovered was flattened in a clockwise swirl pattern, forming a ring with the grass in the center being left standing upright.

Generally, UFOs are observed to sit level when they hover and to tilt when they perform all other maneuvers. For example, they tilt forward to move forward, tilt backward to stop, bank to the left to turn left, and so on. All of these tilting maneuvers are the kind that would be performed by a craft driven by a matter-repelling microwave soliton beam.

Another common characteristic of UFOs is their penetrating humming, buzzing, or whining sound. In his book, Hill describes one case in which a man reported a UFO casting a greenish light into his cabin as a throbbing hum shook its walls.[4] In another case, the observers "felt" a high-pitched intense sound as a 5-meter-diameter UFO took off. In yet another encounter, a UFO hovered 1.5 meters above the surface of a mountain lake and was seen to excite the water below to dance in thousands of sharp-pointed waves. Hill concludes that the propulsive fields that UFOs project downward are oscillatory and that the energy they transport to the ground and objects below excites oscillations at the same frequency and induces sound to radiate from the objects themselves. A craft levitated by a phase-conjugated microwave soliton beam having a beat frequency φ in the audio range would produce precisely these effects.

Also, UFOs have been observed to extend luminescent beams to the ground. Hill reviews one sighting that was made in Bahia, Brazil, in 1958 in which a 70-foot-diameter UFO disc was observed to emit a silver-blue glow.[5] As it hovered 90 feet above the ground, its luminosity was seen to extend like a curtain all the way to the ground, creating an illuminated area on the ground that was about twice the diameter of the UFO. After climbing to an altitude of about 600 feet, it made a tight circle in the sky, and as it banked for this turn, its luminous focus on the ground traced out a much larger circle. Hill concludes that the luminosity surrounding UFOs and coming from their beams must be caused by their field energy ionizing the air and producing a cool, luminous plasma. He reasons that the plasma must be cool because in one case a UFO that looked like a ball of fire had passed very close to foliage without burning it.

Although Hill suggests that X-rays might be producing the ionization, the same effect could also be produced by an intense microwave beam. In particular, a phase-conjugated soliton beam would store an enormous amount of energy and build up very high electric potentials capable of ionizing the air and exciting these ions to become luminescent, much like the gas molecules inside a fluorescent lamp. Recall that Tom's boss had said that the Project Skyvault vehicle supported itself on a microwave beam that gave off a greenish blue glow.

9.2 ■ THE CASH-LANDRUM ENCOUNTER

Evidence that the Air Force was test-flying an antigravity craft surfaced on the night of December 29, 1980. Betty Cash, age fifty-one, her friend Vickie Landrum, age fifty-seven, and Vickie's seven-year-old grandson Colby had been driving through the Pinewoods area near the Houston, Texas, suburb of Huffman, located about twenty miles north of Johnson Space Center.[6,7] About 9 p.m., they spotted a fiery object high in the sky that quickly descended to treetop level. Eventually, it came to hover above the road. They drove to within 130 feet of it and got out of their car for several minutes to watch it. The craft was hovering about 70 feet off the ground. It was diamond-shaped, tapering to rounded points at the top and bottom, and was about the size of a city water tower (about 20 feet in diameter; figure 9.1). Every so often, a reddish orange cone of flames would roar out of its bottom, as if from a giant blowtorch or rocket. At such times, the craft would loft into the air about 25 feet, only to gradually descend once again. The flames brightly lit the surrounding pine woods and bathed them in an intense heat, turning the nearby pine branches brown and badly damaging the road's blacktop surface.

Frightened by what they saw, Landrum and her grandson got back in the car, and were joined some time later by Cash. The car door became so hot from the radiation that Cash could not touch it with her bare hands, but instead used her coat to grab the handle. After about ten minutes, the object rose up and once again hovered over the trees. At that point, the three witnesses noticed that the vehicle was approached by almost two dozen twin-rotor military helicopters, later identified as CH-47 Chinooks and some of the Bell-Huey type. They appeared to be escorting the craft. The three concluded that they had witnessed a test flight of some kind of advanced antigravity military aircraft. One year later, Cash met a Chinook helicopter pilot who admitted to her in front of a witness that on the night of the encounter he had been called to fly to the area to check on a UFO that was in trouble near Huffman.

The description Cash and Landrum gave suggests they had observed a test flight of a prototype microwave vehicle similar in some respects to the Project Skyvault craft. The highly incandescent reddish orange "flames" were likely the exhaust from a flame-jet high-voltage generator adjusted for incomplete combustion. As mentioned in chapter 2, Brown had proposed a 10-foot-diameter saucer with a downward-pointing flame-jet generator as one version of the vehicle he had planned to research as part of Project Winterhaven. The Winterhaven design may have looked something like the sketch shown in figure 2.11, chapter 2.

The high voltage from this flame-jet generator may have been used to energize high-power Gunn diode oscillators to generate a downward-directed microwave beam of a kind similar to that used in the Project Skyvault saucer. After their encounter, Cash, Landrum, and Colby experienced radiation burn symptoms such as hair loss and inflamed eyes, the sort produced by exposure to an intense beam of microwave radiation. All of them became extremely sick within the next few hours. Of the three, Cash had spent the longest time out of the car (about ten minutes) and, not surprisingly, she had the worst symptoms. Her head and neck were blistered, and soon her eyes swelled shut, fluid seeped from welts on her head and scalp, and she suffered from severe headaches, nausea, vomiting , diarrhea, and body pains. After a couple of days being cared for at Landrum's home, Cash checked into a hospital, where she was treated as a burn victim, remaining for fifteen days. She began losing large patches of skin from her face, her hair began to fall out, and her eyes swelled so badly that she could not see for about a week. After a month in the hospital, she still showed no improvement. Then she developed breast cancer and had to have a mastectomy. She later died at the young age of sixty-nine. Landrum was also losing her hair and her scalp was numb and painful. Colby had problems with his eyes. All three of the victims were treated for radiation poisoning, and doctors listed their condition as life threatening.

Cash and Landrum sued the U.S. government for $20 million in damages, but after dragging on for many years, their case was finally dismissed on the grounds that no such object was owned, operated, or in the inventory of the Air Force, the Army, the Navy, or NASA. The ABC television show Nightline in 1987 broadcast a recorded statement made by Richard Doty, a special agent with the U.S. Air Force Office of Special Investigations who then named himself "Falcon." Doty claimed that the object Cash and Landrum saw was a captured alien UFO that was being test-flown and had temporarily experienced some flight problems. Quite likely, Doty was dispensing misinformation. A more plausible explanation is that Cash and Landrum encountered a prototype unmanned electrogravitic craft built for the military by an aerospace corporation. Possibly the craft was remotely controlled, and the helicopters were there to observe it and provide military security should the need arise. Had information about Project Skyvault been made public, along with the existence of black projects in microwave phase-conjugate propulsion, perhaps Cash and Landrum would have won their suit.

The severe effects that Cash, Lundrum, and Colby sustained in their encounter suggest they were exposed to a very intense microwave beam. This could have occurred if the vehicle's microwave propulsion beam was confined to a narrow angle and had mistakenly "locked on" to the observers and their car. They would have then been exposed to its full intensity. An incident similar to the Cash-Landrum encounter occurred in the late 1980s in the vicinity of Fort Hood, which lies about sixty miles north of Austin, Texas. A woman and her daughters, who had been observing a glowing, hovering object, became badly burned and suffered serious health effects. The victims subsequently sued the military for damages.

If the propulsion beam from these craft was being properly controlled to fan out to a wide enough area on the ground so that its radiation level per unit area was at a safe level, then a brief exposure would not be hazardous. Even so, a pilot should not fly a beam propulsion vehicle in a populated area so that accidents of this nature are avoided. If anything, these casualties of microwave exposure should be a warning to hobbyists that they are taking a serious health risk when they experiment with high-intensity microwave beams in the kilowatt range.

9.3 ▪ TRIANGULAR CRAFT

During the late 1980s, there were numerous sightings of hovering vehicles that resembled the B-2 bomber. For example, in 1987, a year prior to the B-2's unveiling, hundreds of people living in Wythe County, Virginia, claimed that on several occasions they had seen a triangular-shaped black craft hovering in the night sky, mostly between the hours of eight and ten. Many who had seen the craft concluded that there was military involvement. One resident said that low-flying jets flew until 7 p.m. and then the "saucers" took over. Another witness had observed these objects flying a certain pattern at night and said that at the first crack of dawn, helicopters would fly the same pattern. Observers said the strange flat craft made no noise and in some cases hovered motionless in the air.

Danny Gordon, news director of radio station WYVE in Wytheville, Virginia, was one witness to the phenomenon. Regarding the similarity to the B-2 bomber, he stated, "Unequivocally, undoubtedly it was the same aircraft. I saw it, a lady in Fort Chiswell saw it . . . the same aircraft, flat-wing V-shape. This is not all the UFOs we've seen here, but this is one type, and I believe it's connected."[8]

Gordon said that several nights earlier he had paced a similar aircraft while driving his car at a speed of twenty-five miles per hour. He said he did not know how anything that big could travel at such a slow speed and not fall out of the sky. He concluded that the stealth bomber was being tested in their area by the Air Force and that other aircraft also observed might be part of the experiment. While Air Force authorities have acknowledged that the B-2 is a relatively slow-moving aircraft, such sightings lead us to believe that it also has the ability to hover totally motionless. If so, then this may have been accomplished along the lines suggested in chapter 5, that is, by applying high-voltage

AC across ceramic dielectrics oriented vertically at spaced intervals within its wing. The propulsion method would have been similar to that used in Brown's vertical-lift electrokinetic apparatus, and as concluded earlier, this type of AC field propulsion would have generated soliton beams beneath the craft.

These sightings might not all be B-2 craft. U.S. Air Force officials acknowledge that diamond- and triangular-shaped vehicles are "the trend now."[9] According to Aviation Week, one of these high-altitude military craft has earned the name Pulser because it is seen as a single bright light that sometimes pulses. The craft emits no engine noise or sonic boom, yet it has been seen crossing the night sky at extremely high velocities, exceeding the speed of conventional aircraft. Speaking about aircraft under development in U.S. black projects, the magazine reported in 1990:

> In addition, there is substantial evidence that another family of craft exists that relies on exotic propulsion and aerodynamic schemes not fully understood at this time . . . Over the past 13 months, large, triangular wing-shaped aircraft characterized by a relatively quiet propulsion system have been the object of at least 11 sightings near Edwards Air Force Base, Calif., and one near Fresno, Calif. These are supported by additional reports of similar vehicles seen and heard around remote central Nevada communities near government ranges operated by the Energy Dept. and the Air Force.
> Possibly prototypes or concept demonstrators of the Air Force B-2 or Navy A-12, the fairly flat, triangular-shaped vehicles have a rounded nose, rounded wingtips and probably no vertical tail surfaces. The flying wings' trailing edges may be slightly curved, but definitely are not sawtooth-shaped like those of the Air Force's B-2 bomber, according to reports received so far. One observer in Nevada described the shape as "like a manta ray."[10]

Very large aircraft whose shape fits this general description have been seen in the Hudson Valley region, thirty to sixty miles northeast of New York City.[11] Beginning in the spring of 1983 and continuing for a period of several years, tens of thousands of people on various occasions saw an immense craft described as looking like a boomerang-shaped flying wing with a rounded prow and measuring about 300 feet from wingtip to wingtip. It was usually seen flying at night with lights along its leading wing edge and at various locations beneath its body. These would periodically turn off or sometimes change in color. The craft was often seen hovering noiselessly or moving very slowly, about twenty to forty miles per hour, but occasionally it would accelerate to enormous speeds, disappearing to a point on the horizon in the blink of an eye. Either this was an exotic craft that the United States was secretly developing or one must presume it was an alien vessel. Clearly, to be able to hover noiselessly and undergo such enormous accelerations, the craft does not use a conventional means of propulsion.

Triangular-shaped craft have been sited hovering over various parts of Belgium on numerous occasions since 1989, with witnesses also numbering into the tens of thousands. Eyewitness accounts and photographs suggest the shape shown in figure 9.2. On top, the craft have a dome fitted with several windows. Viewed from beneath, they have bright white circular regions at each corner and a single red light near their center. Could these corner "lights" be luminous emissions from microwave horns that are part of a microwave phase-conjugation resonator system projecting down beams that support and propel the craft?

The craft were observed to hover, sometimes to move slowly horizontally, and at other times to accelerate vertically or horizontally to great velocities. On one occasion, after one of the craft was detected by radar, the Belgian government scrambled two F-16 fighters, but they were unable to apprehend it. The craft exhibited erratic changes in direction and very rapid linear accelerations. In one case, a craft changed its altitude by 9,500 feet in just five seconds, an acceleration of more than 24 g. This would have been fatal to any pilot if it had been a vehicle operating on the conventional jet-thrust principle. Although the spacecraft attained a velocity of nearly twice the speed of sound, no sonic boom was heard. Quite possibly, this was a military test of a beam propulsion vehicle of the kind developed in Project Skyvault.

9.4 ▪ CRASH RECOVERY OPERATIONS

The early research efforts leading to Project Skyvault began not long after July 1947, when an extraterrestrial spacecraft is reputed to have crashed near Roswell, New Mexico. Shortly after the crash, the site was secured by a top-secret military task force, and the scattered wreckage, including the vehicle's occupants, was subsequently removed to U.S. military laboratories for analysis. Similar operations were conducted in subsequent years to recover other downed alien vehicles. Although the military has made a concerted effort to keep knowledge of these incidents from the public, much information has since come to light as a result of research by dedicated investigators. This has been summarized in books such as Behind the Flying Saucers, The Roswell Incident, UFO Crash at Aztec, Above Top Secret, Alien Contact, and The Truth About the UFO Crash at Roswell.[12–17] These recovery operations are said to have resulted in an accelerated program to develop antigravity propulsion technology under projects code-named Y and Redlight. Since Project Skyvault and other advanced propulsion technology development programs were initiated around this time, it should be helpful to review something about these UFO crashes.

The first incident is believed to have taken place on the night of July 4, 1947, when a wedge-shaped spacecraft measuring about 15 by 25 feet crashed about thirty-five miles north of Roswell, New Mexico. Some say that two crashes actually took place at the same time but separated by some hundreds of miles. A few months later, in October, a 36-foot-diameter, dome-shaped craft is said to have crashed in Paradise Valley, Arizona. Then in March 1948, a 100-foot-diameter disc reportedly crashed in Aztec, New Mexico, and in July of that same year, a

90-foot-diameter disc is said to have come down near the Sabinas River in Mexico, thirty miles southwest of Laredo, Texas. In UFO Crash at Aztec, UFO researchers William S. Steinman and Wendelle C. Stevens estimate that as many as sixteen UFO craft may have crashed at various locations around the world between 1947 and 1986.[18]

Although the U.S. government has officially maintained that UFOs do not exist, a secret memo dated September 23, 1947, indicates that the military was taking this matter very seriously. It was written by General Nathan Twining, commander of the Army Air Force's Air Materiel Command at Wright Field, to the Air Technical Intelligence Command in Dayton, Ohio. Excerpts from this memo, printed in Aviation Week & Space Technology, read as follows:

> 1. As requested by AC/AS-2 there is presented below the considered opinion of this Command concerning the so-called "Flying Discs" . . .
> 2. It is the opinion that:
>   a. The phenomenon reported is something real and not visionary or fictitious.
>   b. There are objects probably approximately the shape of a disc, of such appreciable size as to appear to be as large as man-made aircraft.
>   c. There is a possibility that some of the incidents may be caused by natural phenomenon, such as meteors.
>   d. The reported operating characteristics such as extreme rates of climb, maneuverability (particularly in roll), and action which must be considered evasive when sighted or contacted by friendly aircraft and radar, lend belief to the possibility that some of the objects are controlled either manually, automatically or remotely.[19]

Also, a twenty-six-page classified report issued in 1948 by the Air Technical Intelligence Command stated:

> It must be accepted that some type of flying objects have been observed, although their identification and origin are not discernible. In the interests of national defense it would be unwise to overlook the possibility that some of these objects may be of foreign origin . . . if it is firmly > indicated that there is no domestic explanation, the objects are a threat and warrant more active efforts of identification and interception.[20]

Additional confirmation about the saucer crashes and the government's secret R&D involvement in the matter has come from a conversation that Wilbert B. Smith had in September 1950 with electrical engineer Dr. Robert Sarbacher, who was then serving as a consultant to the Research and Development Board, headed by Dr. Vannevar Bush. Smith, who was a senior radio engineer with the Canadian Department of Transportation, had read the account in Scully's book about the Aztec, New Mexico, saucer crash and secret government retrieval operation and wanted to verify if there was any truth to it, so he contacted Sarbacher through the Canadian embassy in Washington. According to Smith's handwritten notes, their conversation went as follows:

> Smith: . . . I have read Scully's book on the saucers and would like to know how much of it is true.
> Sarbacher: The facts reported in the book are substantially correct.
> Smith: Then the saucers do exist?
> Sarbacher: Yes: they exist.
> Smith: Do they operate as Scully suggests on magnetic principles?
> Sarbacher: We have not been able to duplicate their performance.
> Smith: Do they come from some other planet?
> Sarbacher: All we know is, we didn't make them, and it's pretty certain they didn't originate on earth.
> Smith: I understand the whole subject is classified.
> Sarbacher: Yes, it is classified two points higher even than the H-bomb. In fact, it is the most highly classified subject in the US government at the present time.
> Smith: May I ask the reason for the classification?
> Sarbacher: You may ask, but I can't tell you.[21]

Note that Sarbacher's comment about the classification level was made two years before the H-bomb had been detonated. On November 21, 1950, Smith sent an intra-departmental memo to the Controller of Telecommunications of the Canadian Department of Transportation that summarized some of what he had learned from Sarbacher. The memo, which is reproduced in appendix F, was marked TOP SECRET but was downgraded to "confidential" in September 15, 1969. It stated:

> a. The matter is the most highly classified subject in the United States government, rating two points higher than the H-bomb.
> b. Flying saucers exist.
> c. Their modus operandi is unknown but a concentrated effort is being made by a small group headed by Doctor Vannevar Bush.
> d. The entire matter is considered by the United States authorities to be of tremendous significance.[22]

In a response to inquiries made in 1983 by UFO researcher William Steinman, Sarbacher wrote a letter confirming that the U.S. government had recovered crashed flying saucers, along with the bodies of their occupants.[23]

The top-secret administrative group that Sarbacher said was headed by Bush was later discovered to have the code name MJ-12, or Majestic 12. This group of twelve individuals is said to have been formed September 24, 1947, under the authority of President Harry S Truman for the purpose of investigating UFOs, reporting the findings to the president, forming policies on the basis of those findings, and implementing policies that had received presidential approval. A photocopy of the memorandum Truman wrote to authorize its formation is displayed in appendix F.

Programs to analyze the crashed saucers and to attempt to duplicate their technology came under the direction of the Research and Development Board, which, in turn, reported directly to MJ-12. The Research and Development Board, which Sarbacher was consulting for in 1950, was organized by Bush in 1947 at the time that MJ-12 was formed. Under Bush's direction, this board headed up the R&D organizations of three branches of the military: Army Research and Development, Air Force Research and Development, and the Office of Naval Research. Brown's electrogravitics technology, which was evaluated by the Office of Naval Research in 1952, was probably closely scrutinized by this overseeing organization. Bush had previously headed the Office of Scientific Research and Development, which administered the Manhattan Project and other top-secret wartime efforts, such as the development of radar and the proximity fuse.

On November 18, 1952, two weeks after his election, President-elect Dwight D. Eisenhower is said to have been briefed on MJ-12 and the crashed saucer retrieval operations. In 1984, television producer Jaime Shandera and UFOlogist William Moore obtained a document through intelligence contacts that they believed to be the top-secret "eyes only" document used in that briefing. Although some doubt whether the document is in fact genuine,[24–26] a Washington Post article does confirm that President-elect Eisenhower had received a military briefing on November 18, 1952, the same date stated on the MJ-12 briefing.[27] Moreover, the existence of a subsequent briefing with MJ-12 is corroborated by a memo that Moore and UFO researcher and physicist Dr. Stanton Friedman obtained from the National Archives through a Freedom of Information Act request. The memo, dated July 14, 1954, was written by Robert Cutler, special assistant to President Eisenhower, and sent to General Nathan Twining, one of the individuals claimed to belong to MJ-12. The memo, which concerned the NSC/MJ-12 Special Studies Project, states, "The President has decided that the MJ-12/SSP briefing should take place during the already scheduled White House meeting of July 16 rather than following it as previously intended."[28] The NSC designation refers to the presidential office's National Security Council, which was also created in 1947. MJ-12 is said to operate under the NSC as an unacknowledged subcommittee called the Special Studies Group, with a current membership of thirty-three.

9.5 ▪ ART'S PARTS REVERSE ENGINEERED

The Coast to Coast radio talk show, and in particular Art Bell, who served as its host for many years, is well known to many. The show's favorite topics have been UFOs and alien encounters. In April 1996, one of the show's listeners, a man who asked to remain anonymous, mailed to Bell a number of metallic artifacts that he said had been retrieved from the exterior of an alien spacecraft that crashed in 1947 between White Sands and Socorro, New Mexico.[29] He said that his grandfather had gathered the materials while he was a member of the military security team connected with the retrieval cleanup operation and had given them to him before he died in 1974.

The parts, which have come to be known as Art's Parts, were extensively discussed on Coast to Coast and pictures of them for some time had been posted on Bell's webpage. One of the two shipments of the alleged alien artifacts that were sent consisted of two irregularly shaped pieces of metal measuring approximately 6 by 3 centimeters and 5 by 2 centimeters, respectively, both having a thickness of 3 to 4 millimeters. These were alleged to have been taken from the exterior underside of the craft and were believed to have formed a shell-like shield of sorts.

In the following months, the fragments were analyzed using a scanning electron microscope outfitted for energy-dispersive spectroscopy.[30] The results for the two hull fragments were quite interesting. Analysis showed that they consisted of twenty-five well-defined layers alternating between a thick layer of magnesium-zinc (97 to 97.5 percent magnesium and 2 to 3 percent zinc) and a thin layer of pure bismuth. The metals were of exceptional purity. The magnesium-zinc layers ranged in thickness from 100 to 200 microns (0.1 to 0.2 mm), and the bismuth layers ranged in thickness from 1 to 4 microns. When examined in cross-section, it was apparent that the layer interfaces were not even but rather contained microscopic undulations.

Some researchers found it unusual that the material would jump around when exposed to the high-voltage field of a Van de Graaff generator. However, American research technologist Nicholas Reiter, who conducted a similar test, says there is nothing unusual about this since any metal fragment would similarly dance around in a 200-kilovolt AC field.[31] To check for any electrogravitic force effects, he exposed the artifacts to DC voltage potentials in the range of 15 to 50 kilovolts, but observed no weight change as measured with a laboratory digital milligram balance. Thus, contrary to widely publicized claims, there is no evidence to date that the fragments might lose weight when subjected to high voltage potentials.

Linda Moulton Howe, an American investigative journalist and documentary producer who was investigating the nature of the fragments, interviewed a large number of metallurgic experts from various companies and scientific institutes, including aerospace and defense companies. None had heard of such a material, and they didn't understand its purpose. Howe also wrote letters to various agencies like the National Science Foundation to get information about the material. A foundation scientist working in the Division of Materials Research said that he was unaware of any research into such a material. A computer search of the foundation's database on materials consisting of bismuth, magnesium, and zinc turned up nothing.

However, insights into the nature of this bismuth-layered material may be gained by considering recent investigations into negative index of refraction materials. In 2005, Professors Victor Podolskiy and Evgenii Narimanov and graduate student Leonid Alekseyev, working at Oregon State University and Princeton University, respectively, announced their discovery that a thin layer of monocrystalline bismuth exhibited a negative index of refraction at microwave frequencies, making it the only known, naturally occurring substance to exhibit such a property.[32–34] They sandwiched a 4.5-micron-thick layer of monocrystalline bismuth between two metal plates, as shown in figure 9.3. In this arrangement, the semimetallic bismuth acts as a dielectric and the flanking metal layers act as waveguide walls. When a 5,000-gigahertz microwave beam (60-micron wavelength) was directed into the bismuth layer, the beam was found to refract negatively. That is, they found that over a narrow band of wavelengths, ranging from about 53 to 63 microns, the bismuth exhibited a negative index of refraction.

Bismuth achieves negative refraction in a manner very different from that of the metamaterials described in chapter 7. Recall that such materials exhibited negative refraction because they had magnetic and electric resonances near the same frequency, creating a frequency range over which their permittivity, ε, and permeability, μ, would simultaneously attain negative values. With ε and μ simultaneously negative, the refractive index would also be simultaneously negative. However, bismuth is nonmagnetic and, hence, has no magnetic resonances. However, theory shows that a dielectric can exhibit a negative refraction index if the material has a permittivity anisotropy, that is, different values of permittivity for different wave propagation directions relative to the dielectric crystal axis, and if permittivity in one of these directions becomes negative over a specific frequency range while the permittivity in the other directions remains positive. Bismuth has such a property (see text box).

Why Bismuth Exhibits a Negative Index of Refraction

Although its population of free electrons is much smaller than that of most metals, bismuth has what is termed an electron mass anisotropy, in which the effective mass of its free electrons is lower parallel to its trigonal axis as opposed to perpendicular to its axis. Since these free electrons behave as a plasma, which has a specific resonant frequency, this anisotropy causes the plasma frequency to be lower in the direction parallel to the bismuth layer, as compared with the plasma frequency for oscillations perpendicular to the plane of this layer (parallel to the trigonal axis; i.e., $f_{||} < f_{perp}$). Since the dielectric constant for bismuth is determined both by the value of its electron plasma frequency and the frequency of the exciting beam, this differing plasma frequency causes the permittivity parallel to the bismuth layer ($\varepsilon_{||}$) to be more negative than the permittivity perpendicular to the bismuth layer (ε_{perp}). Consequently, when the bismuth is excited at frequencies between these two plasma frequencies, the permittivity in the direction parallel to the layer will be negative when the permittivity perpendicular to the layer is still positive (i.e., $\varepsilon_{||} < 0$, $\varepsilon_{perp} > 0$), which provides the necessary condition for the index of refraction to be negative (see figure 9.4).

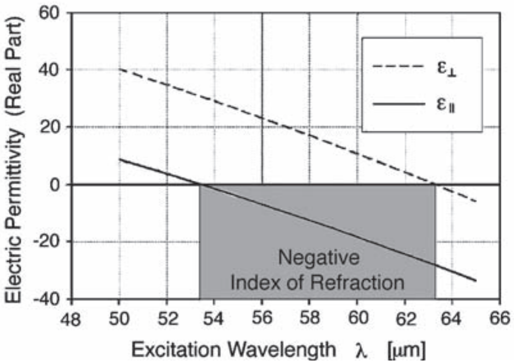

Figure 9.4. Electric permittivity (real part) plotted as a function of excitation wavelength. The solid line charts the component parallel to the bismuth layer and the dashed line charts the component perpendicular to this layer. Negative index of refraction is exhibited in the range in which $\varepsilon_{//} < 0$ and $\varepsilon_{perp} > 0$.

Interestingly, the "hull fragments" among Art's Parts consisted of bismuth layers having a thickness range (1–4 microns) only slightly thinner than that tested by the Oregon State–Princeton team. One might then guess that the magnesium-zinc layers in the Art's Parts fragments had the function of acting as metal waveguide walls around the bismuth layers. This would ensure that microwaves propagating within the bismuth layers would be confined to those layers. Magnesium is a relatively good electric conductor, so it would serve as a good metal to use for a waveguide wall. It also has the advantage that it is lighter and stronger than aluminum. Negative refraction should characterize bismuth layers that are even as thin as 1 micron. Although the layer thickness is a factor in determining the exact value of the permittivity, it does not affect the values of the electron plasma frequencies along the two bismuth crystal axes. Thus, the bismuth-layered samples in the Art's Parts collection would also be expected to exhibit negative refraction of a 5,000-gigahertz beam.

As mentioned in chapter 7, metamaterials having a negative index of refraction are also capable of developing a strong repulsive force when exposed to a microwave beam. The same may be true of bismuth films, so it is possible that the layered material would develop a thrust when excited with 5,000-gigahertz microwave radiation. This could be easily checked in a laboratory. An Art's Parts hull fragment could be mounted on a pendulum or on a torsion balance and exposed to a high-power terahertz beam. A 100-watt free-electron laser that has been tuned to a 5,000-gigahertz frequency might serve as an adequate beam source. If a thrust effect was found, it would be the first time that such an effect has been discovered, since to date no research group has considered looking for such a beam thrust effect in layered bismuth. A positive result could help validate the claim that the Art's Parts layered-metal fragments were part of a shield that once covered the underside of a spacecraft and may have been a lofting material that was part of the craft's exotic electrogravitic field propulsion system.*

One would expect a thrust response to occur in a direction perpendicular to the bismuth C_3 trigonal axis. In the case of the sample tested by the Oregon State–Princeton team, such a thrust would occur parallel to the layer plane. If the intention was instead to produce a force perpendicular to the layer plane, that is, perpendicular to the spacecraft hull, the C_3 trigonal axis would need to be oriented in the plane of the bismuth layer instead of perpendicular to its plane. It would be interesting to discover how the trigonal crystal axis is oriented in the Art's Parts hull artifacts.

9.6 ■ PROJECT REDLIGHT

In the years immediately following the first saucer recoveries, MJ-12 ran a super-secret investigation program that concentrated primarily on analysis of the saucers, with the hope of learning something about their power source, mode of propulsion, instrumentation, and weaponry. In parallel with this effort, autopsies were performed on the saucer's occupants to learn something about their physiology. Information obtained from reliable eyewitnesses indicates that the recovered discs and occupants have been stored and analyzed at a number of secret facilities that include Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, in Dayton, Ohio; Kirtland Air Force Base and the Sandia Laboratory complex in Albuquerque, New Mexico; and a highly restricted area on the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) Reservation, in southern Nevada. Here again, we encounter the Wright-Patterson connection, although artifacts that were in storage there are believed to have been transferred to the Kirtland-Sandia complex when the Department of Special Studies at Wright Air Development Center was moved there in 1956.[35] Substantial information about a program to analyze and even test-fly some captured saucers is found in the "above top secret" Report No. 13 of Project Blue Book, Blue Book being a U.S. Air Force project established to document and analyze UFO sightings. Steinman and Stevens, who summarize this report in UFO Crash at Aztec, received this information from a witness who inadvertently reviewed the document in 1977 while working as an information analyst at a highly secure Royal Air Force/U.S. Air Force radio espionage facility in Chicsands, England.[36] The front cover of this 624-page bound document was dated 1953 with a 1963 date in parentheses, indicating that it was later updated with penciled annotations. A length of red tape indicating code-red security measures was stretched diagonally across its front from corner to corner, and the cover was stamped in red ink, TOP SECRET—NEED TO KNOW ONLY—CRYPTO CLEARANCE 14 REQUIRED. The top-secret compartmentalized clearance the report demanded was higher than that of the Blue Book management office staff, who were cleared only up to the secret level. This would explain why Project Blue Book itself has no record of Report No. 13, even though its inventory includes status reports numbered 12 and 14.

*In August 2006, I contacted members of the Oregon State–Princeton team to see if they knew of anyone who had observed a microwave beam repulsion phenomenon in layered bismuth. They said they did not know of anyone who had investigated this, but indicated interest in my suggestion that such an effect might be present. They requested I send anything I may have published on this. However, after I outlined to them how an experiment might be easily carried out and suggested mutual collaboration on the project, they mysteriously broke off contact. My subsequent e-mails to them went unanswered.

According to the Air Force analyst, Report No. 13 reviewed the U.S. government's official procedures concerning downed UFOs and UFO close encounters. It also summarized what the Air Force knew about crashed discs, their power systems, and their weaponry, and it included photographs of alien craft, crash debris, and the bodies of some of the craft's occupants. Also of interest, the report described a project called Redlight, whose purpose was to test the propulsion and weapons systems of retrieved saucers and to examine various pieces of hardware recovered from the crafts. This operation was carried out in the highly restricted one-hundred-square-mile UFO research facility located in Nevada in the north-central part of the three-thousand-square-mile AEC Reservation. The facility was said to harbor at least three alien saucers. One was dismantled, and the other two were in good enough shape that they could be made flyable, although one of the two was said to have later exploded in flight with two U.S. pilots aboard.

Based on information given in Report No. 13 and from eyewitness accounts, the following is known about the highly secret Nevada facility.[37] Variously known as Area 51 or Dreamland, it is situated in the Groom Lake area northwest of Las Vegas. It is the most heavily secured area in the United States. It lies inside the guarded perimeter of the existing AEC nuclear-testing reservation and Air Force weapons practice range. This dry lake site is screened on all sides by a mountain range, and this is ringed with electronic detectors, including infrared, motion, and ammonia detectors, which are so-called people sniffers. The area itself is surrounded by three additional defense perimeters. Security teams in helicopters and planes are on twenty-four-hour alert to respond to any intrusion.

The site was originally a Navy air field installation that was being used as a nuclear weapons storage base. In 1951, the base was put on alert, and all personnel were evacuated except for the medical personnel, who were restricted to the hospital facility. The Navy then brought in a Seabee construction battalion and, over a six- to eight-month period, dismantled the base, built underground work facilities, and surmounted them with large aboveground hangars. At the end of 1951, after the work was completed, the Seabees moved out and the Project Redlight personnel moved in. Their ranks grew to eight hundred to one thousand personnel permanently on duty and all living on the site. A large but undetermined number of top scientists having very high security clearances were reported to come and go from this maximum security area. Some had been formerly associated with the Manhattan Project.

Nevada residents living in the vicinity of Area 51 have seen disc-shaped craft being tested there from the 1950s to the present. In their book, Steinman and Stevens described several cases in which hovering, disc-shaped aircraft were seen to be test-flown in the Area 51 vicinity.[38] One story concerns a Navaho Indian who was backpacking in a canyon that ran down into the AEC Reservation area (date unknown).

After having camped the previous night in the canyon, he had awoken and had just finished preparing his pack for the hike ahead when a helicopter approached. It was broadcasting warnings from a loudspeaker cautioning anybody in the canyon area to make his presence known so that he could be moved to safety and explaining that a military test was scheduled to be conducted that would be very dangerous. The helicopter returned fifteen minutes later broadcasting the same message. Feeling safe among the rocks, the Indian remained hidden and waited to see what would happen. About a half hour later, two helicopters came into view flying up the canyon about 500 feet apart. They escorted between them a dark gray, metallic, disc-shaped craft that had a raised dome at its center. Ten minutes after the three had passed, the two helicopters flew back the way they had come, but without the saucer. The saucer appeared some time later as it flew very fast and silently down the middle of the canyon, retracing its original path of entry.

Another story concerns an Air Force fighter pilot who was part of the Tactical Air Command Combat Squadron and had been taking part in a “red flag” war game exercise that was being conducted in an area adjacent to the AEC Reservation. The pilot accidentally flew his jet across a corner of the reservation and happened to pass just north of the Area 51 region. At that time, he saw below him to the south a 60-foot-diameter, circular, disc-shaped craft in flight. At that moment, he was hailed on the open emergency channel of his radio, told to abandon his mission, and ordered to fly directly to Nellis Air Force Base, where he was told to land. Once on the ground, he was taken into custody and escorted to a security office for interrogation. He was released two days later, only after pretending to be convinced that the disc-shaped object he had seen was merely a water tower.

Yet another story concerns a man who during the early 1960s performed top-secret radio work for the Air Force at Area 51. He reported seeing one unconventional aircraft that was being flight-tested there under Project Redlight. The craft was 20 to 30 feet in diameter and pewter colored. He didn’t see the craft in operation since at those times he was brought indoors for security reasons. However, he did note that, unlike conventional craft, it made no engine sound when it took off or landed.

Aircraft of nonconventional design such as the stealth bomber, stealth fighter, and Navy A-12 fighter have all been air-tested at Area 51. So, quite possibly, there is a close relation between Project Redlight and the development of such advanced aircraft. This area also may have served as the test site for the discs developed in Project Skyvault.

Another sighting of a very large, 200-foot-diameter craft was reported by Frank Batts of Santa Barbara, California. Writer George Balanus summarized Batts's story as follows.[39] On the evening of April 30, 1997, Batts and his friend Joe had set out on an expedition to Area 51 in the hope of viewing some of the unusual hypersonic vehicles often seen in that vicinity by UFO watchers. About 10:20 p.m., they had set off to find the landmark known as "the black mailbox," which is located along Highway 375 about twenty miles southwest of Rachel, Nevada. The area where most viewing enthusiasts camped out was about eight miles from there, away from the main highway, but Batts and Joe lost their way and did not find the black mailbox. Instead, they ended up at a spot on the north side of the Area 51 range, opposite from where UFO buffs normally congregated. This northern spot was known as the "back door" of the installation. It lay much closer, about seven miles from the edge of the Area 51 facility. Flight testing had been conducted in that area in the past, but locals reported that tests had supposedly ceased there for some time.

Batts and Joe had parked on the shoulder of the road and were facing out into the desert. After about an hour, they saw a blue ball appear above the mountainside, hover, and then dance about for about two minutes before disappearing below the ridge. This sounds very much like a plasma ball test that was sighted in 1993 in the Superstition Mountains twenty-five miles east of Phoenix.[40]

After the blue ball had vanished, they noted red, yellow, white, and blue lights still glowing out in the desert 175 to 200 yards from their location. Sometimes the red lights flashed and sometimes they stayed constant like the other lights. The two men thought they were observing a building at the base, but after about an hour and a half, what they thought was a building suddenly lifted slowly off the ground and hovered. At that point, they realized that what they were seeing was not a building. White light reflecting off the desert floor illuminated the underside of the craft, revealing it to be a very large silver saucer. They estimated that the disc was about 200 feet across. It had curved upper and lower hulls with a bank of red and orange lights around its middle. For about an hour and fifteen minutes, they watched it maneuver from side to side and up and down. Eventually, it receded and finally disappeared over a distant mountain range.

During the sighting, Batts tried to operate his camera, but it wouldn't work. They also tried the car radio but got only a high-pitched whining sound, whereas before and after the sighting they were able to tune in a radio station.

9.7 ■ THE SPORT MODEL

Robert Lazar, a former employee of Los Alamos National Laboratory, claims that in December 1988, the Office of Naval Intelligence gave him a compartmentalized clearance thirty-four levels above a top-secret "Q" clearance and employed him at the highly secret "S-4" test facility located about fifteen miles south of Area 51. He says that he was hired to study the power source of a captured alien flying saucer and try to figure out how it functioned.[41,42] Four months later, having become disenchanted with his work and concerned that such important scientific discoveries were being kept secret from the American public, he broke his vows of secrecy and began describing his experiences to friends. He led them on night outings to remote spots near Area 51 to view some of these captured UFOs being test-flown. Later, he appeared on a local Las Vegas television news broadcast to relate his experiences and present some insights into the propulsion hardware on the craft he had been assigned to. Subsequently, he lectured at a number of UFO conferences and also put up a Web site on the subject. His description of the propulsion unit is of particular interest because it sounds in many ways similar to the microwave propulsion system developed in Project Skyvault.

Gene Huff, who has socialized with Lazar since the late 1980s and knew him during the period when he was hired to work at S-4, has written an interesting biography that corroborates many aspects of Lazar's story.[43] However, others have come to mistrust Lazar's claims, considering the large number of contradictions in his story as well as statements he has made that appear to indicate a substantial lack of knowledge of basic physics. Several of these critiques appear on the Internet website www.dreamlandresort.com/area5V.[44] Nevertheless, the gravity wave propulsion beam technology that Lazar refers to comes sufficiently close to the field propulsion ideas reportedly developed in Project Skyvault, so it is worth summarizing his story, although, as will be pointed out, many of his claims appear to be disinformation that may have been planted to protect the technology's secrecy.

Lazar says that while working at the S-4 test site near the dry bed of Papoose Lake, he was shown a 52-foot-diameter spacecraft that he nicknamed the Sport Model (see figure 9.5). He says he was told that the craft was powered by an "antimatter reactor" located at its center. He claims that the reactor was designed to emit bursts of positrons 7.46 times per second, which, in turn, would generate bursts of type-A "gravitational" microwaves that he terms Gravity A waves. He says that these gravity waves would travel up the vertical conduit attached to the top of the reactor, where they would become amplified in intensity. This conduit, which is said to be about 8 centimeters in diameter, could act as a microwave waveguide and could serve as a microwave amplifier, just as Lazar claims, provided that its length was properly matched to the microwave wavelength. However, from Lazar's description, it is not entirely clear whether he believes these to be pure gravity waves or electromagnetic waves that have gravitational effects. Indeed, a waveguide would be unable to contain a pure gravity wave of the sort commonly known to physics. Such waves should freely pass through waveguide walls without reflecting from them, much like Podkletnov's gravity impulse beam did. If the microwave emissions from the Sport Model's reactor are able to be contained by a waveguide, then they cannot be considered exclusively gravitational.

In fact, at one UFO seminar in 1993, Lazar disclosed his belief that gravity is electromagnetic in nature but that it is an electromagnetic wave of a particular microwave frequency, which he did not wish to disclose at the time. Yet, in my opinion, it is a major error to assume that gravity is electromagnetic in nature or to suggest that the electric or magnetic field itself produces gravitational effects. It would instead be more reasonable to postulate that electric and gravity potential fields are coupled and that electromagnetic waves and electric shock discharges are accompanied by a distinct gravity wave component. To refer to the craft's microwave emissions as gravity waves per se and to claim that such gravitational effects manifest only at a specific frequency, in my view is rather outlandish. Recall that in chapter 7 we learned that Project Skyvault scientists found that when microwave beams were tuned to specific frequencies, they were able to strongly interact with matter and produce strong electrogravitic repelling forces. Also, we learned that metamaterials that have resonant frequencies in the microwave range exhibit strong repulsion forces when beams are tuned to frequencies slightly above these resonances. Thus, frequency is critical to obtaining a maximal repelling force from a microwave beam, but not the way Lazar seems to imply.*

So if we discount Lazar's contention that the so-called reactor is generating gravity waves (his Gravity A waves)—and we will discover that there is good reason to ignore such an assertion—we are then left with the idea that this is essentially a microwave generator, hence, the equivalent of the Gunn diode oscillator cavity on the Project Skyvault vehicle. Lazar did not describe the inside of the vertical waveguide, but if it were to have a series of properly spaced ringlike cavities along its length, it could function as a klystron, that is, a linear microwave generator. As charged particles (positrons or electrons) would shoot along the length of the waveguide and move past the cavities, they would set up microwave oscillations in the cavities that would become progressively more intense as the end of the tube was approached.

*Lazar suggested that one could infer the microwave frequency from the dimensions of the waveguide tube. Theorizing that its inside diameter is somewhat less than its 8-centimeter outside diameter, say 5 centimeters, and that a full wavelength fits across this dimension, this would imply a frequency of about 6 gigahertz (or 3 gigahertz for a half-wavelength fit).

However, one has great difficulty believing Lazar's story that this gravity wave generator is powered by bursts of high-energy positrons emitted from the radioactive decay of a slab of exotic metal located at the bottom of the reactor. For instance, in one radio interview, he described having been present when this reactor was being bench-tested with its waveguide tube removed and said that he had been allowed to put his hand over the top of it. If this had been a real high-energy positron beam, no reasonable physicist or engineer would have let him put his hand over it to feel its matter-repelling force field. If Lazar had done so, his hand would have received a severe radiation burn and a dangerously high dose of radiation. Clearly, this would have upset the health and safety people at the laboratory, if the story was true. Also, when positrons annihilate, they produce 1-million-electron-volt gamma rays. Lazar made no mention of such energetic by-products or precautions taken to shield them. More likely, what was coming out of the reactor was a microwave beam emitted by a crystal oscillator, without any accompanying beam of high-energy particles. But even if it had been a microwave beam, the beam power would have had to be sufficiently low so as not to harm him.

The other part of this reactor story that raises doubts is Lazar's claim that this slab of exotic stable metal was composed of element 115 and that these matter-repelling waves were emitted when this element was bombarded with protons, inducing it to transmute into element 116, which then immediately decayed by emitting a positron. He says element 115 is a stable element that does not exist on Earth but is generated in the cores of massive stars many light-years from Earth and that the only available supply of this material on Earth is held under tight security in a supersecret facility in Area 51. He says that only discharges of this normally inaccessible material are able to generate his so-called Gravity A waves used for propelling the disc.

However, in 2004, about fifteen years after Lazar began making claims about this rare element, Russian scientists successfully synthesized small amounts of elements 113 and 115, and four years earlier had created element 116. The problem is that both isotopes of element 115 that they were able to synthesize were unstable. They lasted only for several tens of milliseconds, and they decayed not into element 116 as Lazar claimed, but into element 113, with the emission of an alpha particle. Also, element 116, which Lazar claimed could be momentarily created by bombarding element 115 with a proton, was found to decay, but not by emitting a positron. It too decayed by emitting an alpha particle.[45] It seems, then, that Lazar's antimatter reactor idea is on the rocks, as is his idea for the existence of Gravity B waves, which he claims can be produced only through this 115-to-116 decay process.

This antimatter reactor part of the story was most likely a fabrication included to make the Sport Model field propulsion technology sound very exotic and, hence, not easily duplicable in most laboratories. If we are willing to accept that Lazar actually had worked at this secret Nevada test site, engineers there most probably misinformed him on purpose as to how this microwave oscillator functioned. In this way, the technical details of the disc's operation would be protected in case he decided to rebel and speak out, as he has done. Alternatively, some have suggested that agents may have employed brainwashing techniques to manipulate his mind.[46] Such black-project research facilities are likely in possession of technologies that would allow them to erase specific memories and replace them with false ones, similar to what is portrayed in the movies Total Recall and The Bourne Identity. Area 51 security agents may have felt that they were not breaking the law to use such methods since Lazar says that prior to his employment on the project he had to sign a secrecy agreement waiving his constitutional rights.

Conversations I have had with several people lead me to believe that such abhorrent brainwashing techniques are unfortunately being used. One case concerns an individual who claims to have worked on a highly classified time travel project supposedly conducted on Long Island, near Montauk, as an extension of research done on the highly secret Philadelphia Experiment. I had a chance to talk to him after he had just finished giving a lecture about his unusual experience. He believed that he had formerly been director of this time travel project and that, after having had some disagreements with people there, he was subjected to a mind-altering therapy that attempted to erase from his memory experiences he had on the project. He says that he later began to recall these memories after he had a chance street encounter with someone who he claims had once worked under him on that project. He said this began to trigger the suppressed memories.

In his mind, this individual thoroughly believed that what he was saying was the truth, that he had directed this project and that it had been capable of temporarily transporting people into other time periods. However, it was obvious to me that what he was saying was a complete fabrication. I believe he was correct in stating that he had been the unwilling subject of mind control, but I believe that during his brainwashing session, false memories were implanted in his mind about the existence of this fictitious time travel project and how he had once served as its director. While under hypnotic inducement, he was most likely instructed that he would forget about the mind-control session, but that meeting a certain person in the street would be a trigger that would allow him to begin to remember the implanted memories as well as some of the mind-control session. However, the implanted memories were to be remembered as being events that had actually taken place. Also, he was instructed to believe that the purpose of the mind-control session had been to erase his recollection of those supposed real events (the implanted memories). Perhaps he also was given a subliminal suggestion to write about his implanted experience and to lecture about it. A person who actually believed in his heart that what he was saying was the truth would be the ultimate in misinformation dissemination. Could Robert Lazar have actually had some experiences working on the Sport Model and later undergone similar techniques to implant confusing ideas about the technology?

Lazar's diagram of the reactor depicts a conical structure at the bottom of the chamber that he identifies as the element 115 fuel source, which he says is made up of a stack of thin wafers. In view of the element 115 fiasco, much of what he has described about the reactor should be discounted. If there was such a microwave-emitting structure in the reactor chamber, it would be better construed as a solid-state oscillator similar to an IMPATT or Gunn diode. Its enclosing hemispherical chamber and capping waveguide tube would then form the microwave amplifier duct.

We might guess this crystal oscillator was made of a material dense enough that it could give an unsuspecting person the impression that it was in fact made of an element having an atomic weight of 115. For example, recall from chapter 4 the disclosure by black-project engineers of the development of very dense, radar-absorbing materials containing uranium. Lazar says he was not involved in measuring the atomic mass of the material he worked with but only correlated the data taken by others who reportedly worked on the project before him. These data, then, could have been "cooked" to give Lazar the impression that he was discovering something with an atomic weight of 115. The trick apparently worked, because he wholeheartedly believed them.

Lazar commented that when the reactor was bench-tested with its waveguide tube removed and he was allowed to place his hand over its mouth, he could feel the pressure of the field, which he described as being similar to the repulsion one feels when two like poles of a magnet are brought together. He said that they also played around with the repulsion field by bouncing golf balls off it. The force that he refers to sounds very much like what Tesla says he felt from the radiant energy shocks discharged from his magnifying transmitter. Podkletnov also says that he was able to feel the repulsive field generated by the momentary discharges of his gravity impulse beam. However, both Tesla and Podkletnov were feeling the repulsive force of sawtooth-shaped waves produced by electron shock discharges. Subquantum kinetics predicts that if these were positron shock discharges, they should instead have produced an attractive force. If anything, Lazar's hand should have been sucked into the reactor if it was actually emitting positron discharges. His positron pulse claim is, in my opinion, misinformation that he is perhaps unwittingly disseminating.

To continue the story, Lazar said the gravity wave (i.e., microwave emission) generated in the reactor was piped into three "gravity amplifiers" (i.e., microwave amplifiers) located in the lower compartment of this vehicle, each amplifier measuring 2 feet in diameter and 4 feet in length (figure 9.6). These were equally spaced from one another in a triad arrangement and could be swiveled to aim in any direction. He said the gravity wave (electromagnetic microwave) from the reactor was of too low an amplitude to be effective for propulsion and that it became amplified in the gravity amplifiers into waves powerful enough to propel the craft. Each of these gravity amplifiers would emit a microwave beam downward, which was used to buoy the craft upward. The craft would sit on these beams and tend to bounce around on them in a flight mode he referred to as the "omicron configuration." He said the disc would move forward by focusing one or more of the beams behind it, which would cause the craft to fall forward.

More specifically, Lazar said the gravity amplifiers achieve their lifting force by sending out a microwave beam, the Gravity A wave, toward the Earth's surface and by phase-shifting this wave relative to the microwave propagating up from the Earth, which he termed the "Gravity B wave." His description sounds a lot like that for a microwave phase-conjugate resonator, although described in very vague terms. In other words, his outgoing Gravity A wave would correspond to the outgoing phase-conjugate microwave beam and his incoming Gravity B wave would correspond to the incoming ground-reflected probe beam, which would actually consist of microwaves that had previously originated from the disc's microwave generator (its reactor). The energy in outgoing A wave would be locked in phase with the incoming ground-reflected B wave and would eventually retrace the B wave's scattering path back to the beam's ground target point and then back to the vehicle's central source oscillator. As in the Project Skyvault craft, these incoming and outgoing beams would be focused by some sort of microwave lens.

Clearly, considering the controversy surrounding the veracity of Lazar's statements, it is difficult to pick out fact from fiction. All we can say is that many features that he describes bear a strong resemblance to the Project Skyvault technology. Moreover, we are compelled to accept that the Sport Model or something like it exists since many people claim to have seen from a great distance some sort of unusual levitating craft being test-flown in the vicinity of Area 51. Consequently, to understand how this craft might work, it makes more sense if we disregard the gravity wave mumbo jumbo and reframe Lazar's dialogue in terms of what is already known about microwave phase conjugation.

The gravity amplifier would be the equivalent of the mixer diode cavity in the Skyvault vehicle. Like the Skyvault mixer cavity, each such amplifier is reportedly energized by microwaves from the craft's central microwave source, that is, its reactor and waveguide resonator. Provided that each gravity amplifier contains a polarized dielectric medium, these piped-in microwaves would serve as pump beams, which would interact with the probe beam entering the amplifier (Lazar's gravity B wave) to generate a holographic grating pattern in the dielectric. The pump beams would then interact with the dielectric's grating pattern to produce an outgoing microwave beam that would be the phase conjugate of the incoming probe beam. In describing the amplifiers, Lazar makes no mention of any internal dielectric but does say they contain a series of plates. Perhaps these are dielectrics.

Lazar's gravity amplifiers, then, most likely function as phase-conjugate resonators that allow microwaves from the craft's central microwave source to self-amplify and create powerful soliton faser beams between the craft's mixer diodes and the ground. Provided that the microwaves consist of sawtoothlike shock discharge waveforms, as one may infer from Lazar's description, the soliton beams should create a repulsive force both on their ground surface target and on the craft, which would tend to buoy the craft upward.

Lazar makes a number of statements concerning the nature of gravity that seem to be nonsense and that some have had issues with.[47] For example, he contends that the two gravity waves the craft phases relative to each other to obtain its propulsion, the Gravity A and Gravity

B waves, are actually the results of two very different types of gravity. He identifies the Gravity A wave with the strong nuclear force, the very short-range force that binds protons and neutrons together in the atomic nucleus, and claims that only through the element 115-to-116 antimatter reaction is it possible to release this in the form of a traveling wave having a specific wavelength in the microwave frequency range. He identifies the Gravity B wave with the gravitational force of standard physics, that is, the field that causes celestial bodies to attract one another.

However, to suggest there are two types of gravity and to identify one of them with the strong force sounds absurd, even to the most open-minded of physicists. The idea has no basis in standard physics, nor is such a concept compatible with subquantum kinetics. In subquantum kinetics, nuclear binding arises because nucleons have wavelike electrostatic potential fields in their cores that interlock with one another when the particles are in close proximity, that is, close enough to form an atomic nucleus. This subquantum kinetics model of the strong force has been confirmed by particle-scattering experiments.[48] Lazar, however, offers no experimental evidence to support his odd theory of gravity except vague references to the operation of a flying saucer kept in the supersecret S-4 test facility. Considering that one key aspect of his theory has now been disproved, his claim that the Gravity A wave is produced by the spontaneous positron decay of element 116, we may conclude that his gravity wave theory should not be taken seriously or, at least, we should regard it as disinformation that was purposely disseminated by black-project security staff. Along these same lines, we may safely disregard Lazar's statements that the Gravity A wave entering the craft's gravity amplifiers bends space around the disc as it becomes amplified.

Lazar claims that gravity, as observed in nature, which he refers to as the Gravity B field, is in essence electromagnetic and that it specifically involves oscillations in the microwave range. This again is nonsense, apparently interjected to create confusion. The Earth's gravitational field does not oscillate at microwave frequencies. If it did, this would have been widely known to the physics community, since various gravity wave antenna experiments have been conducted over the past thirty-five years, and if we include Brown's gravitoelectric detectors, this work would date back more than seventy years. Lazar's assertion of the Gravity B wave being electromagnetic in character and oscillating at microwave frequencies would make better sense if it was not part of the Earth's natural gravity field, but instead consisted of gravity microwaves that originated from the craft itself; that is, if they radiated from its central reactor, or wave amplifier unit, and then reflected from the ground and happened to return to the craft. Lazar reports that before beginning work on the Sport Model, he was allowed to watch a demonstration of it taking off, ascending about 30 feet, moving to the left and right, and then returning to the ground. He says that just prior to and during its liftoff, it gave off a hissing sound similar to that coming from the coronal discharge from a high-voltage line. Its bottom gave off a blue glow, which he says was due to air atoms being excited by the craft's electromagnetic emissions. Again, these characteristics seem to suggest a field propulsion technique similar to the one used in Project Skyvault.

Lazar relates that the gravity wave generators operate in two modes—the omicron and delta configurations. In the omicron configuration, mentioned earlier, one or more generators (microwave mixers) are directed downward to form a supporting beam for the craft (see figure 9.7a). In the delta configuration (see figure 9.7b), all three beams are intersected at a distant location to achieve propulsion relative to that intersection region, which measures on the order of a meter in diameter. The beams then are said to develop an attractive force, rather than a repulsive force, which causes the craft to suddenly jump to that location. Lazar maintains that the beams gravitationally warp space-time at the intersection zone and that the resulting warping is what pulls the spacecraft toward that point. Here it seems he relies on standard general relativity concepts while pursuing an unusual theory of gravitation that has nothing to do with general relativity. His critics, however, rightly contest that if space-time was indeed warped at that distant location to the extent Lazar claims, every other object in the vicinity of that intersection zone should also be suddenly sucked in, as though toward a miniature black hole, which would result in a major collisional catastrophe. So again we encounter a baloney factor that appears to cast a shadow over the whole matter. Also, note that Lazar does not invoke general relativity concepts in explaining the beam repulsion effect produced in the omicron configuration, probably because standard general relativity theory does not allow gravitational repulsion.

To pursue an independent line of thought in regard to the delta configuration, one might imagine that these microwave soliton beams are intersected at a particular location to generate a plasma that acts as an anchoring point for wave scattering to take place. If the polarity of the beam's sawtooth-shaped waves are reversed to produce a sharp decline of negative electric potential at the beginning of each wave cycle or microwave burst rather than a sharp rise in potential, then it is possible that the beam could function as a tractor beam instead of a repulsion beam, as was theorized in chapter 6 in the discussion of the Podkletnov experiment. In that case, the soliton field the craft would be creating would generate an attractive force on the craft that would be vectored toward the target region and result in propulsion of the craft in that direction.

Although so much of Lazar's story sounds like nonsense, it is difficult to dismiss entirely when so many features of the Sport Model resemble Project Skyvault technology. This raises a lot of questions. If this was really one of several captured alien discs, did Project Skyvault begin as an attempt to reverse-engineer alien technology? One can make a strong case for microwave phase conjugation having originated as an outgrowth of the World War II development of radar. Also, there is the work of Townsend Brown, who apparently had gotten quite close to these ideas on his own without having any captured alien discs at hand to reverse-engineer. If we are to believe that the discs were given to us by Zeti Reticulans as part of some technology-exchange program, as Lazar claims, then perhaps these beings did so because they knew that our own research had already advanced to the point that they would have little to lose to let us look at what they had.

Then there is the issue of the misinformation that was apparently given to Lazar during his employment at S-4, with the outside possibility that he also went through some sort of mind-manipulation session, as some have suggested. If Lazar worked at S-4, was his recruitment planned from the start as a disinformation campaign to create confusion about how field propulsion vehicles might operate?

THE SEARL EFFECT

10.1 ■ THE SEARL EFFECT GENERATOR

It was during an indoor test that British inventor John Searl watched his permanent magnet generator levitate off its bench and ultimately bump into the ceiling. As he had envisioned in his dreams, his generator was not only able to propel itself with an overunity power efficiency, but it was also able to defy gravity. In its more advanced design, his generator consisted of three concentric ring magnets flanked by three sets of roller magnets that revolved in a clockwise direction about their circumference (see figure 10.1).[1] The innermost ring consisted of a stationary stator magnet, which he called a plate, having its magnetic north pole pointing down perpendicular to the plane of the ring. Twelve or more roller magnets, called runners, were spaced around the plate's periphery and allowed to roll around its circumference (see figure 10.2). The runners were placed with their magnetic fields oriented north-pole up, so that they would be magnetically attracted to the plate's rim as they rolled around it. However, they were spaced so that there would always be a small air gap between their surfaces and the plate. The diameter of the runners was such that they would revolve on their own axis a whole number of times for each revolution around the plate. This allowed the revolving magnets to establish a condition of resonance, with each revolution reinforcing the previous to build up a stationary wave magnetic field oscillation.

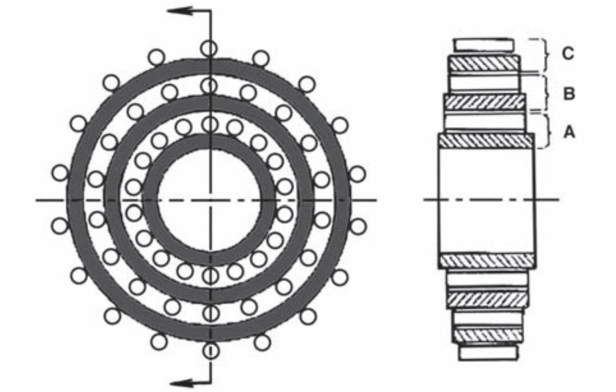

Figure 10.1. The Searl effect generator, showing the arrangement of the concentric ring and runner magnets. Ideally, the middle ring would have twenty-two or more runners and the outer ring thirty-two or more runners. (After S. Sandberg)

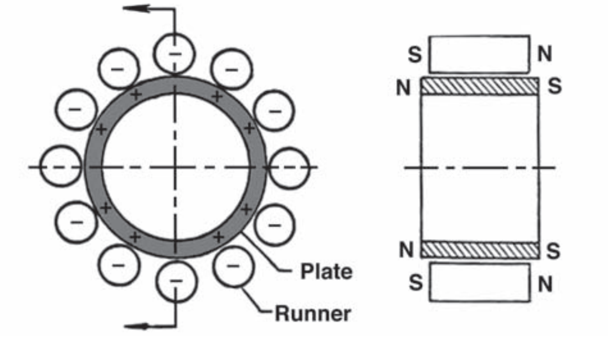

Figure 10.2. Schematic of the Searl effect generator's inner ring and its runner magnets, illustrating the magnetic polarity and electric polarity developed during operation. (After S. Sandberg)

This inner roller ring was, in turn, surrounded by a second ring-shaped magnetic stator plate with an adjacent set of at least twenty-two runner magnets. This was surrounded by a third ring-shaped magnetic stator and an adjacent set of at least thirty-two runner magnets. Previous tests of smaller-sized units indicated that a negative voltage was produced at the rim of the runner magnets, allowing a current to be collected by stationary brushes contacting the runner's rim.

In 1952, Searl and a friend conducted the first outdoor test of one of his 3-foot-diameter multi-ring generators.[2] They set the rotor in motion using a small engine that applied torque through a clutch mechanism. Even though it was rotating at a relatively slow speed, the device produced an unexpectedly high potential at the rotor's periphery, on the order of 100 kilovolts or more. The large potential was indicated by the field's characteristic crackling sound and ozone smell and the effect it had on surrounding objects.*

After the rotor had passed a particular threshold speed, its rate of rotation began to accelerate. Operating on its own power, it began to lift off and break the union to its starter engine. It is said to have risen to a height of some 50 feet, where it hovered for a while, still speeding up. It surrounded itself in a bluish pink halo similar to the glow discharge phenomenon seen when air is ionized in a moderate vacuum. Its pulsing field caused nearby radios to turn on. Finally, the whole generator is said to have accelerated upward at a fantastic rate and disappeared, presumably flying into space.

Searl's unusual device has since come to be known as the Searl effect generator (SEG) or the Searl levity disc. In the years that followed, he and his team members built and flew some dozen or more generators, some of which similarly became lost in flight until Searl found a way of controlling the rotor speed. He also built some generators that were 12 feet in diameter and two that were 30 feet in diameter; see figure 10.3.

There appeared to be a positive-feedback loop involved in the operation of Searl's generators since beyond a critical speed they would begin to accelerate on their own, without any mechanical assistance from the driving motor. In the beginning, Searl had not figured out how to control the effect. Later, he found that it was possible to reduce the speed by electrically loading the generators so that power was siphoned off from them.

Searl found that when the generator was running, there was a dramatic drop in air temperature in the immediate vicinity of the generator and in its interior.[3] Also, there was an accompanying drop in air pressure in its interior, with air being found to move outward from the generator's rim. This air expulsion effect was attributed to the high-voltage ionization present along the generator's rim, the effect being most pronounced when the rim voltage exceeded 30 kilovolts. The high-voltage emission was believed to cause the generator to be enveloped in a vacuum. Electrons expelled from the rim as negative ions would have arced to the positive plate, exciting a glow discharge in the low-pressure environment.

The electric fields produced by the device were apparently quite strong, since Searl noticed that after he had been working near the generators when they were operating, he had a "cobweb" static electricity sensation on his skin and found that his clothes clung to him. The fields were apparently strong enough to leave a residual electric polarity in his body tissue. When the generator was made to hover low above the ground for an extended period, the soil was seen to become burned because of the heat from the electric currents induced in the ground.

Objects placed inside the generator ring were found to lose weight. Also, a lit candle placed at its center became extinguished. Whether this was due to lack of oxygen from the lowered air pressure or to lack of convection from the reduced gravity field is not certain. Outside the generator, the field was such that objects approaching it were diverted before actually colliding.

In his 1968 paper on the Searl effect, P. L. Barrett presented a sketch showing the approximate direction of the gravity field in the vicinity of an operating Searl generator (figure 10.4).[4] The hatched regions indicate gravitational neutral zones, one being centered below the generator and a ringlike region positioned above the generator. Barrett wrote that any objects that entered those regions would tend to be held there. Also, it was found that upon taking off, a Searl craft would lift up a chunk of earth along with it. As a result, the craft would often leave behind a large hole in the ground. A similar lifting phenomenon has been observed to occur beneath UFOs. Numerous reliable witnesses who observed UFOs hovering over a body of water have noted that the water peaked beneath the craft, as shown in figure 10.5.[5]

The takeoff effect of a Searl-type disc might explain how a massive chunk of soil was torn up and displaced to a spot 73 feet away on a farm in north-central Washington.[6] A farmer's two sons discovered the chunk on October 18, 1984, while rounding up cattle. Passing through a wheat field that had been harvested about a month earlier, they discovered an irregularly shaped hole about 10 feet long and 7 feet wide, and from 1½ to 2 feet in depth. The hole was not a meteorite crater, as it had vertical walls and a fairly flat bottom, looking as though it had been cut by a giant cookie cutter. The removed piece, still intact, was found right-side up and rotated about 20 degrees counterclockwise from its original position in the hole. An arc of dribblings traced a path from the hole to where the chunk was found. By one estimate, this chunk of soil must have weighed about 5 metric tons. The dense root mass in the soil apparently held the clump together, but some of its roots looked as if they had been torn out at the time the piece was removed, since they were seen still dangling from the vertical walls of the hole. This feat of transportation could not have been executed by any kind of excavation machine. Besides, there was no evidence that the removal had been man-made, nor were any machinery marks found.

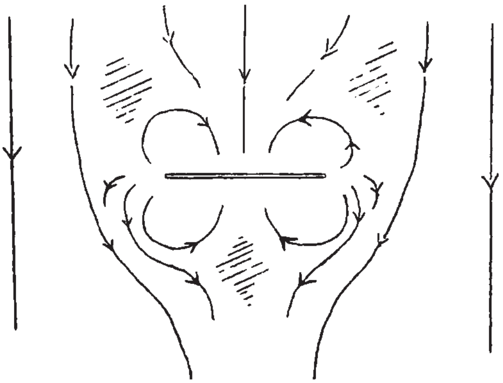

Figure 10.4. Sketch showing how the gravity field flux vectors (e.g., G-on flux vectors) are oriented in the vicinity of a hovering Searl disc. The vectors, which are represented as arrows, map the Earth's gravity field combined with that induced by the disc. Shaded regions indicate neutral gravity zones. (From Barrett, "Searl Effect," fig. IV)

One geologist speculated that the shock waves from a local 3.0-Richter earthquake spontaneously focused their energy to this spot and caused the massive chunk of soil to pop out, but seismologists found this unlikely. Besides, for this to happen, nature would have to violate the law of entropy. For this multi-ton piece of soil to move intact without breaking apart, it must have been subject to a uniform force pulling all of its mass upward, countering a downward gravitational pull of at least 90 grams per square centimeter. This would be about two hundred times greater than the lift force developed beneath Brown's 6-inch-diameter (15-centimeter) AC electrokinetic test apparatus.

Since this event took place on a remote farm field at a time when no observers were present, no UFO sighting was reported. Nevertheless, the physical evidence at the site was consistent with the UFO soil-displacement scenario that Schaffranke had documented seven years earlier. The craft must have hovered near the ground, with its electrogravitic field penetrating the soil below. Then as the craft rose, this extended field gradient would have moved up as well, inadvertently drawing up this chunk of soil with it. As the craft slowly swung in an arc-like trajectory across the field, pieces of soil dribbling from the bottom of this hovering chunk would have floated to the ground. Eventually, the craft must have accelerated, leaving the soil chunk to break away from its towing field and thump to the ground at its new location. What would otherwise be a mystery becomes easily explainable when one has a foreknowledge of gravity field propulsion technologies. Nevertheless, it leaves us to marvel at the enormous lift that such an antigravity field can generate, one capable of overpowering the natural force of gravity to allow tons of soil and a massive spacecraft to float freely. Whether it was made by us or came from somewhere else maybe we will never know.

10.2 ■ THE MAGNETIC ENERGY CONVERTER

The Russian physicists Vladimir Roshchin and Serge Godin in the mid-1990s built and tested a version of the SEG, which they named the magnetic energy converter (MEC). It resembled one of Searl's earlier generators, consisting of a single magnetized stator ring measuring 1 meter in diameter flanked by twenty-three roller magnets, each having a diameter of 7.4 centimeters; see figure 10.6.[7,8]

Roshchin and Godin's generator differed from Searl's in several respects, the principal difference being in the design of the runner magnets. They refer to the runners as rollers, so I will use their term instead. Searl used a special magnetization technique to create magnetic spoke domains in the cylindrical sides of his runner magnets oriented perpendicular to the runner's axis of rotation. The MEC accomplished the same thing with dipole magnets implanted perpendicular to the surface of each roller magnet so that the north pole of each magnet was oriented perpendicular to the stator plate. The stator had a complementary set of dipole spokes with their north pole pointing out toward the rollers. As in Searl's SEG, these mutually repulsive magnetic domains helped to orient the rollers as they revolved around the circumference of the stator plate and helped to keep the rollers from contacting the plate.

The axles of the roller magnets were secured via bearings to a common rotor frame that kept each roller at its proper relative spacing as they rotated around the stator ring. The rotor had a shaft that was connected to an electric motor via a clutch mechanism. As in Searl's experiments, the motor was used to get the generator up to speed. Roshchin and Godin found that the MEC had a specific rotational speed at which it began to partially power itself, with its drive motor accordingly consuming less power. This occurred when the rotor speed surpassed about 200 revolutions per minute (3.3 hertz). After about one and a half minutes, the rotor had accelerated to 550 revolutions per minute (rpm), at which point the starter motor current consumption had reached zero and was beginning to go negative. The clutch assembly was then made to disconnect the motor from the rotor shaft and in its place connect a generator. As the rotor continued to accelerate, an increasing load was applied to the generator, reaching 7 kilowatts by the time the rotor had a reached a speed of 595 rpm. Greater loads caused the rotor speed to subsequently decline. At greater than 590 rpm, the MEC made "an unpleasant high frequency whistling sound" that damped out as soon as an increased electric load was placed on the generator.

Roshchin and Godin also found that the weight of the generator assembly decreased as the rotor accelerated. Weight loss first became noticeable when the rotor speed reached its critical value of 200 rpm, and by the time its speed had reached 450 rpm, weight loss began to increase exponentially (figure 10.7). At 550 rpm, there was an inflection pause in the weight-loss curve and after 590 rpm, an extremely steep rise in weight loss with increasing rotor speed. By the time the rotor speed had reached 595 rpm, the apparatus as a whole had become 35 percent lighter, with the weight of the generator alone dropping 50 percent. There was substantial hysteresis in this weight loss–rotation rate curve. As rotor speed decreased from 595 to 400 rpm, weight loss remained constant at the 35 percent reduction level. Measurements were not made at greater than 600 rpm for fear that the MEC would enter an uncontrollable supercritical regime in which positive feedback would cause an exponential rise in rotor speed. A similar positive feedback mode had resulted in Searl losing several of his devices through uncontrolled levitation.

The MEC was found to produce this weight-loss effect only in clockwise rotation (for rollers with their north pole oriented up). Counterclockwise rotation produced a weight-gain effect, with the gain in weight being proportional to the rotor speed. Roshchin and Godin found that application of a 20,000-volt bias potential applied between the plate and the roller magnets improved the performance of the MEC, allowing its weight reduction to begin to take effect at a lower rotor speed. This potential would have ionized the air around the MEC, allowing the electron current to flow more easily across the 1-centimeter gap between the stator and the rollers.

Like the SEG, the MEC generated a luminescence around itself when seen operating in the dark. The bluish pink ionization cloud was observed to cover both the stator ring and the roller magnet ring. Also, when looking at the edge of the rotating roller magnet ring, Roshchin and Godin saw, superimposed on this emission, a series of horizontal, yellowish white luminescent bands (four or five) spaced along the height of the roller magnet's cylindrical surface. This luminescence suggests a possible high-voltage electron discharge from the surface of the roller magnets, although it was not accompanied by sounds characteristic of arc discharge. This silent emission could occur because the emission was coming from a large surface area, rather than from a point source. They compare it to high-voltage, microwave-induced luminescence observed prior to the point of electric breakdown.

Roshchin and Godin also found that when in operation, the MEC surrounded itself with a stationary magnetic-wave pattern consisting of a nested series of cylindrical "magnetic walls" (see figures 10.8 and 10.9).[9] Magnetometer measurements indicated the presence of a magnetic-field flux inside the walls of 0.05 tesla, with the field orientation being the same as that of the roller magnets and at about 6 percent of their 0.85 tesla magnetic flux. No magnetic flux was detectable outside of the walls. There is no evidence to suggest that the magnetic-wall pattern is hazardous in any way. Roshchin and Godin did not notice any harmful effects. On the contrary, Searl has reported that the field emissions of his SEG actually had healing effects.

The magnetic-wall pattern extended out from the MEC's stator ring for a distance of up to 15 meters, beyond which the magnetic flux within successive walls rapidly decreased in intensity. The field pattern could be sensed on the second floor of the laboratory, indicating that the walls extended upward at least to a height of 6 meters and possibly downward into the ground for a similar distance. The innermost walls were spaced from one another by approximately 0.5 meter (one stator radius), and this spacing increased 0.8 meter as distance from the MEC increased. Also, the walls had a thickness of about 5 to 6 centimeters, approximating the 7.4-centimeter-diameter of the roller magnets.

The proximity of these dimensions to that of the ring of roller magnets led Roshchin and Godin to conclude that there was a direct connection between this stationary field pattern and the circumferential movement of the magnetic rollers. This conclusion was also supported by their observation that there was a decrease in air temperature within the magnetic walls, which could be immediately felt by placing one's hand within a wall. Moreover, they found that the temperature decreased in proportion to the rate of roller-ring rotation, the decline becoming noticeable above a rotor speed of 200 rpm and reaching –7.5°C by the time the rotor speed had reached 550 rpm. Consequently, they concluded that energy from the environment was somehow being transferred to the ring of roller magnets to assist their rotation.

Below, I will attempt to explain the principle of how the MEC generator operates, with the understanding that the same explanation should apply equally well to the SEG. These ideas were first presented in June 2001 at the Conference on New Hydrogen Technologies and Space Drives.[10] Briefly, clockwise rotation of the rollers causes a current to flow radially outward from the MEC's plate to its rollers due to the Faraday disc dynamo effect. As a result of the "ball-bearing motor effect," this current then creates a torque that induces the rollers to continue their clockwise rotation. The rotating rollers create resonant extremely low-frequency (ELF) oscillations that phase-conjugate to form an extended soliton wave pattern. Energy entrained from this soliton helps to propel the rollers. Let us begin by examining the Faraday effect.

10.3 ▪ THE FARADAY DISC DYNAMO EFFECT

The Faraday disc generator, also known as the homopolar generator, was first built by physicist Michael Faraday in the late nineteenth century. Faraday placed a copper disc between the poles of two cylindrical magnets so that the magnets' field ran perpendicular to the plane of the disc. He found that when he spun the disc, a current was induced to flow, with electrons moving outward from the disc's center toward its periphery. This was attributable to the $v \times B$ rule, in which v represents a conductor's velocity vector and B represents the magnetic force field vector, the two being vector-multiplied with one another.

Faraday also discovered that if the copper disc was cemented to the magnets and the magnets and disc were rotated together as a unit, electrons would still flow to the disc's periphery (figure 10.10).[11] This led him to conclude that the magnetic field produced by the magnets did not rotate with the magnets, but rather was anchored in space (i.e., in the local ether rest frame). Researchers such as Bruce DePalma, Adam Trombley, and Peramahansa Terwari built various versions of this cemented-disc homopolar generator with the hope of developing a motor generator having an overunity efficiency.

As in the classical Faraday disc generator, in this cemented-disc version the magnitude and direction of the electron-current flow is determined by the $v \times B$ rule. Remember to use the left-hand rule instead of the right-hand rule when dealing with electron current flows. That is, if you point the index finger of your left hand in the magnetic-flux direction (south to north) and your thumb in the direction of rotary movement, then your middle finger will indicate the direction of electron flow.

The runners in the SEG and the rollers in the MEC are essentially little Faraday disc generators. They do not have a cemented-copper disc, but the magnets themselves are conductive—not as conductive as copper, but nevertheless they conduct electricity. Thus, like the Faraday disc generator, they should generate a radial current. If we consider a single roller magnet rotating in a clockwise direction with its north pole pointing up, as shown in figure 10.6, the left-hand rule indicates that the roller should produce an electron current flow from the roller into the stator ring plate. However, when operating, the Searl disc and the MEC produce an electron current that flows outward from the plate to the rollers, not inward.

This discrepancy arises because we have not accounted for the effect of the entire system in motion. In addition to the Faraday effect due to the rotations of the individual roller magnets, we must also account for the Faraday effect produced by the collective translational movement of those magnets around the circumference of the stator plate, that is, about the stator's central axis. In considering this effect, we may treat the roller magnets collectively as composing a single ring magnet whose radial thickness is equal to the diameter of the rollers and whose magnetic field is in the same direction as that in the individual roller magnets.* Once again applying the left-hand rule, we see that clockwise rotation of this ring produces an electron-current flow outward from the stator plate to the roller magnets, opposing the current flows arising individually from the Faraday effect of each roller. As it turns out, the Faraday-effect voltage induced by this collective translation is much greater than the opposing voltage polarity that arises from the individual magnet rotations. The net result is that the electron current should flow outward from the plate to the roller magnets, just as is observed. For illustration, the relative magnitude of these two opposing Faraday disc effects is calculated in the accompanying text box.

Faraday Effect Potential Induced by Roller Ring Rotation

Let us first consider the voltage generated by the rotation of each individual roller. The induced voltage may be calculated using the equation applicable to a Faraday disc dynamo:[12]

$$V = \tfrac{1}{2}\omega B(b^2 - a^2) \qquad (9)$$

in which ω is the magnet's angular velocity and b and a are its outer and inner radii. In this case of the MEC prototype, $b = 0.037$ meter, the roller diameter, and $a = 0.005$ meter, the diameter of the roller's central shaft hole. When the ring of rollers is moving about the circumference of the stator plate at 550 rpm, the individual rollers will be rotating twenty-three times faster, hence, $\omega = 23 \times 550/60 \times 2\pi = 1325$ radians per second. Taking $B = 0.85$ tesla, equation 1 predicts a voltage of $V = 0.76$ volt, in which the center of the roller is positive and its periphery is negative.

*Here we assume that most of the return magnetic flux from the individual roller magnets (south-pole-seeking flux) returns either outside or inside the ring of roller magnets and to a lesser extent in the space between the roller magnets.

Now let us calculate the voltage generated by the displacement of the entire ring of rollers. The outer and inner radii of the ring are taken as $b = 0.574$ meter and $a = 0.5$ meter, which are the distances from the MEC's central axis to the outer and inner circumferences bounding the roller ring. If this roller ring revolves about the MEC's central axis at 550 rpm, or at an angular velocity of $\omega = 57.6$ radians per second, then equation 1 predicts that it would generate a voltage of $V = 1.95$ volts, with the potential being negative at the edge farthest from the stator plate. Consequently, even though the roller ring rotates far slower than the individual rollers, it produces a far larger voltage.

On the side of the roller nearest the stator plate, the voltage generated by the clockwise displacement of the roller ring will be opposed by the voltage being generated by each roller. Yet on the opposite side of the roller, the side farthest from the stator plate, the roller's Faraday effect will produce a voltage polarity in the same direction as that produced by the displacement of the roller ring; hence, the two will add to one another. The net result is that the Faraday effect arising from the rotation of each roller cancels out, leaving just that arising from the roller ring's clockwise displacement. In the example presented in the text box, this would leave a net voltage of 1.95 volts, inducing an electron current to flow toward the MEC's periphery.

Roshchin and Godin used neodymium iron boron magnets in their MEC (typically 58 percent iron, 37 percent neodymium, 4 percent ferrous sulfate, and 1 percent boron). This alloy has an electric resistance of about 144 micro-ohms per centimeter, so a 7.4-centimeter-diameter roller would offer a resistance of 1066 μΩ. Roshchin and Godin did not state how much current was flowing into each roller at a given rotor speed, but as a guess, we might suppose that at an operating speed of 550 rpm, this was on the order of 800 amps for each roller.

As this electron current passes radially outward into the rollers, it generates a motive force on the rollers that assists their rotation. This production of circumferential torque from a radial current flow is known as the ball-bearing motor effect.

10.4 ■ THE BALL-BEARING MOTOR EFFECT

I first saw the ball-bearing motor effect in action in the spring of 1999. An alternative-energy political demonstration was being held in Washington, D.C., on the western Mall. Many there were preparing themselves for the predicted breakdown of society that was expected to occur the following year, when the year-2000 computer-calendar glitch was to occur. Among the attendees sprawled on the grassy lawn was Mark Gubrud, a University of Maryland physics student. He was demonstrating an interesting motor that consisted of a shaft mounted in a ball-bearing race (figure 10.11). He applied DC voltage from a small battery pack between the shaft and the outer casing of the ball-bearing race. Then, when he gave the shaft a starting torque, it continued to rotate in the direction of the applied torque and continued to turn as long as voltage was applied. If the shaft was given a starting torque in the opposite direction, it again continued to rotate, but in that new direction. Gubrud had with him an explanatory write-up of the motor's principle of operation, which he gave me. I gave a copy to Tom Valone, and he subsequently published it in his Homopolar Handbook.[13]

After learning about this phenomenon, I realized that the same effect powered the rotary motion of the runners in the SEG and the rollers in the MEC. Using Gubrud's explanation, let us review how an applied radial-current flow through a ball bearing induces torque forces on the bearing, causing it to rotate around its bearing race (see figure 10.12). A current passing through the ball bearing at time t_1, flowing from the bearing casing to the central drive shaft, will magnetize the bearing. The bearing, though, will retain a residual field in this same magnetization direction at time t_2, although the direction of this residual field has changed because of the bearing's rotation. At time t_2, this residual magnetic field will be directed at some angle α to the direction of current flow, which always occurs through the points where the ball bearing contacts the axle and bearing race. The current component i that lies perpendicular to this residual field will then induce a force ($F = i \times B$) that produces torques on either side of the bearing, which induces it to keep revolving in the direction of its initial rotation.*

The same principle applies to the rollers of an MEC or the runners of an SEG. Consider the ball-bearing motor in figure 10.11a. The outer ball-bearing race remains stationary as the axle turns. If we take this outer-race circumference and fold it back so that its inside faces out, we get the geometry shown in figure 10.11b. Imagine that the ball bearings are roller magnets rolling around the stator plate. The two mechanisms are then seen to be equivalent. The electric polarities are reversed in each

*Note that the current flow illustrated in figure 10.12 follows the engineering convention that current flows in the opposite direction from electron flow. Electron current would be in the opposite direction, and one would then use the left-hand rule instead of right-hand rule to determine the directions of the torques. The result, however, comes out the same.

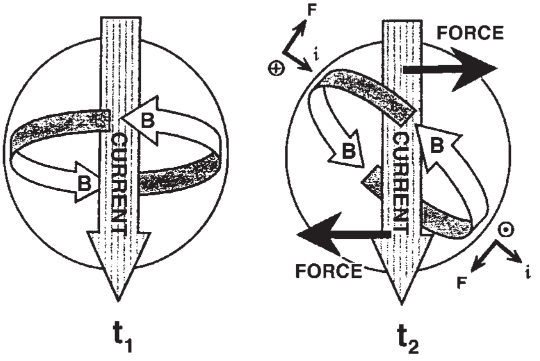

Figure 10.12. A ball bearing shown magnetized at time t_1 that retains a residual field in that same direction at time t_2*, even though it has rotated in a clockwise direction. Vectors show the clockwise torques developed by the applied current. (Based on M. Gubrud's diagram, in T. Valone,* Homopolar Handbook, 54–55) case because the motor in figure 10.11a is powered by dissipated power (electrons flowing from minus to plus) and the motor in figure 10.11b is powered by generated power (electrons flowing from plus to minus). As in the ball-bearing motor, if an electron current flows from the plate outward through each roller, this current will produce a torque on each roller, assisting it to move in the direction of its established rotation.

These two processes together, the Faraday disc dynamo effect and the ball-bearing motor effect, form a positive feedback loop in which a clockwise displacement of the roller-ring rotor produces a radial electric current that induces roller rotation and greater clockwise displacement of the rotor (see figure 10.13, upper left).

The high voltage the MEC induces at its periphery could be due to the sudden change in the electric resistance the electrons encounter in the course of their radial outward movement. Upon leaving the low-resistance environment of the magnets and continuing their push through the high-resistance environment of the surrounding air, the electrons' voltage potential associated with their current flow would have shot up proportionately, since $E = iR$. That is, for the same current value, voltage will increase in direct proportion to resistance.

Roshchin and Godin found it necessary to use an external motor to apply mechanical torque to the MEC to start it and keep it going in the low-revolutions-per-minute regime. Nevertheless, as in Searl's earlier generators, they found that the roller ring began to spontaneously accelerate once it had been spun up to a critical threshold speed. For the MEC, this critical rate of rotation was around 200 rpm, although Searl succeeded in designing generators that would spontaneously accelerate, even from rest. This acceleration phenomenon suggests that the MEC, like the SEG, must have been receiving an additional input of energy from some unknown source. Let us next consider where this energy may have been coming from.

10.5 ■ THE CYLINDRICAL SOLITON

This additional, unaccounted-for energy input that was assisting the roller ring's movement around the stator plate most likely was being entrained from the MEC's immediate environment. This hypothesis finds support in the observation that during its operation, the MEC caused a drop in air temperature within a series of nested cylindrical zones established in its immediate vicinity (see figures 10.8 and 10.9). Here we will attempt to understand how this magnetic wall pattern is generated, and later we will examine how energy from this field pattern might be entrained to power the roller-magnet rotor.

As the roller magnets travel clockwise around the stator plate, they generate an oscillating magnetic field in the stator's frame of reference. That is, as a roller magnet coincides with a given reference point on the plate's circumference, in the stator reference frame the magnetic field strength at that point would increase to a maximum since the flux lines between the oppositely oriented roller and stator magnets attract and complement one another. However, as the roller makes a half turn in its clockwise motion, its downward return field, which is south-pole seeking, would now occupy the space that formerly held the roller's north-oriented field. This same space would also be filled with the stator's upward-directed south-seeking field. Since these two fields are in opposition, the net magnetic field strength there would add up to a minimum value. As a result of the roller magnet's clockwise motion, the magnetic field in the stator reference frame would sinusoidally vary in magnitude, and would do so without reversing its magnetic polarity (figure 10.14).

Figure 10.14. The resonant variation of magnetic field strength (B) and electric field intensity (E) in the stator reference frame excited by the circumferential displacement of the MEC's roller ring. (P. LaViolette, © 2006)

Because the diameter of the roller magnets (D) and the space between the roller magnets (k) in figure 10.14 are approximately the same, the rotary displacement of this succession of equally spaced roller magnets would set up a resonant oscillation in the stator reference frame. As an example, when a ring of twenty-three roller magnets revolves at 550 rpm, the generated frequency would equal 211 hertz. This time-varying field (B), in turn, would induce a sinusoidal electric-potential wave oscillation at the same frequency that is directed radially inward and outward from the MEC's center in the stator's nonrotating reference frame. However, compared with the magnetic field maxima, the electric potential maxima would be displaced 90 degrees in phase, that is, by one roller radius in the clockwise direction (see lower trace in figure 10.14).

Also, as discussed earlier, the Faraday disc dynamo effect would be generating a radial electric field gradient across the diameter of the roller magnets with the potential being more negative at the outer periphery of each magnet, thus inducing an electric current to flow radially from the stator through the roller magnets. Consequently, the sinusoidal AC electric field that the roller magnets generate would modulate this DC-negative potential in the vicinity of the roller ring, causing its amplitude to vary sinusoidally with time. This is analogous to what was happening in Brown's electrokinetic apparatus when the high-voltage DC field across the capacitor dielectric was modulated with an AC field from the apparatus's negative antenna electrode, but in the case of the MEC, the field geometry would be radial rather than axial.

As a result, the electron flow from the MEC's stator toward its rotor would pulsate at the frequency induced by the translating roller magnets. When a roller magnet is tangential to a given location on the stator, that is, most proximal to that location, the electric potential that induces current to flow radially outward to the roller would at that moment only be at its median potential. The potential at that particular location would reach its maximum only after the roller magnet has passed and become displaced by a distance of one roller-magnet radius, so there would be a tendency for arcing to occur on the trailing side of each roller. This would be especially apparent when a high-voltage gradient was present in the vicinity of the MEC's rollers, thereby allowing negative ion discharges from the stator to cross large air gaps.

This recurrent outward pulsing of negative charges in some ways resembles the asymmetrical, longitudinal waves radiated from Tesla's transformers. The oscillating, nonreversing magnetic field and the oscillating, nonreversing electric field produced around the circumference of the roller magnet ring would induce a longitudinal ELF electromagnetic wave to propagate radially outward from the stator ring in the stator ring plane. This wave would have a cylindrical wave-propagation geometry, with its magnetic field aligned to the cylinder wall that parallels the roller magnet field and its electric field component oriented perpendicular to the cylinder wall, oscillating radially outward and inward with respect to the center of the MEC. Roshchin and Godin, however, did not report having observed such radial electric field oscillations in these walls.

Also, this radiated ELF wave would have a circumferential wave component. Since the stationary wave produced by the rotating roller ring contains a total of twenty-three wavelengths that fit a whole number of times around the roller-ring circumference, a similar whole number of wavelengths would be required to fit around the circumference of field oscillations appearing outside the roller ring. These would be able to manifest only at multiples of the 0.5-meter stator radius. At a radius of 1 meter, equal to two stator radii, forty-six wavelengths would fit around the wave's cylindrical circumference. At 1.5 meters, equal to three stator radii, sixty-nine wavelengths would fit around the wave pattern circumference, and so on. No oscillations would manifest at intermediary radial distances because a whole number of wavelengths would be unable to fit into the cylinder circumference at those other radial distances. This is because Roshchin and Godin used twenty-three magnets in their roller ring, 23 being a prime number. Hence, oscillating potentials are able to build up to detectable levels only at radii that are whole-number multiples of the stator radius. At any intermediary radial distances, the oscillations would destructively interfere, hence preventing resonant oscillations from building up there.

The radial ELF oscillations would manifest as a soliton pattern consisting of a series of concentric cylindrical wall nodes similar to those shown in figures 10.8 and 10.9. Each wall would have a depth of about one roller radius and would be separated from the next wall by a distance of about one stator radius. The symmetry axis of this cylindrical soliton pattern would be centered on the MEC's axis of rotation. Hence, when the MEC's field patterns are analyzed in this way, it becomes understandable why Roshchin and Godin observed their MEC to be surrounded by a cylindrical, shell-like field pattern. Although stationary wave patterns that vary in smooth-sine-wave fashion are more commonly observed, patterns with sharp transition boundaries are also known to occur. For example, such sharp-edged boundaries have been observed in stationary waves produced in the laboratory with Tesla-wave-type oscillations.[14]

The waves within each of the soliton's walls would revolve around the circumference of their walls in synch with the rotation of the roller-magnet ring, remaining stationary with respect to the rotating frame and with respect to circumferential oscillations occurring in the other wall-like nodes. Hence, the waves in rings at successively greater distances would circuit around the circumference of their walls at successively higher velocities. The waves circuiting in the 1-meter-radius node, whose circumference would be twice the roller-ring radius, would oscillate at twice the roller-ring fundamental frequency (i.e., at $2f_o$). More-distant walls spaced at one-stator-radius intervals would support oscillations circuiting at progressively higher rates, at frequencies of $3f_o$, $4f_o$, and so on. Thus, as one proceeds outward through this soliton wave pattern, moving radially outward from the center of the MEC, one encounters progressively higher harmonic modes, whole-number multiples of the roller magnet's fundamental frequency f_o. We might also speculate that a whole series of harmonic modes might coexist within each of these walls but at intensities below that of the main harmonic mode circulating in that wall.

Since 23 is a prime number, lower-frequency subharmonic modes, such as $f_o/2$ and $f_o/3$, situated at radii smaller than the roller-ring radius, would not form. The roller ring would itself be the lowest-frequency resonance in this stationary cylindrical-wave pattern. Given that Roshchin and Godin observed the walls to extend about 15 meters out from the generator, this indicates that the outermost wall had a frequency of about 30 f_o. This would have produced a frequency of about 6,300 hertz for a ring-rotation rate of 550 rpm. It is remarkable that the soliton pattern was stable enough to produce such a high harmonic. This 15-meter soliton pattern, though, may limit how close MECs can be placed to one another. For example, if an aircraft was to employ more than one MEC or SEG for lofting, the units would need to be spaced apart by at least 50 meters.

If Searl had used twenty-two magnets for his inner magnetic ring, then he also would have observed a cylindrical wave pattern forming around his discs, but with twice as many nodes because 22 is not a prime number. But when divided by two, it yields the prime number 11, so such a disc would have generated nodes at half multiples of the fundamental frequency, with a lowest-frequency node at $f_o/2$ positioned at half a stator radius and with nodes repeating at radial distance intervals of half a stator radius.

10.6 ■ ENERGY ENTRAINMENT

The MEC's AC electric and magnetic-field oscillation is induced in a nonlinear medium. That is, the ferromagnetic material making up the stator and roller magnets has nonlinear electric and magnetic properties. In addition, the high-voltage discharge that surrounds the stator plate and roller ring when the MEC is operating at high rpm would generate nitric oxide, which also has nonlinear dielectric properties. As explained in chapter 7, the nonlinear dielectric properties of such plasmas make them good phase-conjugating media. For example, the phase-conjugating characteristics of the plasma surrounding the dome of Tesla's magnifying transmitter could explain how his tower was able to "beam" radio-frequency energy to distant locations without appreciable attenuation. Also, as mentioned earlier, Obolensky has succeeded in phase-conjugating arc fluctuations in an arc lamp by placing a nonlinear reactance element in series with the lamp.[15] This demonstrates that phase conjugation can take place even in the ELF frequency range. The notion that the MEC was phase-conjugating the ELF waves it was generating, then, seems plausible.

We might presume that some of the MEC's outgoing ELF radiation was reflected back to the MEC from surfaces in its environment and that these reflected waves were then phase-conjugated by the MEC's nonlinear media. The phase-conjugate wave would have retraced the path of the ordinary wave to the remote reflection site and then back to the MEC's oscillating field. The ordinary and phase-conjugate ELF waves would have interlocked and constructively reinforced one another to produce phase-locked field potentials that would have manifested at each node of the cylindrical soliton pattern.

One interesting characteristic of a phase-conjugate resonator is its ability to decrease entropy. For example, in the case of optical and microwave phase conjugation considered in chapter 8, when an outgoing laser (or maser) beam scatters from the environment, its entropy increases—it becomes more disorganized. The probe beam scattering back toward the phase-conjugate mirror therefore is more disordered than the original outgoing beam. This state of disorder, however, may be reversed through the emission of the phase conjugate of the probe beam. That is, the emitted phase-conjugate waves precisely retrace the path of the scattered ordinary waves, causing the entropy of the wave system to decrease as the wave regains its original ordered state. As a result, energy that normally would be lost through scattering to the environment becomes bottled up in the soliton wave pattern.

As in the case in which microwave phase conjugation is used to generate intense beams for spacecraft propulsion, so too would phase-conjugate resonance occurring in the vicinity of the MEC generator bottle up back-scattered ELF waves, storing their energy in the soliton wave pattern. The repeating AC oscillations that the roller magnets would generate in the reference frame of the stator plate would then add to one another, causing the soliton's ELF field oscillations to progressively increase in magnitude. Experiments have shown that an optical phase-conjugate resonator can self-excite to intensities sixty times that of the input signal beam without any additional energy input, and it has been suggested that even higher amplification coefficients should be achievable.[16,17] We might speculate that even-greater signal amplification occurs in the MEC.

The faser effect produced by phase conjugation of the ELF waves should amplify not only the MEC's electric field pulsations in the stator reference frame, but also the associated magnetic field soliton pattern rotating with the roller-magnet ring. Consequently, since the direction of the soliton's B field matches that of the roller magnets, the soliton magnetic field should reinforce the roller-magnet fields, causing the ambient magnetic field in the vicinity of the roller magnets to progressively increase over time to far exceed the 0.85-tesla strength produced by the roller magnets alone. The maximal amount of this induced increase would depend on the rpm of the roller ring, higher ambient field strengths being achieved at higher revolution speeds.

As explained earlier, the radial electric field and current flow induced by the circumferential displacement of the roller magnets depends not only on the roller ring's rpm but also on the field strength of the magnets. Since phase-conjugate resonance would boost this field strength, one would expect that the potential developed at a given rotation rate would far exceed the voltage that we calculated earlier on the basis of the Faraday disc effect. In addition, the radial electric field component of the soliton's ELF waves would amplify through phase-conjugate resonance, and in the MEC's nonlinear environment, a portion of this amplified AC potential would likely transfer over to boost the MEC's DC electric field component. Consequently, it is possible to imagine that these effects in combination could produce a DC voltage drop in the vicinity of the MEC of tens of thousands of volts or more, rather than just of a few volts. This would explain the origin of the high-voltage glow discharge that Roshchin and Godin observed even when their 20-kilovolt external bias voltage was switched off. It would also account for the pink, high-voltage glow discharge that Searl observed around his discs. We are here reminded of Tesla's towers, which similarly developed potentials so high that nearby objects were excited to luminesce.

Earlier, we concluded that the circumferential displacement of the B fields of the roller magnets induces a radial electron flow from the stator plate to the rollers that, in turn, generates a ball-bearing-motor torque that aids the clockwise rotation of the rollers. Consequently, the boosting of the radial electric potential gradient due to these various faser effects would proportionately increase the induced-current flow and thereby aid the rotation of the roller ring. In this way, energy from the soliton-field pattern would be continuously converted into mechanical energy, inducing the roller ring to accelerate in spite of resistive losses.

This additional energy input into the MEC is illustrated by the feedback loop on the right side of figure 10.13.

Since this array of magnetic-wall solitons is part of a single resonance phenomenon, these resonant modes should exchange energy with one another. Hence, the buildup of potential energy in the vicinity of the roller ring (the inner soliton cylindrical wall that was assisting roller propulsion) could easily be conveyed from the other cylindrical wall nodes whose frequencies resonated harmonically with this base frequency.

The temperature drop observed in the magnetic walls may be a direct result of thermal energy being extracted from the air and being entrained into the soliton throughout its harmonic range. If so, the soliton field must then somehow be physically interacting with the air molecules in the magnetic walls and possibly be drawing energy from their Brownian motion. For example, the magnetic field oscillating in the cylindrical walls might slightly magnetize the air or solid objects that a wall happened to intercept, and magnetized molecules whose Brownian-motion oscillation happened to match any of the wall's ELF harmonics would then have their energy entrained into the soliton. Consider, for example, an inner wall located 1 meter from the MEC's axis. It would support an ELF frequency of $2f_o$, twice the fundamental frequency. However, this particular harmonic could be excited by an entire spectrum of harmonics existing in the ambient molecular movement: f_o, $2f_o$, $3f_o$, $4f_o$, $5f_o$, and so on, up to the ninth harmonic; recall the discussion in chapter 8. Thus, there are abundant opportunities for frequency matches to develop.

Using the heat capacity of air, Roshchin and Godin have estimated that heat was being lost at the rate of 1,700 calories per second from the eight innermost magnetic walls residing within 4 meters of the MEC's center.* This loss rate equals 7 kilowatts, which slightly exceeds the 6 kilowatts of electric power that the MEC was mysteriously generating without any mechanical input. If the caloric loss of the entire soliton pattern is taken into account out to a radius of 15 meters, then there is more than enough energy loss to account for the MEC's source of power. Thus, the MEC may have a clearly identifiable energy source in its immediate environment. It would be partially propelled by heat flowing into the magnetic walls from the ambient air and laboratory structures, with this energy being subsequently entrained into the soliton pattern. A generator such as this that cools its environment while it generates power appears to be the ultimate solution for the global warming problem.

*Roshchin and Godin estimated that the walls measured 12 meters in height by 5 centimeters in breadth and calculated that the air passing through that volume underwent a 6°C temperature drop when the MEC was operating at 550 rpm.

It is also possible that the MEC is entraining background electromagnetic energy. The universe is permeated by energy spanning a wide range of frequencies, including frequencies in the ELF range. Also, there is the well-known ionospheric Schumann resonance, which is excited at approximately 8 hertz by solar particle bombardment of the ionosphere. Higher harmonics of this resonance might match some of the soliton harmonics.

The MEC may also be cohering energy from the omnipresent zero-point energy background that extends throughout space. As was noted in chapter 4, the reactive ether of subquantum kinetics is conceived to have X, Y, and G reactant concentrations that continually fluctuate in magnitude in seemingly random fashion. The X and Y ether fluctuations correspond to spontaneous pulsations of the ambient electric potential field, and the G ether fluctuations correspond to spontaneous pulsations of the ambient gravity potential field. Together they make up the zero-point energy continuum. It seems plausible that the zero-point energy background would locally transfer a portion of its energy to material bodies it surrounds, so that if there was a decrease in the energy density of the zero-point energy background, then one might observe a corresponding local decrease in air temperature. Thus, if the MEC was cohering energy from the zero-point energy background, the observed drop in air temperature might be a collateral effect and not the actual source of the MEC's energy. If it was able to extract energy directly from the zero-point energy background, then the MEC would be able to continue powering itself even in empty space.

The subquantum kinetics zero-point energy spectrum differs from that of conventional physics in that it spans all frequencies, including ELF frequencies. The zero-point energy concept of quantum mechanics and quantum field theory, for example, predicts that such fluctuations should instead occur primarily at high energies since such fluctuations are theorized to arise in the simultaneous appearance of a virtual subatomic particle and its virtual antiparticle. Most of the energy in the conventional zero-point energy spectrum then would be at frequencies greater than 10^{20} hertz (the MeV range) and would extend on up to the Planck limit of 10^{43} hertz (10^{28} electron volts). Conventional physics, then, would be off by at least eighteen orders of magnitude in providing an appropriate frequency match for the MEC's energy extraction. Subquantum kinetics, on the other hand, allows energy to be extracted from the fluctuating ether at frequencies in this ELF range and even lower. In fact, in subquantum kinetics, the probability of a fluctuation occurring increases as frequency decreases. High-energy fluctuations in the MeV range and greater that would be potentially large enough to nucleate the materialization of a subatomic particle would be exceedingly rare events.

If we define our system boundary so that it surrounds both the MEC and the magnetic-wall soliton pattern that it creates in its immediate vicinity, we find that the Searl effect does not violate the first law of thermodynamics, but it does violate the second law of thermodynamics. However, the violation of the second law is the expected norm whenever phase-conjugate resonance is occurring.

10.7 ▪ EXPLAINING THE WEIGHT-LOSS EFFECT

The MEC's weight-loss effect is not easily explained in terms of standard physical theory, but it is understandable within the framework of subquantum kinetics.[18,19] The MEC would develop a negative electric potential at the periphery of its roller ring and positive potential near its central axis. The resonant oscillations would cause this field to fluctuate in magnitude at its negatively biased periphery. From an electrodynamic standpoint, the Searl disc's oscillating field is analogous to the nonreversing AC field that Brown was exciting across the dielectric of his AC electrokinetic apparatus. Hence, the analysis illustrated in figure 4.5 for Brown's apparatus should apply equally well to the Searl disc. That analysis assumed that gravitational thrust was being produced as a result of the creation of a virtual-charge gradient across the capacitor dielectric. Furthermore, on the basis of the electrogravitic coupling prediction (equation 7 from chapter 4), we would expect that this virtual-charge gradient would induce a corresponding gravity potential field. As figure 4.5c shows, the resulting oscillating gravity field gradient would induce a gravitational thrust in the negative-to-positive electric pole direction. A similar thrust would be predicted for the MEC, directed from the MEC's periphery toward its center.

In the subquantum kinetics ether concept, this radial gravity potential gradient is envisioned as a G-on concentration gradient that angles downward toward the MEC's center and whose slope varies cyclically with time. This concentration gradient would induce G-ons to diffuse radially inward at a rate that just compensates the rate at which G-ons are being added to the MEC's periphery as a result of the electrons and negative virtual-charge densities that are being pumped there and that act as G-on sources. Thus the revolving ring of roller magnets would act as an ether pump, pumping G-on sources (electrons and negative virtual-charge densities) toward the MEC's periphery, thereby lowering the G-on concentration at the MEC's center.* This outward G-on flux would likely have a rotary component aligned in the clockwise direction of magnetic ring rotation, in which case a clockwise ether vortex would be produced.

The above analysis suggests that while in operation, the MEC or Searl disc would generate a gravity field in its generator's interior where up would be oriented toward the generator's periphery and down would be oriented toward its center. Thus, the induced internal gravity gradient would act as a centripetal force that would counteract the centrifugal force of rotation. This disagrees with Barrett's inference that the gravity field in the Searl generator would be oriented with the center being up and the rim being down.[20] In the same paragraph, Barrett commented that "side effect electromagnetic forces help to keep the Searl generator together," that is, counteracting the centrifugal force of rotation. Here he is partially correct; the Searl generator induces a "side-effect" force that helps to keep it from flying apart, but this force is electrogravitic, not electromagnetic as Barrett infers. On the other hand, if the Searl generator was spinning counterclockwise, the gravity and electric field gradients would be just the reverse, and in that case the gravitational field would act to pull outward in the same direction as the mechanical centrifugal force.

*In addition to these G-on fluxes, X-on and Y-on fluxes would be induced by the radial X-on and Y-on concentration gradients, which in conventional physics are the counterparts of the electric field. Thus, at the MEC's negatively charged rim, X-on concentration would be elevated and Y-on concentration depressed, while at the MEC's center, X-on concentration would be depressed and Y-on concentration would be elevated. Consequently, accompanying the centripetal flow of G-ons there would be a centripetal flow of X-ons and a centrifugal flow of Y-ons.

Let us consider what effect this radial G-on flux would have on the Earth's gravitational field in the vicinity of the MEC. According to subquantum kinetics, the Earth is a net consumer of G-ons. Hence, it forms a radial concentration gradient in the G ether that extends out into space, with G-on concentration progressively rising with increasing distance from the surface of Earth. More specifically, this ether gradient, which corresponds to Earth's gravity potential gradient, diminishes according to the inverse of increasing radial distance, with the G-on concentration gradient progressively decreasing with increasing distance. This gradient induces G-ons in space to continually diffuse downward into Earth, where they are reactively consumed at a higher rate. This downward flux is illustrated by the large gray arrows in figure 10.15. This environmental gravity gradient extends vertically through the MEC and tends to exert a downward force on it; see my book Subquantum Kinetics for an explanation of how etheron gradients induce movement.

Figure 10.15, which displays a side view of the MEC stator and roller ring, also shows the directions in which the MEC induces G-on movement. Thus, when the MEC is operating, G-ons that normally would diffuse downward toward Earth, forming Earth's gravity field gradient, would instead be induced to move in a perpendicular direction, parallel to the MEC's rotational plane. G-ons would be drawn from above the MEC as well as from below, so G-ons residing below the MEC that normally would flow away from the MEC downward toward Earth now would diffuse upward toward the MEC's center, which establishes a low G-on concentration, or G well, when the MEC is operating. Note that the ether flux pattern mapped out here is similar to that mapped by Barrett (see figure 10.4), which was inferred from experiments with the Searl disc.

The alteration of the G-on trajectories correspondingly alters the gravity field gradient passing vertically through the MEC. Figure 10.16 shows how Earth's gravity potential gradient would be altered across vertical sections taken near the MEC's peripheral roller ring (right profile) and near its center (left profile). The dashed line indicates the gravity potential gradient that Earth normally produces. This figure shows that gravity potential is boosted in the vicinity of the roller ring because the outward flow of electrons (negative gravity mass) increases the G-on concentration near the periphery of the MEC and decreases it near its center. Objects approaching near this peripheral region would be gravitationally repelled. The opposite situation would occur near the MEC's center. Gravity potential at the center of the MEC would be decreased relative to environmental levels. Hence, objects approaching the MEC near its center would be drawn inward.

Along the MEC's midplane, at both its center and its periphery, the gravity gradient would approach a zero-gradient condition, giving the MEC a condition of weightlessness at a sufficiently high rate of rotation. Even so, the MEC would experience a net force repelling it from Earth, just like Searl's SEGs, which would suddenly rush upward after a brief period of hovering. The reason for this is that the MEC would surround itself with a gravity potential hill that would tend to screen the gravity potential well being generated at its hub. This lenticular gravity potential hill would behave just like a body of negative gravitational mass polarity. That is, under the influence of Earth's gravity potential gradient, it would spontaneously move up this gradient from a lower toward a higher potential. Consequently, the MEC's gravity potential hill field would migrate away from Earth's surface, the MEC moving along with it.* This scenario, which follows from subquantum kinetics, is consistent with Barrett's analogy that when the SEG is in the drive condition, its surrounding field is such that "the craft is shot out of the earth's field like a wet orange pip from between the fingers."[21]

If the ring of roller magnets was instead made to revolve in a counterclockwise direction, G-ons (and electrons) would be propelled radially inward, toward the center of the stator. In this case, this auxiliary vortical effect would surround itself with a gravity potential well that would tend to screen the gravity potential hill accumulated at the MEC's core. Thus, the MEC's outer field pattern would behave as though it was produced by a mass of positive gravitational polarity. Its field, then, would be attracted toward Earth and would pull the MEC downward, thereby increasing its overall weight. This is consistent with the observations of Roshchin and Godin.

*If a spacecraft was built with the MEC or Searl generator as its central engine, it would be beneficial to convey the electrons emitted from the generator's rim to the hull of the craft, which would be electrically insulated from the generator's positive plate. This would cause the entire craft to be surrounded by a high-voltage negative potential and a matter-repelling gravity potential hill.

The MEC's weight-reduction hysteresis may also have a ready explanation. This concerns the observation that when the MEC's rate of rotation passes a critical threshold, its weight decreasing with increasing rotor speed, if rotor speed is subsequently decreased, the MEC maintains its lowest attained weight even when rotor speed has been dramatically reduced. This may be an indication that much of the MEC's G-on pumping action comes from the field oscillations that produce its soliton pattern. Even though the rotor speed drops, this pattern would still be supplying energy to these oscillating fields and would continue to pump etherons.

Another prediction that emerges from subquantum kinetics is that the inertial mass of the MEC or SEG should decrease when it is operated in the levity mode (clockwise rotation). That is, in subquantum kinetics, an increase in G-on concentration (higher gravity potential) would affect the Model G ether reactions in such a manner as to cause a lengthening of all photon and particle wavelengths. That is, a rise of gravity potential would increase the Compton wavelength λ_0 of the electric potential wave pattern that characterizes the particle's field pattern.[22] This wavelength is related to the particle's inertial mass by the formula $\lambda_0 = h/m_0c$, in which h is Planck's constant and m_0 is the particle's inertial mass. So an increase in Compton wavelength is equivalent to a decrease of inertial mass. This supports Searl's claim that his SEG becomes inertia-free during operation.[23,24]

These interrelated effects of gravity-induced wavelength change and gravity-induced inertial mass change, which emerge as a necessary outcome of subquantum kinetics, allow subquantum kinetics to account for well-known astronomical phenomena such as the gravitational lensing of starlight by a massive body and orbital precession. Gravitational lensing would arise from the wavelength-alteration effect, and orbital precession would arise from the inertial-mass-alteration effect. In the past, general relativity has attempted to explain both of these as outcomes of the supposed warping of space-time by massive bodies. In the twenty-first century, the outmoded theory of general relativity will be forced to relinquish its ownership of these astronomical phenomena as subquantum kinetics enters to fill its vacuum.

This inertial-mass-alteration effect has been demonstrated in the laboratory. Kazakhstan physicist Valery Mikhailov conducted two experiments in which he observed the oscillation frequency of an electron located within a charged sphere. In one, the sphere's potential was varied between –3,000 volts and +3,000 volts, and in the other, the sphere's potential was varied between –125 kilovolts and +125 kilovolts.[25,26] He found that the electron's effective inertial mass changed in direct proportion to the applied voltage potential—decreasing with increasing negative potential and increasing with increasing positive potential. This is in agreement with the predictions of subquantum kinetics. That is, by negatively charging the sphere, the gravity potential in the interior of the sphere should be raised; hence, the inertial mass of particles in the sphere's interior should be decreased, as was observed.

Apparently unaware of subquantum kinetics, Mikhailov cited his results as confirmation of a different theoretical prediction, made by Brazilian physicist André Assis on the basis of force field interactions predicted by the electrodynamic approach of the ninteenth-century German physicist Wilhelm Weber.[27] Assis's interpretation of Weber's electrodynamics theory, however, makes the different prediction that the sign of this inertial effect should depend on the particle's electric charge; hence, a proton's inertial mass should increase when the sphere is negatively charged. Subquantum kinetics, on the other hand, predicts that the proton's inertial mass, like that of the electron, should decrease with increasing negative charge. Apparently, another experiment should be performed on the oscillation frequency of a positively charged ion to determine which of these two theories is correct. Meanwhile, we currently have only anecdotal reports on the behavior of the SEG to suggest that the subquantum kinetics alternative may be the correct outcome.

Yet another prediction coming out of subquantum kinetics concerns the phenomenon of dematerialization. It predicts that if a spacecraft's gravity potential was to rise very high, the craft could become invisible or, in some cases, could dematerialize all together. In such a case, an increase in gravity potential above a certain critical threshold, g_c, would dictate subcritical conditions in the ether reaction system, which in the extreme would cause energy waves and matter to ultimately dissipate, leaving behind uniform concentrations (i.e., the vacuum state). Further experimental evidence is needed to determine whether this could account for observations of spacecraft invisibility.

The analysis presented above for the MEC would apply equally well to Searl's multiring SEGs. Since a second added ring would rotate in the same direction as the first but would be rotating twice as fast and clockwise relative to the innermost runner ring, the gravitic effects of the two rings would be additive, effectively doubling the weight loss of the apparatus at a given rotation rate. This can be compared to operating two water pumps in series. The inner ring of roller magnets would pump G-ons outward and the outer roller magnet ring would further assist this pumping action. Adding a third ring would boost this effect even more.

Compared with the beam propulsion technology discussed in chapters 7 and 8, the SEG and the MEC appear to offer a simpler approach to gravitational levitation. However, it may not be as desirable from a weaponry standpoint in that a craft using such levitation would not be able to abruptly change its direction of flight. This may explain why the military has preferred the beam propulsion technology, since high-speed maneuverability would give a craft a distinct advantage in combat. For more-peaceful applications, such as for high-speed personal transport across the globe or beyond to other planets, the SEG and MEC technology appears to be the better choice. It also has the benefit of offering a virtually limitless energy source that could ultimately eliminate global warming. Power companies, however, will need to reeducate themselves rapidly on basic physics and engineering so as not to follow the police-state tactics of their predecessors. For example, in May 1982, government agents broke into Searl's home, confiscated an SEG unit that was under test supplying electricity to his house, and tore out all the electrical wiring from his house. Citing as evidence a sequence of unusually low metered electrical bills, the Southern Electricity Board then prosecuted him on trumped-up charges of "stealing electricity by means of a unique device," and sued him for a large sum of money. As a result, Searl's family broke up and he became very depressed. The Court had him confined to jail for about a year and while so detained an arsonist set his house on fire, destroying most of his records and equipment.[28]

Roshchin and Godin do not presently have access to their earlier generator. Reminiscent of Searl's plight, they report that their first prototype was stolen from their laboratory. However, they are currently working on building a second prototype at the Glushko "NPE Energomash" Company in Moscow with the intention of duplicating their earlier results (figure 10.17). Groups led by Searl in the United Kingdom and by American researcher John Thomas in the United States are also undertaking projects that intend to duplicate Searl's earlier work.

ELECTROGRAVITIC WAVE EXPERIMENTS

11.1 ■ THE DIMITRIOU GRAVITY SHIELD

Stavros Dimitriou, a professor of electrical engineering, has performed an experiment that may demonstrate some degree of gravity shielding. Like the SEG, the weight-loss effect produced by Dimitriou's apparatus appears to arise because electrons are induced to move radially in and out from a central point in a plane oriented perpendicular to the Earth's gravity field. Dimitriou arranged a set of eight wire loops in a radial pattern, the loops' ends being joined at upper- and lower-hub junctures (see figure 11.1).[1] The entire "antenna," which has a diameter of about 90 centimeters, was suspended from the ceiling by means of a thread.

A 15-volt, square-wave pulse signal having a frequency of about 75 megahertz was applied across the antenna's upper and lower hubs to excite currents to oscillate back and forth through the wire loops. These currents would flow radially with respect to the hubs and for the most part parallel to the Earth's surface. Dimitriou was supplying a radio-frequency power of only 2.5 watts to his antenna. In order to maximize the current flowing in the loops, the excitation frequency was chosen to match the antenna's resonant frequency, at which a quarter of a wavelength would fit across the loop's approximately 1-meter radius. At resonance, the currents circulating in the loops would be far higher than the AC exciting current, with maximum values being reached at the antenna's periphery. For example, if his loop system had a Q-resonance quality factor of 90, the 100-milliamp AC signal would have excited currents reaching up to 9 amperes.

Dimitriou measured the antenna's ability to alter gravity by swinging it back and forth on its suspending thread and measuring its period of oscillation, with the AC turned both on and off. Comparing the periods, he found that the antenna's swing period was slightly greater when the AC was on. Since the length of the antenna's suspending cord did not change, he concluded that the antenna was able to locally reduce the gravitational accelerating force by 1.3 percent, with the period of any swing of the pendulum being determined by its length and the force of gravity acting on its mass.* He believed that this reduction arose because currents induced in the loops were somehow creating a local gravity-shielding effect. He also swung a small pendulum bob that he held near the radio-frequency antenna and, by timing its swing, found that its period also increased when the antenna was excited.[2] Consequently, he concluded that objects in the immediate vicinity of the antenna were similarly affected by the gravity reduction.

*Period = $2\pi\sqrt{\frac{L}{g}}$, in which L is the length of the pendulum cord and g is the gravitational acceleration.

The question that arises, however, is whether the reported percentage of reduction in the gravitational acceleration, g, is a real effect or a statistical artifact. There is considerable error involved in measuring the period of a pendulum. Even with no variation of the gravitational force or the pendulum length, the clocked period of the bob's swing can vary from one clocked period to the next due to friction in the pendulum string, room air currents, and timing inaccuracies. Consequently, such a pendulum period measurement has meaning only if many sets of measurements are made with the AC signal both turned on and turned off, for which period averages and period standard deviations are calculated. If the difference between the average length of the "on" periods and the average length of the "off" periods is shown to be significantly greater than the data standard deviation, then one might surmise that a real effect on gravity is present. But past reports of the existence of a g reduction effect may instead be misinterpreting statistical artifacts of the measurement process as evidence of a real effect.

French researcher Jean-Louis Naudin attempted to duplicate Dimitriou's pendulum antenna experiment.[3] He built a similar wire loop array and excited it at a resonant frequency of 83 megahertz. Whereas Dimitriou had used a handheld stopwatch to clock the antenna swing period, Naudin allowed the antenna pendulum to cut the path of a laser beam as it swung and recorded the swing intervals electronically. Measuring the period increase of the pendulum swing, he calculated a much greater, 7 percent reduction in gravitational acceleration when the oscillator was switched on. In another version of the experiment, Naudin tested the period swing of an antenna having wire loops that each included an extra turn at its outer extremities, with the extra loops being oriented in the horizontal plane. With this design, Naudin measured an 11 percent reduction in gravitic force, for a power consumption of about 3.5 watts. Both test rigs were found to have a Q value of about 10.*

*Naudin's Q value was likely lower than that of Dimitriou's antenna because Naudin made his loops from uncoated wire that was subject to surface oxidation and, hence, would have had a greater surface resistance. At megahertz frequencies, such as were used in this experiment, current flows mainly on the wire surface. Hence, surface oxides can diminish the antenna's Q value.

However, like Dimitriou, Naudin reported only an estimated percentage of gravitational reduction, without providing the standard deviation values to allow one to judge the accuracy of the method of measurement. Thus, until a test of the radio frequency (RF) pendulum antenna is properly performed giving the purported RF-induced period change along with the variance of the period measurement, it is not possible to determine for certain if the effect is real. All that can be said at present is that it is an interesting subject for investigation.

Dimitriou also proposed another version of his RF pendulum antenna experiment in which the wire loops of his antenna are replaced by a disc-shaped printed circuit board having copper-clad upper and lower surfaces electrically joined at its periphery (figure 11.2).[4] In this way, the two surfaces would form a pancake-shaped RF cavity that would have a beneficial high Q value. He proposed that the lift effect would be more easily seen by testing a 30-degree pie section of the disc and observing its tilt when energized with radio-frequency power, given that a greater weight loss would be obtained at the sector's periphery than at its center.

Naudin has attempted to duplicate Dimitriou's RF pie-wedge experiment. The wedge shown in figure 11.3 was balanced around its center of gravity and checked for evidence of any tilt when energized with a radio-frequency-exciting circuit connected at its apex. Naudin reported that he was able to get some weak upward movements of the wedge's rim, but that these movements were not easily reproducible.

In 2007, I witnessed several tests of the disc version of the Dimitriou RF pendulum antenna being resonantly excited with 20-volt pulses, but in my opinion there was no change of the pendulum's period above the margin of measurement error; hence, no clear indication that gravity was being reduced when the disc was energized. If there was an effect, it was too slight to be detected. By accurately recording large numbers of pendulum swing periods, it should be possible to substantially reduce the variance in the period measurement data, in which case the sensitivity of the test to detecting small alterations in gravity might be improved. If future tests demonstrate that a gravity-screening effect is produced, this would be one of the most promising among electrogravitic technologies, not only because of its simplicity, but also because of its high energy efficiency.

Although it may be too early to theorize about how Dimitriou's wire and disc antennae might produce a gravity-screening effect, we might venture an explanation similar to that given for the operation of the Searl disc. That is, one might expect a gravity-screening effect to arise because G-ons are being induced to move in a horizontal direction (i.e., perpendicular to the Earth's gravity field gradient). The AC resonance in the antenna would set up oscillating electric potential field gradients directed radially inward and outward along the length of the upper or lower conductor wires. Alternatively, in the case of the RF disc, these would be directed radially to and from the centers of upper or lower disc surfaces. These oscillating field gradients would be steepest near the periphery of the wire loops (or disc surfaces), where the induced currents would also be maximal. According to subquantum kinetics, these oscillating electric fields would be accompanied by oscillating gravity potential fields whose field gradients would also be maximal at the loop or disc periphery. Consequently, the radial back-and-forth movement of electrons would be accompanied by a horizontal radial back-and-forth movement of G-ons. The oscillating gravity field propelling these G-ons in the horizontal plane would also entrain G-ons associated with the vertical G-on flux that naturally flows toward the Earth in response to the Earth's gravity field gradient. Consequently, in the vicinity of this oscillating electrode, the ambient G-on flux and its associated G-on concentration gradient would be deflected from their normal vertical orientation toward the horizontal. As a result, objects in the vicinity of this disc would no longer feel the full downward pull of the Earth's gravity, being effectively screened from this field by the disrupting effect of this AC resonator.

In the Searl disc, the pulsing fields were nonreversing and always induced G-ons (and electrons) to move radially outward toward the periphery of the disc. In that case, then, an occupant of such a vehicle would feel a centripetal inward-pulling gravitational force. In a gravity shield created by radio-frequency excitation of a Dimitriou antenna, on the other hand, the direction of this radial G-on flux would reverse 100 million times per second or so. Consequently, the horizontal gravity field component would have a net-zero value.

Brown may have inadvertently been producing such a gravity-screening effect in his vertical-lift electrokinetic apparatus. His electrokinetics patent proposed applying AC to a negatively charged "half-wave radiator" disc electrode positioned at the tip of a conical dielectric (see figure 3.8 in chapter 3). Like Dimitriou's disc, this would have propelled G-ons radially inward and outward in the plane of the disc and set up a gravity-screening field in the electrode's immediate vicinity. The induced G-on flux would have locally redirected the G-on flux that normally moves downward toward the Earth to flow in a horizontal direction, thus decreasing the gravity field gradient across the saucer and locally reducing the g-value affecting the saucer's mass. The AC oscillations induced in the positively charged canopy electrode would also have contributed to the gravity-screening effect. Thus, part of the lift that Brown was getting might be attributed to an induced gravity-screening effect.

11.2 ■ LOW-VOLTAGE SAWTOOTH-WAVE EXPERIMENTS

In the mid-1990s, Dimitriou conducted an experiment in which he radiated sawtooth waves from the end of a specially configured dipole antenna.[5] The antenna, which is shown in figure 11.4, measured 18.5 by 12.5 centimeters. A detailed explanation of why it was constructed in this fashion may be found in his master's thesis. He excited the antenna with a 1.1-megahertz, 15.5-volt peak-to-peak RC-Norton signal of the sort graphed in figure 7.6b. The oscillating current would have reached its maximum value along its central wire axis and attained lower values in the two outlying wires, each of which was capacitively loaded with a total of 53 picofarads.

Dimitriou discovered that the antenna created a gravitational force in line with its central axis when it was being excited with this sawtooth wave. He suspended a 4.1-gram, 1.5-centimeter-diameter glass sphere at the end of a 2-meter cotton string from the ceiling, positioning the sphere close to one end of the central antenna wire. A grounded copper plate was placed between the antenna and the pendulum to screen any electromagnetic effects. He observed that when the antenna was energized, a longitudinal force was exerted on the nearby test pendulum. When placed near the negative end of the central antenna wire, the bob was attracted with a force of 4 dynes, indicating that it was subject to a gravitational attraction of 0.1 percent. When placed near the positive end of the central wire, it was repelled with a force of 3 dynes, that is, repelled with a gravitic force of 0.08 percent g. Dimitriou theorized that this gravitic force was exerted on the test mass by a beam of gravity waves emitted from the end of the central wire.

In yet another experiment, Dimitriou demonstrated that sawtooth waveforms produced frequency shifts in light being emitted from the junction of a light-emitting diode (LED). He reasoned that the LED's junction functioned as a miniature capacitor and that the sawtooth wave created a gravitational force that induced it to move, with the motion producing a Doppler shift of the LED's frequency. He measured the resulting velocity change of the junction by observing the amount and sign of the frequency Doppler shifting that this motion induced in the LED's light. A blueshift (frequency increase) indicated a forward thrust of the LED's light-emitting junction, and a redshift (frequency decrease) indicated a reverse thrust of the junction.

Dimitriou excited the LED with a 1.85-megahertz sawtooth wave having an amplitude of about 2 volts peak-to-peak. The voltage was adjusted so that the LED began to emit its light just when the voltage reached its peak value. This was done because as the LED junction reaches full luminance, it loses it capacitive characteristics and, hence, no longer functions electrogravitically.

He studied the effect of two types of waveforms. One was an RC-RC waveform of the type pictured in figure 7.5b, with an exponential voltage rise that lasted one-third as long as its exponential voltage decline. The other sawtooth wave was a ramp-type wave having a linear rise and linear fall, also in a one-to-three duration ratio. The leading edge of the exponential waveform produced a frequency blueshift equal to 8.16 millimeters per second, and its trailing edge produced a frequency redshift equal to 2.85 millimeters per second, which was 2.86 times less. The ramp sawtooth waveform surprisingly produced frequency shifts as well, with the leading-edge velocity shift being 2.57 times the trailing-edge velocity shift. Also, the ramp wave produced velocity shifts that were about 2.7 times less than those produced by the exponential waveform.

The velocity change cannot be attributed solely to the electrogravitic effects of virtual charges since, if such were the case, the ramp waveform, whose potential varied linearly with distance, should have induced no velocity change in the LED junction. Alternatively, it is possible that the frequency shift of the LED junction arose because the sawtooth waves induced changes in the electrical characteristics of the junction through some unknown effect.

Dimitriou also performed a series of experiments in which he repeatedly charged and discharged a parallel plate capacitor with an RC-Norton sawtooth wave similar to that shown in figure 11.5 and looked for evidence of whether the capacitor was experiencing a gravitational thrust.[6–8] He experimented with sawtooth-wave frequencies ranging from several hundred kilohertz up to slightly more than 1 megahertz, having a comparably low peak voltage of up to 12.4 volts. He produced this waveform using the circuit shown in figure 11.6, which consists of a 7555 integrated circuit chip, two capacitors, and a charging resistor R_1 in series with the test capacitor. The value of this resistor was chosen to be 2,367 ohms, $2\pi Z_o$, in which Z_o is the free space impedance of 376.7 ohms.

Dimitriou applied this waveform to two capacitors attached to either end of a 38-centimeter-long rotor arm, repeatedly charging and discharging them at a 238-kilohertz frequency (see figure 11.7). Each capacitor measured 8 centimeters and consisted of a 1-centimeter-thick slab of copper flanked by two thin sheets of dielectric that, in turn, were flanked by 0.5-millimeter-thick bronze end plates. The outer bronze plates served as the capacitor's positive and negative electrodes. Dimitriou reported that when he energized them with this sawtooth wave, the capacitors developed a thrust in the negative-to-positive direction, causing the rotor arm direction to twist by about 5 millimeters, which was equivalent to a one-degree rotation. He also ran a similar test made with an air gap instead of a dielectric between the capacitor's plates and reported that it also produced a thrust. Thus he concluded that the effect did not depend on the presence of a dielectric.

In March 2007, I conducted my own tests of Dimitriou's thrust capacitor effect. I constructed printed circuit board capacitors measuring about 3.5 by 5 centimeters and having a capacitance of about 410 picofarads. A piece of aluminum foil formed one plate and the copper-clad printed circuit board formed the other plate, both separated by a layer of double-stick tape. I also built an RC-Norton oscillator based on the circuit diagram shown in figure 11.6 and used it to energize the capacitor with 15-volt sawtooth waves having a frequency of about 1 megahertz. I hung an 80-centimeter-long pendulum bob near one face of the capacitor, but observed no deflection when the capacitor was energized (i.e., $\Delta x < 1$ mm). This indicated that any lateral gravitational acceleration produced in the immediate vicinity of the capacitor would have had to be smaller than 0.1 percent g. I also used a waveform generator built by Dimitriou and got the same null result.

For another test, I constructed a capacitor measuring 10 by 13.5 centimeters and placed it horizontally on a milligram balance that was sensitive to 1 milligram weight changes. When energized with the RC-Norton sawtooth waveform, no weight change was observed. Since the capacitor itself weighed 85 grams, this indicated that there was no change in gravitational acceleration larger than 0.001 percent g.

To check the Dimitriou capacitor rotor experiment, I built a rotor setup similar to that shown in figure 11.7. The capacitors were constructed from two 30-mil rectangular copper slabs measuring 10.5 by 14 centimeters and separated from one another by a thin polyethylene-film layer. The capacitors each weighed about 200 grams and had a capacitance of 655 picofarads. They were mounted at opposite ends of a 90-centimeter-long stick that was suspended from the ceiling at its center point (see figure 11.8). The sawtooth-wave generator and its battery-power supply was attached to the stick. I worked with Professor Panagiotis Pappas and his assistants to carry out tests of the apparatus in his Athens laboratory. We energized both capacitors with the RC-Norton wave, but could see no persistent rotation of the apparatus.

Checking the sawtooth wave with an oscilloscope, we found that an unwanted high-frequency oscillation was present in the waveform, which was due to inductance added by a long lead wire connecting the wave generator to both capacitors. To eliminate this oscillation, we placed the wave generator as close as possible to one of the capacitors and disconnected the wire supplying RF to the other capacitor. The second capacitor, then, was used as an inert counterbalance weight at the opposite end of the rotor arm.

that would reverse the sawtooth-wave polarity to the capacitor. Thus, by operating a switch in the adjoining observation room, we could momentarily turn on a room light and activate the photo-relay circuit to reverse the capacitor polarity without actually touching the apparatus. Pappas also set up a video camera on the ceiling that looked down on the capacitor rotor so we could view any movement of the apparatus remotely from the observation room. This was done to minimize the chance that air currents produced by movement of people in the room or by their breathing would disturb the apparatus. We found that it would take at least an hour for the swinging of the apparatus to subside, and even then oscillations would still be present due to room drafts.

We energized the capacitor with a 1.5-megahertz RC-Norton wave, remotely reversing the waveform polarity on the capacitor, but we saw no comparable reversal or alteration in the swing of the apparatus. We concluded that no gravitational-thrust effect on the rotor could be seen other than the rotor's ongoing slow oscillations arising from room drafts. Using a makeshift tensometer, I determined that if the capacitor was able to develop a gravitational force of at least 0.04 percent g, a persistent rotary movement of the apparatus should have been observed. The null result, then, calls into question claims that low-voltage waveforms are able to induce gravitational thrusts on capacitors.

Later, Pappas modified the rotor assembly so that the sawtooth-wave generator was supplied with 16 volts DC via fine feed wires attached to the rotor's suspension wire, with the power switch being situated in the observation room. In this way, we were able to turn the wave generator on and off from our remote location. We also deactivated the polarity-reversing relay to omit any vibrations that arose when the relay was energized. After allowing several hours for the apparatus to equilibrate, power was turned on and later turned off, but no thrust could be seen other than the swings arising from room drafts.

Naudin reported that he had duplicated the Dimitriou capacitor rotor experiment and had observed a 1-degree rotation of the apparatus. Our rotor was constructed in a fashion similar to that of Naudin's except our capacitor plates were made from sheet copper instead of sheet aluminum and we activated only one of the two rotors. Based on our results, we are left to wonder whether the 1-degree rotation Naudin reported was due to air currents and not to a true detection of gravitational thrust. In his description of the experiment, Naudin acknowledged that air currents could pose a problem to the stability of the capacitor rotor arm.

Dimitriou's original rotor experiment used capacitors that were much more massive than those used in our experiment, since they each incorporated a 1-centimeter-thick copper slab. Thus, the rotor experiment should be repeated using copper slabs of similar thickness to see if a positive result is obtained. Another experiment that should be duplicated is a rotor experiment that Dimitriou demonstrated to professors at the University of Manchester. In that case, two 1.5-centimeter-diameter mica capacitors were placed at opposite ends of a 25-centimeter rod that was suspended at its center. When energized with an RC-Norton waveform, the arm reportedly rotated 20 degrees.

Dimitriou has developed a working theory that has guided his experimental discoveries, details of which are given in his master's thesis. He makes a number of deductions from conventional electrostatic and gravitation theory that have led him to assume an equivalence between the rate of change of a capacitor's charging current and a gravitational acceleration acting on the capacitor. Alternatively, he formulates this as a relationship between an accelerating rate of change of a capacitor's electric field intensity and a consequent gravitational acceleration acting on the capacitor. As shown in the text box below, his electrogravitic acceleration relationship (13) is in agreement with the subquantum kinetics prediction of how virtual charge induces gravitational force given by equation 8 in chapter 4.

Equivalence of the Dimitriou Electrogravitic Theory with That of Subquantum Kinetics

Dimitriou assumes that a constant current, i, producing a constant rate of change of charge, dQ/dt, on a capacitor should be equivalent to effecting a proportionate state of motion in the capacitor and inducing its movement at a constant velocity, v, relative to the charge's frame of reference, mathematically expressed as:

$$i = \frac{dQ}{dt} \propto -v \tag{10}$$

Alternatively, given that a constantly charging current will produce a constant increase in the rate of change of electric field intensity, $d\mathbf{E}/dt$, he states that this rate of increase should be equivalent to a proportionate state of motion at velocity, v, expressed as:

$$i = \varepsilon S\, \frac{d\mathbf{E}}{dt} \propto -v \tag{11}$$

in which ε is the dielectric constant of the capacitor and S is its surface area. Note that electric field intensity is the same as the negative of the voltage gradient across the capacitor (i.e., $\mathbf{E} = -\nabla\varphi_E$). Thus he posits that a linear increase in charge on a capacitor plate, or linear increase in voltage gradient across a set of capacitor plates, is equivalent to a virtual velocity vector directed toward the capacitor's positive pole, but that this does not result in any acceleration or motional displacement of the capacitor.

Further, Dimitriou deduces that the rate of change of current, di/dt, producing an accelerating change in the amount of charge on a capacitor, d^2Q/dt^2, or an accelerating change in the electric field intensity across the capacitor plates, $d^2\mathbf{E}/dt^2$, should be equivalent to effecting a state in which the capacitor behaves as though it was subject to a gravitational acceleration, $\mathbf{a}_g$, expressed as:

$$\frac{di}{dt} = \frac{d^2Q}{dt^2} = \varepsilon S\,\frac{d^2\mathbf{E}}{dt^2} \propto -\mathbf{a}_g \tag{12}$$

Thus, he supposes that an accelerating increase in charge on a capacitor plate, or accelerating increase in voltage gradient across a set of capacitor plates, is equivalent to an acceleration of the capacitor toward its positive pole. He presumes that exertion of a gravitational force and displacement of a capacitor occur only in situations of the second kind, as in equation 12, in which the capacitor's electric field intensity increases or decreases nonlinearly with time.

On the assumption that the electric field intensity is conceived as a wave traveling at the speed of light and that its amplitude changes with distance in the same manner as it changes with time, equation 12 may be expressed in terms of the change of electric potential with respect to distance, r, rather than with respect to time, t, as follows:

$$\varepsilon\,\frac{d^2\mathbf{E}}{dr^2} = \varepsilon\,\frac{d^2}{dr^2}\Big(\nabla\varphi_E(\,r\,)\Big) = \varepsilon\nabla\Big(\nabla^2\varphi_E\,(r)\Big) \propto \mathbf{a}_g \tag{13}$$

in which $\mathbf{E} = -\nabla\varphi_E$. Given that $\mathbf{a}_g = \mathbf{F}_g/m$, this may be seen to be identical to equation 8, the subquantum kinetic coupling relation derived in chapter 4 that expresses the electrogravitic effects of virtual charge densities.

Dimitriou's theory relates electrogravitic acceleration to charging current, which is advantageous from an electrical engineering standpoint since the output of a wave generator is often described in terms of the current it generates. Subquantum kinetics, however, has the advantage of offering a conceptual model that allows one to see what might be going on to cause there to be this electrogravitic linkage. It allows one to see the connection between electric field potential, virtual-electric-charge density, gravity field potential, and gravitational acceleration. Subquantum kinetics also shows that a first derivative of electric field potential may also be important in the high-frequency regime. It is interesting that Dimitriou arrived independently at an experimentally based formulation that is equivalent to the electrogravitic formulation of subquantum kinetics.

In summary, further research is needed to check out Dimitriou's findings. I believe that an electrogravitic thrust effect should exist, but at wave voltages much higher than the ones Dimitrou and Naudin were using. Additional experimentation with sawtooth waves in the kilovolt range should hopefully bring this electrogravitic thrust phenomenon up to a detectable level. Similarly, additional experiments should be conducted to excite Dimitriou's disc antenna with RF in the kilovolt range to determine with greater certainty whether gravity screening is produced.

HIGH-VOLTAGE ELECTROGRAVITICS EXPERIMENTS

Investigations into electrogravitics have continued outside of the classified world as amateur researchers, inspired by Brown's work, have striven to reproduce his results. Experiments conducted by a few researchers are reviewed below. The reader should be aware that one takes a considerable risk when working with high voltages, since high-voltage power supplies can deliver lethal shocks. Thus, it is not recommended that people undertake these experiments unless they are thoroughly familiar with the hazards involved and have taken proper safety precautions.

12.1 TOM TURMAN'S ELECTROKINETICS EXPERIMENTS

Electrical engineer Tom Turman's initial inspiration to do research in electrogravitics came after reading a 1958 article by Gaston Burridge about Brown's work. In an attempt to duplicate some of Brown's flying-disc experiments, Turman conducted private electrogravitics research between 1965 and 1972, while studying electrical engineering at Texas Tech University. In 1968, he began corresponding with Brown, both by telephone and by letter. He told Brown about the experiments he was performing and asked if Brown could clarify some aspects of his flying-disc experiments. Brown was impressed with Turman's independent work and at one point was seriously considering hiring him as his assistant. Unfortunately, circumstances did not permit him to follow through.

Turman did not have university funding to help him carry out his research. Most of the equipment he acquired for his task was either given to him or purchased at a low price from electrical surplus dealers and subsequently reconditioned. He had a homemade power supply capable of delivering 300 kilovolts DC at up to 100 milliamperes, an eight-channel oscillograph for use in measuring voltage, current, and force, and a capacitance-type gauge capable of measuring small changes in the weight of a suspended electrogravitic test device.

Turman built several types of lightweight, asymmetrical capacitor devices. One cylindrical device that he built weighed between 3 and 6 grams and achieved maximum thrusts equal to as much as half of its weight.[1] For this design, he used a sheet of insulating plastic film that was a few mils thick and was wrapped around a cylinder 4.75 inches in diameter and 4.4 inches long (figure 12.1). A 2.4-inch-wide aluminum-foil skirt was wrapped around the lower end of the cylinder, with a 0.5-inch overlap onto the plastic film, to serve as the negative electrode. The positive electrode was an aluminum-foil tube measuring 0.25 inch in diameter and 3.6 inches in length that was located at the opposite end of the cylinder and positioned in line with the cylinder's axis so that half the tube extended into the cylinder's interior.

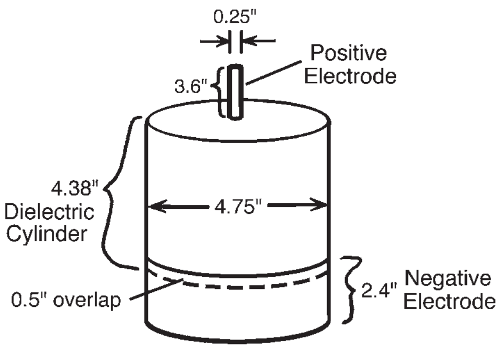

Figure 12.1. A cylindrical-shaped ion-producing device built and tested by Tom Turman. Its construction was based on reports of "lifter" tests carried out by Thomas Townsend Brown. (Based on a sketch by Turman)

Turman found that lift increased exponentially with increasing voltage, V, approximately as V^2 to V^3, confirming similar results found in Brown's earlier work. Turman's cylinders developed thrusts ranging from 0.3 to 3.5 grams (5 to 50 grains) when energized with voltages ranging from 35 to 135 kilovolts with a current draw of a few milliamps. He found that the amount of thrust depended on the type of insulating film he used in making the cylinder. He obtained greater thrusts with materials having greater dielectric constants, observing thrust to increase according to K^2 to $K^{2.3}$ (figure 12.2). He also found that thrust depended on the dimensions of the device, such as the length of the positive electrode and its depth of penetration into the cylinder, the length of the cylinder, and to some extent the width of the aluminum-foil skirt. Data from thrust tests he conducted on a 13.75-inch-diameter cylinder are presented in table 1.

Curves are shown for Kaptan (K = 3.7), Mylar (K = 3.1), acetate film (K = 2.9), and high-density polyethylene (K = 2.3). (After T. Turman)

Turman obtained the greatest thrust when applying high-voltage DC pulses, an effect Brown also had noted. When energized in a pulsed fashion, Turman's device achieved thrusts nearly sufficient to self-levitate. He found that his cylinder would also develop a thrust when energized with AC, but not as much as when energized with DC. The unbalanced electrostatic force effect described in chapter 3 accounts for the thrust that would be developed when a reversed voltage polarity was applied to the cylinder. Regardless of whether the smaller upper electrode had a positive or negative polarity, more ions would have been emitted in the vicinity of the small upper electrode, where the electric field density was greater, and this would have exerted a strong upward-repulsive force. This force would have been greater than the downward-repulsive force component produced in the vicinity of the lower-cylindrical electrode, where fewer oppositely charged ions would have been generated and where the consequent repulsive force would primarily have been directed radially outward, away from the cylinder's central axis. Consequently, electrostatic ion-repulsion effects appear to dominate over electrogravitic effects in lightweight devices producing a nonlinear field. The same applies to the lifter experiments carried out by later researchers.

Turman noted that his cylindrical thruster device was a copious producer of ion wind, and hence, he could not rule out ion wind as the principle mode of propulsion. However, observing that the electric field between the two electrodes was highly nonlinear, he predicted that the device should exhibit a discernible Biefeld-Brown effect when tested in a vacuum environment. He had almost finished building the vacuum equipment necessary to conduct these tests when he had to disassemble everything and move his residence due to a job change. Afterward, he never reassembled his equipment.

Turman's cylindrical device did not come close to giving the kind of vertical lift that Brown had obtained from his 100-gram, triarcuate-shaped disc (figure 3.2). Nevertheless, Brown expressed considerable interest in the design. In one of their telephone conversations, when Turman told Brown about getting really good thrust from his cylinder devices, Brown quizzed him extensively about them and said, "[M]ake some drawings and send me those drawings because I am really interested in those cylinders." Turman sent him some drawings and data, and subsequently, on November, 1, 1971, Brown wrote back, saying, "Your sketch shows a point and ring configuration of electrodes with an intermediate dielectric tube. I take it the ends of this tube are open and the airflow is in the direction of the divergent field. This would make the tube assembly move in the opposite direction, that is, toward the small positive electrode. Is this not so? . . . Have you observed any thrust with the positive end of the tube closed?"[2]

Another asymmetrical capacitor design that Turman tested consisted of a flat 8-inch-diameter disc of polyethylene film with aluminum-foil electrodes attached to its upper and lower surfaces.[3] The upper

(positive) and lower (negative) electrodes consisted of a 1-inch-diameter foil disc and a 7-inch-diameter foil ring (see figure 12.3). The disc was supported by a balsa-wood structure attached by monofilament lines to an equal arm balance for weight measurement. The device was found to develop a lift of up to 30 percent of its weight when energized. As with the cylindrical device, this flat disc also developed lift when AC was applied to it, but not as much as with DC voltage. Also, the device was found to perform better with DC pulses than with steady DC.

Turman also attempted to duplicate Brown's flying-disc device. He made a 28-inch-diameter saucer out of cardboard and covered it with aluminum foil (figure 12.4).[4] The disc was 2.5 inches thick at its center and tapered to 0.12-inch-diameter blunt edge at its periphery. He curved a 125-mil-diameter brass rod 70 degrees around the disc to serve as the outboard positively charged electrode and spaced it 4.75 inches from the negatively charged disc with a series of Plexiglas insulators. In a static test, the device developed only 4.5 grams of thrust when energized to 80 kilovolts. This yielded a thrust-to-weight ratio of only 1 percent, far lower than even the thrusts observed in the 1952 Office of Naval Research tests in which Brown's discs developed thrusts of 18 grams under a charge of 47 kilovolts. Because of this disappointing performance, Turman wrote to Brown inquiring what might be wrong with the basic design he had used.

In his November 1, 1971, letter (see appendix A), Brown responded by drawing a picture of his electric disc (shown in figure 2.6). This indicated that Brown used a much smaller-gauge wire as his positive electrode, one that had a diameter of 1 mil (0.001 inch). In his electrokinetic apparatus patent, Brown noted that small-diameter wires should be used for discs energized with voltages less than 125 kilovolts. For discs energized at higher voltages, he recommended that the positive electrode consist of a hollow pipe or rod having a diameter of 0.25 to

0.50 inch. Turman, however, tested his discs in the lower-voltage range with a wire that was more than one hundred times larger in diameter than Brown would have used. This may explain why Turman got lower thrust from his disc. Also, the radius of curvature of the edge of the triarcuate disc in Brown's drawing was eight times larger than in Tom's design (0.50 inch rather than 0.06 inch). In designing his disc, Turman had originally been guided by the diagram Brown gave in his 1960 electrokinetic apparatus patent.

In a subsequent telephone conversation, Turman learned from Brown that the patent did not include a depiction of an optimal design and that the blunt-edge design performed better because it produced a more nonlinear field configuration between its electrodes. Brown emphasized the importance of creating a nonlinear E-field to maximize thrust. Although Brown's patents mentioned nonlinearity, Turman found that Brown placed far more emphasis on this point in his personal conversations. If Turman had decreased the diameter of his positive leading-edge electrode wire by a factor of 120 and had shaped the edge of his negatively charged disc to have a gradual curvature, he would have greatly increased the nonlinearity of the disc's electric field. This would have produced a substantially greater ion emission from the vicinity of his positive electrode, whose forward-acting repulsive forces would have translated into a substantially higher forward thrust for the disc.

Turman asked Brown many other questions as well: Compared with the results of a static test, is the propulsion efficiency of the device increased if it is allowed to run in a circular course? Does the ratio of thrust to weight increase as the size of the disc is increased? What was the largest-size disc that you constructed and what were the problems you encountered? Brown was reticent on the subject.

Turman also built an asymmetrical capacitor device to test the performance of a slatlike device described in Brown's 1960 electrokinetic apparatus patent (see figure 12.5).[5] It bore a close resemblance to the lifter devices that later became popular among electrogravitics hobbyists, but it was of much heavier construction. Turman used a stack of four brass slats as the negative electrode, each slat measuring 1 inch by 12 inches, and a 12-gauge (110-mil-diameter) copper wire as the outboard positive electrode.* Turman said that his device produced a tremendous ion wind when energized with 30 kilovolts. In addition to applying high-voltage DC to the electrodes, he electrically heated the positive electrode using a modified 12-volt X-ray-tube filament transformer. He found that by heating the positive electrode, he was able to get a greatly increased thrust. He noted that luminous ionization beads would form at regularly spaced intervals along the wire, forming sites where ions were discharged at a higher rate. As the wire was heated to a higher temperature, an increasing number of beads would form along the length of the wire. In his 1928 patent, Brown similarly proposed electrode heating as a means of improving the electrogravitic thrust of his vacuum tube gravitator cells (recall figure 1.6).

Turman noted that after a black oxide coating had formed on the wire, he could still get a lot of thrust, even when he stopped heating the wire. The oxide-coated wire apparently produced a lot more thrust than did a clean copper wire. Turman felt that Brown's flying discs may have used a positive electrode wire that was coated with some exotic material to enhance ion emission. Such a film may have formed on the wire's surface as the result of heating and oxidation. For example, rare-earth oxides are used in radio tubes to enhance the emission of electrons from their filaments. The same type of coating might also enhance the formation of positive ions at the surface of a positively charged electrode. Brown did not mention using heated or coated wires in his flying-disc experiments, and Turman never brought up the subject with him since he performed his tests on heating wires years after he had talked with Brown.

More recently, after reading my paper on the B-2 bomber, Turman speculated that the leading edge of the B-2's wing may have an oxide or chemical coating to enhance ionization. Another way of inducing ionization might be to use RF excitation. According to one source, a major aerospace company had taken out a patent in the late 1950s on a method of using high-frequency voltage on the skin of planes to reduce air drag. A similar technique might be employed in electrifying the B-2.

*Turman did not state the thickness of his slats.

12.2 ■ LARRY DEAVENPORT'S ELECTROKINETIC DISC TEST

In 1995, independent researcher Larry Deavenport carried out high-voltage tests designed to investigate Brown's electric disc experiment. He constructed a 16-inch-long armature made from shellacked balsa wood and suspended two aluminum discs 5.5 inches below each end of the arm (figure 12.6).[6] Each disc measured about 2.6 inches in diameter and was one-eighth of an inch thick at the center, tapering to 20 mils (0.02 inch) at the edge. A curved piece of brass wire measuring about 50 mils in diameter and held 1.8 inches from the disc by shellacked balsa wood fingers served as the positive leading-edge electrode. Each disc weighed approximately 33.5 grams. The entire carousel rig was pivoted at its center of gravity on a needle bearing.

When the discs were energized with 0.8 milliamp at 30 kilovolts DC, the apparatus revolved at a speed averaging three-quarters of a revolution per second and reaching as high as one revolution per second (4 feet per second). Ballistic pendulum measurements determined that the discs produced a thrust of 0.58 gram when energized at 25 kilovolts and 1.7 grams when energized at 50 kilovolts.

Deavenport had used a 50-mil-diameter wire, much finer than the 125-mil-diameter wire that Turman had used. However, Deavenport's wire still was about fifty times thicker than what Brown recommended in his letter to Turman. According to Brown, using a smaller-diameter wire would have increased the field nonlinearity around the leading electrode and that would have boosted the thrust developed by the discs.

Deavenport also conducted carousel tests of a cylindrical electrokinetic device made from aluminum bottles.[7] He was able to get the apparatus to revolve at up to one revolution per second by applying high voltage between 50-mil-diameter curved emitter wires secured at the bow and stern of the cylinder and separated from the cylinder by about 2 inches. The rear wire was connected to the cylinder body. He found that the apparatus revolved slightly faster when a negative potential was applied to the lead wire, indicating that the propulsion he was seeing was primarily electrostatic and not gravitic. Deavenport's disc electrodes instead performed better with their lead wire made positive, as in Brown's experiments. Nevertheless, this suggests that Brown's electrokinetic discs most likely would also have revolved if charged with a reverse polarity and that a large fraction of their thrust may have been due to electrostatic force effects.

12.3 ■ ROBERT TALLEY'S ELECTROGRAVITIC ROTOR TEST

Between 1988 and 1991, Robert Talley conducted research at Veritay Technology Inc. to investigate Brown's electrogravitic rotor experiment.[8] The project was financed by a Small Business Innovation Research grant under sponsorship of Phillips Laboratory at Edwards Air Force Base. Talley's experiment was similar to the vacuum chamber experiment that Brown conducted in Paris (figure 3.1), but with two exceptions. Tally used DC voltages ranging up to 19 kilovolts, rather than up to 200 kilovolts as Brown had done. Sparking between Talley's electrodes prevented accurate measurements from being made at higher voltages. Also, unlike Brown's rotor, which was free to revolve, Talley's was restrained by fibers that allowed the rotor's thrust to be assessed through the amount of twist it generated. This arrangement was sensitive to thrusts as small as 0.2 microgram.

Talley's rotor consisted of two capacitors mounted in pinwheel fashion (figure 12.7). Each consisted of an 8-centimeter-diameter brass disc separated by 4 centimeters from a 1-centimeter-diameter aluminum ball electrode. In some cases, a quarter-inch-diameter rod of high-K dielectric such as titanium-lead zirconate (K = 1,750) was placed between the electrodes. The rotor was mounted inside of a chamber that was evacuated to a pressure of 10^{-6} torr (10^{-6} millimeters of mercury, or about a billionth of an atmosphere). Talley found no evidence of thrust when his rotor was powered with steady potentials of up to 19 kilovolts. However, he found that the rotor developed substantially large rotational thrusts when sparks jumped between its electrodes. Since this spark-induced thrust was observed only when he used a high-K dielectric between the rotor's capacitor plates, he concluded that the dielectric material must somehow be directly involved and that this thrust phenomenon could not easily be attributed to ion propulsion or to other known electrodynamic effects. Talley's experiment provides support for the thrust effect that Brown observed when his electrogravitic rotor sparked during tests in a high vacuum.

In 2003, American inventor Hector Serrano duplicated Talley's vacuum chamber rotor experiment.[9] Unlike Talley, Serrano was able to get a 70-degree rotational deflection of the rotor element in the absence of sparking in a vacuum of 10^{-7} torr. Serrano's success may possibly be due to his use of a greater voltage potential, 41 kilovolts instead of 19 kilovolts, so his tests appear to confirm Brown's findings that an electrogravitic force is propelling the rotor in the absence of any ionic discharge. Talley's finding that his rotor did not develop any torque at 19 kilovolts is consistent with Brown's findings that a certain voltage threshold must be exceeded in order to observe a thrust effect. For example, in testing his highly efficient vertical-lift electrokinetic apparatus, Brown observed that he had to apply in excess of 10 kilovolts before any noticeable thrust effect was observed. Also, if we extrapolate the voltage-speed trend line for Brown's electrokinetic disc (figure 2.4), we find that saucer speed drops precipitously, projecting just 9 centimeters per second at 30 kilovolts and 1 centimeter per second at 20 kilovolts. Brown has no data points at such low voltages probably because he found the thrust to be so low that it was unable to overcome his carousel's bearing resistance.

Talley's observation that the spark-induced thrust was greater when a high-K dielectric was placed between the rotor electrodes confirms Brown's statement that the thrust on his electrokinetic apparatus was proportional to the dielectric constant of the support rod placed between its electrodes. For a given voltage differential across the rotor element, a material with a higher dielectric constant would cause more negative charges to accumulate on the negative electrode. Hence, the negative ion cloud formed at the time of spark discharge would have repelled these accumulated charges with greater force to produce a greater thrust in the direction of the positive electrode.

12.4 ■ THE CORNILLE-NAUDIN PENDULUM EXPERIMENTS

In 1996, physicist Patrick Cornille constructed a double-ball pendulum similar to the one Brown had tested in his 1920s experiments.[10–12] He suspended a pair of aluminum spheres, each weighing 500 grams, from two nylon lines and applied between 30 and 50 kilovolts DC to the spheres through two wires secured to these lines (figure 12.8). Each high-voltage feed wire measured half a millimeter (20 mils) in diameter. Each time he turned on his power supply, the pendulum would swing in the direction of its positively charged sphere, in apparent violation of Newton's third law of motion. That is, Brown's classic pendulum experiment apparently violates the law of conservation of momentum. At 50 kilovolts, the pendulum was acted on by a force of 3.5 grams. Curiously, Cornille found that the effect occurred only when he used bare feed wires, as opposed to insulated feed wires. He found that the bare feed wires were able to emit a 1.5-milliamp ion-leakage current through the air. This demonstrates that the emission of charges into the atmosphere plays an important role. He showed that the conventional ion wind theory, however, failed to explain the pendulum's movement, since ions attracted to the opposite electrode would impact with a force that was two orders of magnitude too small. Also, such a mechanism would not explain his finding that the developed force increased as a moderate function of the pendulum mass, $\sim m^{0.5}$.

Cornille theorized that the leakage current was somehow related to the thrust effect, but offered no clear explanation. As we shall see below, the observed thrust effect is most likely electrogravitic, arising from the ion space charge established in the air. For example, Cornille estimates that his feed wires would have been emitting ions at the rate of about 10^{16} ions per second, since their ion-leakage current amounted to 1.5 milliamperes.[13] Consequently, they would have been generating about 5×10^{13} ions per second per centimeter of wire length. Let us suppose that this built up space charges of the order of 10^{13} ions per square centimeter along the wires. Here, we make a very rough estimate, adopting a value similar to that given in Supplement B of the 1960 "Electrohydrodynamics" report for the ion-space charge developed around Brown's vertical-thrust electrokinetic apparatus.[14] In the case of Cornille's experiment, the volume of air lying within 5 centimeters of each wire would have contained on the order of 10^{17} ions. This would be more than 10,000 times the surface charge that would have accumulated on the surface of the feed wires and the pendulum spheres, which according to Cornille's estimate would have been around 3.5×10^{12} ions.[15] So we see that the electrogravitic force would be substantially enhanced by allowing a leakage current to create ions in the vicinity of the feed wires.

In the case in which the wires were insulated, a small amount of ion leakage would have been present between the pendulum's spheres, but according to subquantum kinetics, the gravity gradient created between the resulting positive and negative-ion space charge would have existed between the spheres but would not have intercepted the spheres themselves (see figure 12.9). Only the lightweight plastic spacer between the spheres would have been affected by this field, so the electrogravitic thrust on the pendulum would have been very slight. Also, since the spheres that make up the bulk of the pendulum mass would have lain on the outer sides of the ion clouds, they would have experienced a thrust in a direction opposite to the central thrust vector acting on the insulating spacer. Furthermore, since the ion-leakage current between the spheres was relatively low at 3 microamps, or about five hundred times less than the ion leakage produced when the pendulum was tested with bare feed wires, the spheres would have emitted only a small number of ions. Hence, the induced gravity gradients would have been quite minimal. In summary, it is not surprising that Cornille observed no pendulum movement.

However, in the case in which the pendulum was tested with bare feed wires, most of the ions would have been released along the length of the wires at a considerable distance from the pendulum masses. The ions released from the lower extremity of the feed wires, where the wires attach to the spheres, would have had the greatest influence on the pendulum. Their ion clouds would have been separated by a sufficient distance so that their induced gravity field gradient would have intercepted part of the pendulum masses (see figure 12.10). The G-on fluxes coming from more remote ion space charges located farther up the feed wire may also have had some effect by enhancing the magnitude of the gravity potential hills and wells being generated in the vicinity of the pendulum.

I would like to emphasize, again, that the electrostatically charged pendulum experiences an applied gravitational thrust in the absence of any so-called space-time warping. The general relativistic concept of gravitational space-time warping is a fiction. Understanding electrogravitics requires that we dispense with such outdated ideas and adopt new concepts such as those proposed in subquantum kinetics. Namely, gravity potential gradients are understood to be concentration gradients created in an ether that occupies a Euclidean space. Such gradients cause movement by altering the etheric reactions that are continually regenerating the fields of the propelled object's constituent subatomic particles.

French researcher Jean-Louis Naudin duplicated Cornille's pendulum experiment and found that the pendulum moved even when the vertical ion-emitting feed wires were detached from the metal spheres and supported at the distal ends of the spheres by means of insulating polystyrene blocks,[16] so he demonstrated that charging of the spheres was not crucial to the effect. Like Cornille, he found that the magnitude of the force increased as the mass of the spheres increased, indicating the presence of an unconventional gravitational effect.

These results support the electrogravitic theory suggested above as an interpretation of Cornille's pendulum experiment and also suggested earlier in the analysis of Brown's electric discs. Naudin was generating positive and negative ion clouds on either side of the test mass spheres and, according to the subquantum kinetic theory, a gravity potential gradient would have been generated between these charged ion poles. The test masses, which were situated in the midst of this electric and gravity potential field gradient, then moved in the direction of the outlying gravity potential well, that is, the outlying positive ion cloud (see figure 12.11).

Naudin also tested the pendulum by energizing it through feed wires that were insulated and through which a 0.5-milliamp ionization current was allowed to flow between the two balls. As in Cornille's experiment with insulated feed wires, Naudin's experiment provided no observable pendulum movement. This resolved the question raised by Naudin as to whether current flow might play a crucial role. It showed that it is not the current flow itself that is important, but rather the location of ion discharge in relation to the spherical masses.

12.5 ▪ LIFTER RESEARCH

During the 1970s, Jeff Cameron, an engineer working in Huntsville, Alabama, was researching a laser preionizer, a triangular high-voltage filament used to ionize the lasing medium in a gas laser, when he observed unusually strong forces deforming the preionizer element. This led him later to build and test a large-scale replica. It was similar to the parallel slat thruster described in Brown's 1960 electrokinetic apparatus patent and to the thruster built by Turman, but was much lighter in weight and had its slats arranged to form a triangle. This electrostatic thrust device, which has since come to be called a lifter, consisted of three vertical aluminum-foil fins connected to form a larger triangular structure with a thin wire supported horizontally above the fins. The upper edge of each fin facing the wire was made to have a rounded contour. When charged with 30 kilovolts, the device was observed to levitate.

After Cameron posted his findings on the Internet, Naudin tested a modified version of Cameron's lifter that used a 2-mil-diameter

(0.05-millimeter) emitter wire and a central baffle to duct the airflow (figure 12.12).[17] Interestingly, this wire diameter comes close to the 1-mil diameter that Brown used in his electrokinetic disc experiments. The lower-fin electrodes in Naudin's device were 1.5 centimeters wide and 30 centimeters long, and had a rounded upper edge. The wire was suspended 7 centimeters above the fin. His device was able to lift its own weight of 4 grams plus an added 2-gram weight when energized with 37 kilovolts.

After Naudin posted the construction plans for building a lifter on his website, hundreds of hobbyists began duplicating the experiment and testing their own versions. The ensuing frenzy even attracted media attention. Lifter researcher Tim Ventura played a central role in catalyzing this widespread activity that even developed into competitions to see who could build and levitate the heaviest lifter. Ventura's website (www.americanantigravity.com) is a good resource for those interested in ongoing lifter research. Experimenters found that they could obtain even more spectacular results when they combined many triangular lifters into a single structure. Some have been made that weigh as much as 250 grams, which includes the weight of a 60-gram payload. An image of one such multielement lifter in flight is shown in figure 12.13.

Saviour, a French researcher, found that he could improve the thrust of the lifter by using a nichrome emitter wire heated with a current from a 12-volt power supply. Thus, he rediscovered the phenomenon Turman had discovered in the early 1970s in carrying out his brass slat lifter experiment. The heated wire was able to emit more ions at a given voltage potential. Again, these findings confirm ideas hinted at in Brown's writings, which indicate that methods of encouraging ion emission from the wire electrode would increase the resulting thrust. Although ions are important in producing the lifter's thrust, its thrust is not due to ion wind effects, that is, forces arising from the recoil or impact of ions on the electrodes. Such mechanical forces have been shown to fall short by several orders of magnitude in accounting for the observed lift.

As Turman discovered in his cylindrical, asymmetrical capacitor experiments, so, too, lifter researchers found that they could get lifters to work by charging the wire to either a positive or a negative potential. Since the lifters are made of extremely lightweight materials, such as aluminum foil and plastic soda straws, electrogravitic forces would not play an important role in producing their thrust. Rather, the thrust is most likely attributable to unbalanced electrostatic forces (see text box on page 368). Others, such as Naudin, have given similar explanations.[18]

Unbalanced Ionic Electrostatic Forces Acting on a Lifter

Consider a case in which the lifter's emitter wire is positively charged. The positive-ion cloud generated around the wire would be displaced below the wire since the field would be stronger on the lower side of the wire facing the underlying negative electrode. This downward-displaced cloud would produce a net-upward electrostatic repulsive force on the adjacent wire. Since the field is very nonlinear and concentrated near the wire, this upward-repulsive force would be comparably strong. Also, the upper edge of the negative electrode would experience an upward force because it is electrostatically attracted to the positive-ion cloud.

The lower negative-ion cloud would not be as extensive as the upper positive-ion cloud for a number of reasons. First, negative ions would be emitted from the negative electrode at a lower rate because of its lower electric field gradient. Second, positive ions brought downward by the ion wind would neutralize many of the negative ions in the air and would also impinge on the negative electrode to neutralize negative charges on the electrode. Furthermore, the mixture of positive and negative ions in the vicinity of the negative electrode would tend to screen the negative-ion space charge. Any net-negative-ion charge present in the vicinity of the negative electrode would direct its force nearly horizontal to the electrode fin, pushing toward the fin from either side. In addition, the downward ion-wind flow would cause a modest negative-ion space charge to build up below the negative electrode, and this would tend to produce an upward-directed repulsion force on that electrode. All of these forces together would cause the entire lifter structure to levitate. If the wire was instead negatively charged and the fins were positively charged, unbalanced electrostatic forces would again produce lift.

Although an ion wind continually rushes downward, that is, in the direction of lower electric field intensity, these ions are continually replaced by newly emitted ions, so these ion space charges will always be present to exert their upward forces on the wire and fin. Any means of encouraging greater ion emission from the upper electrode would increase the ion-space charge in the vicinity of the wire as well as the upward repulsive electrostatic forces, thereby improving lift.

Such electrostatic forces would produce an upward thrust regardless of the applied field polarity. Similar unbalanced electrostatic forces would account for the thrust developed by Turman's cylinders. Electrogravitic forces become more significant in the electrokinetic pendulum experiments of Brown and Cornille, which involve the propulsion of a heavy mass. Accordingly, we find in such cases that the apparatus always moves toward its positive pole.

However, the explanation of electrostatic forces produced by ion-space charges does not tell the full story of what is happening in the lifter. For example, Purdue University researcher William Stein carried out a lifter test in which a 12-centimeter-long lifter was energized with 17 kilovolts in a high vacuum.[19] Although the lifter was unable to support its weight, it reportedly produced a levitating thrust of 0.3 millinewtons. Stein's test would indicate that with ion emission essentially eliminated, a lifter is still able to generate a measurable thrust, which would be about 12 percent of what it would generate if allowed to operate in air.* Hungarian researcher Zoltan Losonc has done a computer analysis of the electrostatic forces that a lifter's charged electrodes would generate when electrified in a vacuum. He has concluded that no lift force should be produced and, hence, that some exotic principle must be operating to explain the results of the Purdue vacuum test.[20] The question remains as to whether Stein's measurements may have been influenced by electrostatic forces developed between his lifter element and the vacuum chamber walls. His 12-centimeter-long lifter should have weighed less than 2 grams, as compared with the arcuate discs that Brown vacuum tested, which ranged in weight from 17 to 125 grams.

Naudin has also performed tests that, like Stein's, suggest the lifter may be generating a force in the direction of its smaller electrode in the absence of ion electrostatic forces. He placed plastic soda straws over a lifter's emitter wires to prevent its emission of ions and found that the lifter still produced a measurable lifting force.[21] He also found that his lifter produced a measurable thrust even when enclosed in a plastic bag, thereby containing its ion wind. Naudin has posted only general information about this on the Internet, leaving some questions unanswered, such as whether the force he measured may have been due to electrostatic attraction between his lifter and the beam balance on which it was placed. So, as with Stein's results, it may be premature to draw any conclusions. If the thrust in a vacuum is observed only when the wire is positively charged, then perhaps the force could be explained as a manifestation of the Biefeld-Brown effect, that is, an electrogravitic force acting on the lifter's mass. However, because of the absence of any massive dielectric element between the lifter electrodes, it is unlikely that an appreciable electrogravitic effect would be present.

*To compare this with Naudin's lifter model, whose three fins had a combined length of 90 centimeters and which was energized at a voltage about twice as high, we must scale up this thrust by a factor of 16, giving a thrust of 5 millinewtons, or 0.5 gram. By comparison, Naudin's lifter tested in air achieved a thrust of 4 grams, eightfold greater.

Unclassified public research on electrogravitics research is, for the most part, being conducted by independent researchers, some of whom have been mentioned above. With few exceptions, no similar research is being conducted at universities or government research institutions. Clearly, the science and engineering establishment needs to take a serious interest in conducting additional electrogravitics research before the secrets of field-effect propulsion, currently locked away in black R&D programs, becomes openly applied to make mankind's dream of antigravity a reality.

12.6 THE LAFFORGUE THRUSTER

French inventor Jean-Claude Lafforgue has patented an asymmetrical capacitor field propulsion thruster having a shape similar to that shown in figure 12.14.[22] Like Brown's asymmetrical capacitor, Lafforgue's device develops a net thrust through unbalanced electrostatic forces, with the thrust acting in the same direction regardless of plate polarity.

To determine the thrust acting on his capacitor, Lafforgue calculated the magnitude and direction of the force per unit surface area acting on the capacitor's plates at various plate locations, this quantity alternately being referred to as the force density or the electrostatic pressure, P. It is mathematically expressed as: $\mathbf{P} = \mathbf{F}/A = \mathbf{E}\bullet q/A = \mathbf{E}\bullet\sigma$, in which F is electrostatic force, A is surface area, E is electric force-field intensity, q is charge, and σ is surface-charge density. Thus, he relies on the conventional practice of calculating electrostatic force as the product of the electric field intensity and the electric charge.

Subquantum kinetics achieves the same outcome, except that it works with the negative electric-potential gradient, $-\nabla\varphi$, instead of electric force-field intensity, with the two being equivalent (i.e., $E = -\nabla\varphi$). As mentioned earlier, subquantum kinetics prefers to work with energy potential (ether concentration), since it regards this as the real existent rather than the force-field intensity. Lafforgue's approach of summing the electrostatic pressures acting over a particular plate surface area to get a resultant force vector is equivalent to the subquantum kinetics approach of multiplying the field-potential gradient present on a given electrode sector by the surface-charge density present in that sector and summing the resulting force vectors. This approach was described earlier in analyzing the electrostatic forces acting on Brown's electrokinetic apparatus (see chapter 3, section 3.3).

Also, Lafforgue proposed that the electric field intensity is seated in the local space-time continuum and, hence, exerts its force on the plate surface charges from a reference frame that is not attached to the capacitor. Thus, any resulting force imbalance would be able to displace the capacitor as a whole. Lafforgue's approach, which presumably was arrived at through experience gained from experimental observation, is in accord with the theoretical approach of subquantum kinetics, which views the electric-field potential as being seated in the ether and able to act on a capacitor independent of the capacitor's reference frame and thereby cause it to be displaced. Subquantum kinetics, though, goes into much greater detail to explain how the electrostatic potential field is generated and how it exerts its force on a charge without any countering reaction force. Since the approaches of Lafforgue and of subquantum kinetics were developed independently and produced similar conclusions, we are reassured from both observation and theory that it is correct to conclude that unbalanced electrostatic forces can propel an asymmetrical capacitor if it is properly designed. An analysis of how unbalanced forces form on the Lafforgue capacitor is presented in the text box below.

Analysis of Electrostatic Forces on the Lafforgue Capacitor

The unbalanced thrust acting on the Lafforgue asymmetrical capacitor may be understood to arise as follows. Referring to figure 12.14, the field lines coming from the upper ends of vertical, negatively charged outer plates diverge as they approach the central, positively charged plate, which curves to a horizontal T-shape at the upper end of the capacitor. As a result, the field lines and surface charge are more concentrated on the negative electrode than on the positive, which causes the attractive force, or electrostatic pressure, that is directed from the negative electrode out to the positive to be greater than the attractive force that is directed from the positive electrode in toward the negative.

The opposing horizontal components directed in toward the positive electrode cancel one another, but the upward-directed component is unopposed, leaving a net-upward thrust. In addition, the field lines emerging downward from the lower tip of the central, positively charged electrode diverge toward the horizontal as they approach the two flanking negatively charged electrodes, resulting in a net force, or pressure, directed downward away from the positive electrode. The forces, or pressures, attracting the two negative electrodes toward the central positive electrode, being for the most part horizontal and opposed to one another, will cancel each other out, leaving the downward residual force on the positive electrode unopposed.

However, since the field gradient at the upper end of the negative electrode is much greater in magnitude than that formed around the lower portion of this central electrode, the upward thrust from the negative electrode will be anywhere from 3 to 18 percent greater than the downward thrust generated at the lower end of the positive electrode. As a result, a net-upward thrust will act on the capacitor as a whole. The result will come out the same even, if the positive and negative plate polarities are reversed.

Naudin offers a considerable amount of information about the Lafforgue thruster on his website. He has taken the force equations given in Lafforgue's patent, made a few minor corrections, and used them to create a calculator for computing a capacitor's thrust.[23] Visitors can enter values for a capacitor's dimensions, charge voltage, and dielectric constant and then compute what thrust would be expected. For example, a 50-kilogram thruster measuring 38.5 centimeters high, 8.3 centimeters wide, and 33 centimeters long, using a 4,000-K dielectric and charged to 100 kilovolts, is computed to develop a phenomenally high thrust of 0.68 ton, a force that measures almost fourteen times the capacitor's normal weight! Thirty of these thrusters would be capable lifting a 20-ton vehicle. Forward movement could be obtained simply by vectoring the direction of one of the thrusters. However, experimental data on a high-K Lafforgue thruster that might substantiate these projections is currently not available.

Since barium titanate has a volume resistance of about 10^{11} ohm-meters, a capacitor of this size would have a total resistance of about 10^{10} ohms, provided that its electrodes are properly insulated from contact with the outside air. This would amount to a current leakage of 10 microamps, or a power dissipation of 1 watt. So, theoretically, all thirty thrusters could be powered with a 100-watt power supply. A propulsion device yielding 20 metric tons of force for a power dissipation of 100 watts would have a thrust-to-power ratio of 2 million newtons per kilowatt, about 130,000 times that of a jet engine.

However, it is likely that due to the opposing thrust vector developed by its polarized dielectric, the Lafforgue thruster loses its thrust once it becomes fully charged. Hence, like Brown's electrokinetic apparatus, it may need to be repeatedly charged and discharged to create a continuing thrust effect. If 30 of these Lafforgue thrusters, then, were to have a combined capacitance of about 30 microfarads and were to be charged to 100 kilovolts once every second, they would draw 300 kilowatts of power. This would project a lower thrust-to-power ratio of about 670 newtons per kilowatt or about 45 times that of a jet engine.

In his patent, Lafforgue notes that in addition to its use for air transport, his thruster could be used for power generation by mounting a number of thrusters around the circumference of an axis and connecting the axis to a generator. For example, four thrusters of the size estimated above, each producing 680 kilograms of force and each mounted at the end of a rotor arm extending 2 feet out from the axis, would collectively generate 12,000 foot-pounds of torque. Spinning at 5,250 rpm, this electrostatic motor would be generating 12,000 horsepower, or 8.7 megawatts, of power. Accounting for efficiency losses in the electric generator and due to bearing resistance, a motor-generator combination should be capable of producing 5 megawatts of power, but the thrusters would require only 40 kilowatts of power if the capacitors were being charged and discharged once per second. Hence their output power would exceed their input power by a factor of 125.

Lafforgue's patent was issued in 1991. If we are even somewhat close in our thrust projections, the question that arises is, What has everyone been waiting for? Why aren't these being offered for sale to power our homes or electric cars? Is it perhaps that people just don't believe that something this simple might solve the energy problem? Indeed, some people's belief in and subservience to the law of energy conservation (and to Newton's third law of motion) are so ingrained that they would rather continue to burn oil and gas and ultimately create ecological disaster on our planet than give up their cherished misconceived belief.

Naudin has built and tested some small-size Lafforgue thrusters measuring just 0.5 millimeter thick and has demonstrated that they produce a net thrust just as Lafforgue claims. Naudin used a low-K epoxy dielectric (K = 3.7) and operated his thruster at a much lower voltage of 9,500 volts, using the test setup shown in figure 12.15.[24] When energized, his Lafforgue thruster generated about 0.03 gram of force, as indicated by the upward swing of the armature. Naudin commented that he was able to reduce his leakage current to "near zero" by properly insulating his capacitor so that the electrodes were not in contact with the ambient air environment. By this, he meant that the current was "not measurable in a microampere range." Supposing his thruster was drawing less than 1 microamp at 10 kilovolts, this would be a power consumption of less than 10 milliwatts, which amounts to a thrust-to-power ratio of about 30 newtons per kilowatt.

Table 2 on page 375 compares the thrust-to-power ratios of various field propulsion technologies to those of conventional jet and rocket propulsion techniques.

Lafforgue's equations indicate that thrust should scale in direct proportion to the capacitor's dielectric constant, in direct proportion to the capacitor's length (e.g., plate area), and according to the square of the applied voltage. This K- and V-dependence is essentially the same as what Brown found in testing the performance of his asymmetrical capacitor, as disclosed in the "Electrohydrodynamics Report," discussed in chapter 3. Scaling Naudin's experiment up to a K = 6,000 capacitor measuring 33 centimeters long with slightly different electrode curvatures and energized at 100 kilovolts, we find that thrust increases by a factor of more than 100 million, projecting a thrust of about 3 metric tons!

In another experiment, Naudin placed two 0.5-millimeter-thick epoxy dielectric Lafforgue thrusters at opposite ends of a rotor arm, as shown in figure 12.16.[25] When energized with 15 kilovolts, the apparatus began rotating, reaching a top speed of 40 rpm. It would continue to rotate as long as 0.18 watt of power was supplied to maintain the capacitor's charge. The thrust was not attributable to an ion-wind effect, since the electrodes were shielded to minimize any ion emission. Hence, Naudin's experiment confirms that the rotation arises from the creation of action without reaction, a clear violation of Newton's third law of motion.

There is no indication that anyone has conducted high-voltage tests of a Lafforgue thruster made with a high-K dielectric such as barium titanate. One electrogravitics researcher, Anthony Colacchio, reported having constructed a Lafforgue thruster made with a low-to-medium-K dielectric consisting of barium-titanate powder mixed into an epoxy matrix.[26] Such a mixture would typically have a K-value of about 30. He tested his thruster at a potential of 100 kilovolts but says he found no indication that any thrust was produced. Given that his thruster was forty times thicker than Naudin's, used a dielectric having an eightfold-higher K-value, and was tested at a voltage about tenfold higher than Naudin's, one would expect a thrust about 35,000 times greater. Hence, this experiment should have produced about 1 kilogram of force if the scaling relations are correct. Perhaps Colacchio observed no force because he applied DC to his capacitor. The dielectric's tendency to create an electric dipole moment directed in opposition to the applied electric field may then have negated the thrust effect. Recall that such was the case in Brown's gravitator experiment. Thus, perhaps better results might be achieved if the voltage is applied to the capacitor as a pulse rather than as steady DC. Naudin, for example, was pulsing his epoxy dielectric Lafforgue thruster with a 5 percent duty cycle. Clearly, more research needs to be done on this design before it can be said to be ready for commercial application. Again, a word of caution: Experimenting with high-voltage capacitors can be lethal.

BLACK HOLE DISCOVERED IN NASA

13.1 THE SPACE EXPLORATION OUTREACH PROGRAM

On July 20, 1989, President George H. W. Bush proposed that the United States undertake an ambitious mission of manned and robotic exploration of the solar system that would include building a permanent base on the moon and landing humans on Mars beginning around the year 2014. This was known as the Space Exploration Initiative. Shortly thereafter, Vice President Dan Quayle, who was chairman of the National Space Council, requested that NASA "cast a net widely to find the most innovative ideas in the country" for carrying out the initiative. Thus was born the Space Exploration Outreach Program (SEOP).

To initiate the program, NASA administrator Richard Truly made a public request, inviting anyone who was interested to submit new technology ideas that might help NASA execute the space exploration mission it was undertaking. I was one of about 45,300 individuals who, early in 1990, received a flyer describing SEOP and inviting us to contribute our ideas. All suggestions were to be sent to the RAND Corporation, which was responsible for their review. Ideas were solicited in the following categories:

1. Mission concepts and architectures
2. System design and analysis
3. Space transportation, launch vehicles, and propulsion
4. Space and surface power
5. Life-support systems, space medicine and biology, and human factors
6. Space processing, manufacturing, and construction
7. Structures, materials, and mechanisms
8. Communications, telemetry, and sensing
9. Automation, robotics, and teleoperators
10. Information systems
11. Ground support, simulation, and testing
12. None of the above (specify category)

Seeing that this might be a good opportunity to inform NASA of the benefits of electrogravitic propulsion technology, I decided to make a concept submission under category 3, "Space transportation, launch vehicles, and propulsion." Certainly a means of transporting people to Mars in five days rather than 224 should be of some interest to NASA.

13.2 ▪ IDEA CENSORSHIP

The submission I made to SEOP, cataloged by NASA as idea number 100159, is reproduced in appendix G.[1] My submission pointed out that electrogravitics could make an important contribution toward helping NASA meet its space exploration challenge. I noted that development work on electrogravitic propulsion is currently in progress at major aerospace companies, but that the work is restricted by military classification. Furthermore, I explained that application of electrogravitic technology to NASA's space program to replace outmoded rocket propulsion technology would entail a minimal amount of R&D if aircraft designs already perfected in the military aerospace sector could be declassified. Hence, the issue would not be one of technological feasibility, but rather one of political decision—the decision to declassify an advanced technology already in existence. I suggested that NASA make a serious lobbying effort to convince military authorities to declassify the technology for more open use in space exploration. In addition to citing Brown's electrogravitics work, I included several quotes from the February 1956 Aviation Studies report.

A total of 1,697 people responded to NASA's submission request (about 4 percent of the people originally solicited). The ideas were initially screened by Peat Marwick Main & Co. to remove submissions that were deemed to contain classified or proprietary ideas. About 149 were removed as a result of this screening. The remaining 1,548 ideas were sent on to RAND, which divided the workload among five review panels. Each panel reviewed idea submissions concerned with a particular aspect of NASA's activities and each wrote up its own summary report. The review panels carried out an additional screening of the ideas, with the result that only 215 ideas (13 percent of the total number submitted to RAND) were passed on for final synthesis. A synthesis group summarized the RAND panels' reports along with ideas obtained from other sources. These other sources were the American Institute of Aeronautics and Astronautics, the Department of Defense, the Department of Energy, the Department of Interior, the Aerospace Industries Association, several aerospace contractors, and NASA. The overall organization of the outreach synthesis process is illustrated in figure 13.1.

The synthesis group summarized this information in a document titled America at the Threshold, which was publicly distributed in the fall of 1991.[2] This appeared to be more on the level of a NASA public relations document than a report with any kind of technical substance. It was replete with pictures of planets and astronauts constructing space stations and attractive artwork of spacecraft. The text did not go into much technical depth. It appeared to be directed primarily to a general audience.

Upon receiving this synthesis group report, I discovered that nowhere did it mention anything about electrogravitics. Puzzled as to the report's silence on the subject, I called up the SEOP synthesis group office, but I was dismayed to find that the project had been disbanded. Late in 1990, after the review process had been completed, the Space Exploration Initiative office went through a dramatic change. Aerospace engineer Dr. Michael Griffin took over as its director and replaced almost all of its personnel, leaving only one person who had some knowledge of the preceding activities. I contacted the office at the end of June 1991, but Lieutenant General Thomas Stafford (U.S. Air Force, retired), who had been responsible for chairing the project, was no longer there, and George Abbey, who had coordinated the synthesis group, had been moved to the White House, where he was working on another project. Personnel from NASA who had worked on SEOP later became scattered between two NASA offices—the Office of Exploration in Washington, D.C., and the Exploration Program Office at the Johnson Space Center near Houston. Neither office was able to give me a reasonable explanation as to why electrogravitics had been excluded from the synthesis group report. They suggested I talk with the people at RAND who had administered the project.

However, personnel at RAND were of little help. As far as they were concerned, their contract was over, and they wanted nothing more to do with SEOP. Any telephone inquiries were directed to a spokesperson who would not allow me to speak directly with RAND employees who had been involved in the project. However, they did send me a copy of their technical report summarizing the findings of the panel that reviewed the ideas in category 3.[3] This contained considerably more information on submissions in this particular category and had an appendix listing the titles of the 348 submissions that had been reviewed in this category. However, the main body of the report remained curiously silent on the subject of electrogravitics.

A review of the titles in the report's appendix indicated there were several other submissions beside my own that also had suggested NASA look into nonconventional propulsion technologies. The titles of some of those are in table 3.

I wanted to get copies of this subset of submissions along with the names and addresses of their respective authors for the purpose of correspondence, but was stonewalled. The RAND representative told me all material processed for SEOP had been turned over to NASA.

However, people at NASA's Office of Exploration and Exploration Programs Office were not of much help either. One person at NASA thought that the submissions were being stored temporarily in someone's office but did not know whose. An individual at the Office of Exploration seemed to become nervous when I asked him about the whereabouts of the submissions. I got the impression that he actually knew where they were being kept but was trying to avoid telling me. He instead directed my request to the Johnson Space Center office. People at that office, in turn, directed my request to the Washington office. Thus, I very quickly got the impression that I was being sent in circles. This was supposed to be an open, unclassified solicitation of ideas. Why should they be trying to avoid public inquiries into the ideas that had been presented? Was there something about this project they were trying to hide?

After about four months of calling one office or another and getting nowhere, finally at the end of May 1992, I instituted a request through NASA's Freedom of Information Act Office. After some difficulty, they eventually located the archived documents and in September sent me copies of most of the requested submissions. NASA would not divulge the addresses of the submitters, only their names. A review of these SEOP submissions confirmed what I had suspected, that there were others who also had attempted to make NASA aware of nonconventional propulsion technologies and that their ideas had also been omitted from the final report.

Two submissions had informed NASA about electrogravitic propulsion: my own (no. 100159) and that of Joe Hughes, on electric propulsion (no. 100153), which is reproduced in appendix H. Hughes referred to Brown's flying disc experiments as well as to Brown's proposed design for a spacecraft powered by a plasma-jet, high-voltage ion generator. He included a copy of Brown's electrokinetic generator patent. Hughes also cited Dr. George McDonough, director of science and engineering at NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center in Alabama, as saying that electric propulsion "is an interesting alternative to nuclear propulsion which is the only one being considered by the agency" and that the Soviets "consider it a viable way to do the job."

In the case of the submission titled "The Searle levity disc," the search could locate only the abstract. Quite mysteriously, the backup paper that was supposed to contain an explanation of the disc's operation could not be found. As discussed in chapter 10, this is a device developed by the British engineer John Searl that nullifies gravity by rotating a set of roller magnets. It was foolish of NASA not to take a serious look at this concept, since a few years after the SEOP report was issued, Roshchin and Godin, working in Russia on a shoestring budget, built and successfully tested a version of the Searl disc in which the rotor and its test platform were observed to lose 35 percent of their weight with the rotor spinning at the modest rate of 600 rpm.[4]

Several individuals had also sent SEOP submissions suggesting that NASA look into gyroscopic inertial drive as a feasible method of spacecraft propulsion (submission nos. 100105, 100136, 100174, and 101570). Inertial drive technology is entirely mechanical in nature. It generally involves various methods of either rotating or repeatedly jerking back and forth the bearing supports of a massive spinning gyroscope wheel so as to produce a reactionless vectored thrust of the entire apparatus. Several devices immediately come to mind. One prototype inertial propulsion engine developed by American inventor Robert Cook (U.S. patent 4,238,968) has been shown to develop a thrust of 1 pound.[5] Another device, built by Canadian inventor Roy Thornson, has demonstrated a thrust of 8 pounds. Yet another inertial propulsion prototype, developed by Scottish engineer Sandy Kidd, has produced about 0.50 pound of thrust.[6] With the financial backing of an Australian oil drilling equipment company, Kidd has subsequently begun work on a much larger, passenger-carrying prototype. All of these inertial devices blatantly violate Newton's third law of motion, which states that every action must have an equal and opposite reaction. That is, unlike a rocket, an inertial drive unit moves forward without ejecting mass in the opposite direction. Nevertheless, like electrogravitics, such devices have had a long history of development and a proven track record.

The inertial drive idea submissions to NASA were generally quite well written, and in particular, the authors of two of these (nos. 100105 and 100136) indicated that they either had working devices or had done considerable computer simulation work establishing concept feasibility. Yet nowhere in RAND's space transportation/propulsion panel report or in the synthesis group report was there any mention of the inertial propulsion concept. By all reasonable standards, NASA should have looked into these ideas, yet like the other nonconventional propulsion concepts, the RAND and synthesis group reports totally ignored them. If NASA was asked to "cast a net widely to find the most innovative ideas in the country," why had these ideas not been considered? Had RAND selected panelists who were grossly inept, scientists with tunnel vision who callously weeded out some of the best ideas of the bunch just because they did not fit standard textbook theories, or was there a concerted effort to exclude such ideas in the name of national security? The latter seems more likely since the RAND Corporation, which has a history of being involved in intelligence projects and weapons development, is said to be a front organization for the Central Intelligence Agency.

It is doubtful that this screening operation was put in place to avoid criticisms that might have been leveled by academics skeptical of nonconventional ideas. More likely its intent was to discourage NASA from considering technologies that were already being worked on in defense-sponsored black projects. The censorship of the SEOP ideas submitted to RAND can be traced directly to the screening procedures that RAND had adopted. Some revealing information in this regard may be found in the transportation, launch vehicles, and propulsion panel's technical report. It states that of the 350 submissions reviewed by that particular panel, "approximately 30 percent were judged infeasible" either because they "violated known physical laws or the performance claimed for a concept would be impossible to achieve."[7] Actually, the total number rejected on this pretense was closer to 39 percent, since, at the end of the screening process, only 213 submissions had been passed on for more-formal analysis.

The report states that of the submissions that made it through this screening, none contained "any new scientific laws or principles, or wholly new areas of technology . . . nothing was presented that is truly new and revolutionary." Moreover, it states that most of the submissions had proposed "concepts or ideas that are currently being considered [by NASA] or have been examined in the past."[8] These observations about the outcome of the SEOP project should not be surprising; it is obvious the screening process was set up so that any ideas that were truly new and revolutionary were omitted. As the expression goes, Quayle's team of appointed panelists and hired think-tank consultants "threw out the baby with the bathwater." It is apparent that this was not just one other instance of Murphy's Law at work. These people knew what they were doing, as one panelist privately admitted to me that SEOP had received quite a few "advanced technology" suggestions and that none of these had been included in the final summary report.[9]

The bias against considering innovative ideas is evident in the procedure used to rank the submissions. Each submission was ranked on a scale of 1 to 5 (5 being the best) in each of five attribute areas: utility, feasibility, safety, innovativeness, and cost. However, for reasons not stated, these areas were not given an equal weighting. For example, the transportation, launch vehicles, and propulsion panel weighted these attributes respectively as 25 percent, 25 percent, 25 percent, 5 percent, and 15 percent. Thus, feasibility was considered to be five times more important than innovativeness, with such feasibility being judged according to whether the ideas violated "known" physical laws. It is no wonder that after being asked to "cast a net widely" for new technologies, the panelists had come up with nothing, with American taxpayers footing the bill.

What is even more shocking, the panelists usually ranked the submissions by considering their scores on just the first two attributes—utility and feasibility. Thus, safety, innovativeness, and cost did not seem to count much in the final outcome. This explains why the transportation, launch vehicles, and propulsion panel report seriously discusses concepts such as explosion-driven spacecraft and antimatter annihilation propulsion that, by most standards, fail miserably to meet safety or cost-effectiveness criteria. In the case of explosion-driven propulsion, a nuclear bomb is detonated behind the spacecraft and the shock wave is made to impact a pusher plate that propels the craft forward. Nowhere did the report express any concern about matters such as passenger safety and dangers associated with the proliferation of nuclear weapons in space. The report's discussion of antimatter annihilation propulsion is another case in point. It would take a million years using the current multibillion-dollar CERN and Fermilab facilities just to accumulate 1 milligram of antiprotons, enough to propel a 1-ton payload to escape velocity from Earth. Accumulating and storing such large quantities of antimatter is an even more formidable problem, from both the technical and the cost standpoints. If cost was really of any concern, the report should not have even bothered discussing the antimatter subject. Perhaps they were trying to please the fans of Star Trek.

In view of the above, it is quite disappointing that no space at all was given to reviewing propulsion technologies like electrogravitics, magnetic drive, and inertial drive that not only are feasible, but are safe and cost-effective as well. One wonders whether the Space Exploration Outreach Project was worth the millions of dollars that taxpayers spent.

It seemed that I had exposed a very large black hole, one that happened to be centered right smack in the middle of NASA and was swallowing up a lot of money and with it a lot of good ideas. We are told that one of the characteristics of a black hole is that whatever goes into it can never emerge again. This definition very much fits NASA's Space Exploration Outreach Program, for in 1991, after the synthesis group report was completed and copies mailed out, participants found it nearly impossible to learn anything about the fate of their submitted ideas or to get any information about ideas submitted by other participants. As soon as the report was completed, the arm of this "outreach program" was immediately retracted, with no plans in place for carrying out follow-up activities. It seemed the program organizers planned it that way from the start. By the end of 1991, NASA had dismantled the project's office and transferred its personnel to other jobs. The original idea submissions were diverted either to someone's office closet or to an obscure archive repository. The rapidity with which the SEOP office was dissolved and its personnel and raw data scattered is reminiscent of the sudden dissolution of an FBI front operation after it has caught its crooks. It is clear that SEOP had been planned to be a one-way information-gathering intelligence operation.

13.3 ▪ THE MISSING DISCS

The transportation, launch vehicles, and propulsion panel report states that information about the evaluation of each SEOP submission was logged into a Macintosh computer database (Fourth Dimension by ACIUS). This included "the unique ID number of the submission, the reviewer, the date of review, the name of the panel performing the review, and the title or subject of the review."[10] Also, the database included the score assigned to the proposal (ranked on a scale of 1 to 5) and a written justification for that score. The report states, "Each reviewer was required to briefly explain the reasons for scoring a submission as he or she did."[11]

Information stored in this computer database should have been made available to anyone requesting information about the fate of his or her submission, but when attempts were made to locate the computer disks, they were nowhere to be found. Neither RAND nor NASA personnel claimed to know their whereabouts. One NASA employee went as far as to claim that there was no computer database. However, one of the transportation, launch vehicles, and propulsion panelists had previously told me he had used the database in his proposal review. Thus, the database definitely existed at one time. I initiated a NASA Freedom of Information Act request to obtain a copy of the information on this disc, but the officials failed to locate this information, either in the magnetic media archives or in the archived boxes containing the written submissions. An appeal also failed to turn up anything. Later, I came in contact with Debra Ladwig, a NASA employee who had worked as a computer support person during the synthesis group phase of SEOP. She told me she had initially received a copy of the discs from RAND and that at the close of the project she had turned the discs over to Dr. Brenda Ward of Johnson Space Center. However, in May 1992, I asked Ward if there had been a computer disc summarizing the submission reviews, and strangely, she maintained she did not know of any. At present, then, the magnetic disc records of RAND's evaluations of the SEOP submissions remain missing. Was their disappearance just an accident, or did someone not want the public to know why certain idea submissions were not included in RAND's final report?

The disappearance of the proposal evaluation database is particularly disturbing. The closed-door nature of the whole evaluation process sounds more like a classified, black R&D project than a NASA program. It is reminiscent of what reportedly was going on in the UFO study conducted by the Air Force under Project Blue Book. According to informants connected with that project, the more-unusual UFO reports submitted to the project were routinely siphoned off to a highly classified intelligence group, never to be seen again by the public. The missing reports not only were absent from Project Blue Book's database but also were omitted from its final report. It is not surprising to find that the same operating procedures are being practiced at NASA to screen out information relating to antigravity and field-propulsion technologies.

13.4 ■ THE NATIONAL AERO-SPACE PLANE

At the time the SEOP report was published, NASA had plans in the works to develop the X-30 National Aero-Space Plane, also called the space plane, which was to be the eventual replacement for the space shuttle. The plane was to use three different propulsion systems. The "low-speed" propulsion system, whose technology was then classified, was designed to take the craft up to a speed of about Mach 3 and to altitudes of greater than 50,000 feet. At Mach 3, a liquid-hydrogen-burning ramjet would take over. Unlike the space shuttle, which uses a liquid-oxygen oxidizer, the X-30 ramjet would be air breathing. A ramjet is a jet engine that has no moving parts and that depends on the high pressures created in front of it to force air through its combustion chamber. Since liquid oxygen accounts for 89 percent of the fuel weight in a standard liquid-oxygen/liquid-hydrogen rocket, this ramjet system allows a substantial reduction in the rocket's overall weight. At Mach 6, the ramjet would convert into a scramjet—a supersonic ramjet—as the airflow in its combustion chamber transitioned from subsonic to supersonic flow. The scramjet then would propel the X-30 into speeds of Mach 12 and greater. Ground tests achieved Mach 12 speeds, and much higher Mach numbers were expected to be forthcoming when actual flight tests would be conducted. For comparison, at Mach 12, a trip from New York to Tokyo would take just one hour. As the space plane would attain an increasingly high altitude, it increasingly would rely on the addition of liquid oxygen to sustain combustion in its scramjet. Outside the atmosphere, it was to rely entirely on liquid-oxygen/liquid-hydrogen rocket combustion.

One problem NASA anticipated with the space plane was that its wing leading edges would experience excessive frictional heating during the plane's high-velocity flight through the atmosphere (at Mach 3 and above). Just in this one area, the project could have substantially benefited from knowledge about Brown's electrogravitics work, which was discussed in two of the SEOP idea submissions, ideas that were weeded out from SEOP's final report. In particular, high-voltage electrification of the leading edge of the aircraft's body, in the manner Brown had suggested, would have assisted in deflecting the approaching airstream so it would not directly contact the vehicle's surface, thereby reducing the air frictional drag and softening the vehicle's transition through the sonic barrier. However, personnel working on the space plane project indicated that they had not heard of electrogravitics or about the potential of high-voltage charge to alleviate air drag, one of the project's most pressing technical problems.

Determined to circumvent SEOP's idea censorship, in May 1992 I sent copies of my electrogravitic propulsion SEOP submission and a copy of the 1956 Aviation Studies report, "Electrogravitics Systems," to Charles Morris, director of the space plane project. He said he would circulate this material among the project's engineers. One month later, he sent a letter stating that "the concept is not appropriate for consideration within the National Aero-Space Plane (NASP) program" (see appendix I). A year later, I convinced him to reconsider the idea. Since he had not kept any of the material I had sent earlier, in September 1993 I sent him a new packet of information (see appendix J). Later that year, when I inquired whether he thought the space plane might benefit by using a high-voltage charge, the director commented that he found the ideas very interesting, but was not optimistic that NASA would adopt such a technology in the immediate future.

Subsequently, a scientist at NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center commented to me:

> Electrogravitics is one of those things that certainly is worth looking at because we're running up against boundaries, and nuclear propulsion isn't going to happen in our time, as far as I can tell . . . We don't have a program. That's the problem. We don't have anything on the horizon where there's support at headquarters for really futuristic things . . . There are some real interesting things out there like this. NASA used to be a lot better at forward thinking than we have gotten to be, and if we are going to survive in this age, we are going to have to take off our "things-as-usual hat" and think about some of these things.[12]

Work on the space plane proceeded for several years but was discontinued in 1994 due to budget cuts and because the program could not deliver the kind of results Congress was expecting. In 2003, there was a strong lobbying effort to resurrect the project, but none of the proposed ideas made any mention of the idea of applying electrostatic charge to a wing's leading edge to solve the hull-heating problem.

13.5 ■ THE COLUMBIA DISASTER

On February 1, 2003, the Columbia space shuttle crashed to Earth in flames as the result of damage its wing had suffered earlier in the mission. During takeoff, a suitcase-size chunk of insulating foam had broken off from its main propellant tank and impacted the leading edge of the shuttle's left wing, causing damage to one of the wing's thermal protection tiles. The damage went undetected and later caused a major problem when the vehicle attempted to reenter the atmosphere during landing. Air friction normally heats the wing surface to incandescent temperatures during the high-velocity atmospheric reentry. As a result of the earlier damage, superheated gases were able to penetrate a gap in the wing's thermal protection tiles and cause damage to the shuttle's internal wing structure. Exposed to these hot gases, the wing structure ultimately failed, the vehicle became uncontrollable, and it was eventually destroyed by the extreme heat of reentry. Seven crew members perished in the crash.

Had Brown's aerospace technology been implemented on the space shuttle, the Columbia disaster would never have happened. Thirteen years earlier, two SEOP submissions had pointed out the advantages of electrogravitics, but the SEOP review panel discarded the ideas and did not include them in its final report to NASA. As mentioned earlier, in 1992 I had also contacted space plane project director Charles Morris of NASA to suggest a solution to the hull-heating problem foreseen to plague the project. I had pointed out to him how air-friction heating of the leading edge of a shuttlecraft's wing could be prevented simply by applying a high-voltage charge to the wing. Again, in my 1993 letter to him (reproduced in appendix J), I wrote ". . . electrostatic charging of the plane's leading edge would also have the added benefit of reducing air friction heating of the hull surface." However, NASA personnel did not employ the idea.

Somewhat later I spoke with Jonathan Campbell, an engineer who works on electrical propulsion systems at NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center. I learned that he had been trying for years to convince NASA to look into electrokinetics as a means for spacecraft propulsion, but his requests for money were routinely turned down by management. He took out two patents on a thrust-producing apparatus (see figure 13.2) that is very similar to one of Brown's electrohydrodynamic devices. Although he has acknowledged that Brown's work inspired him to develop his cylindrical thruster, curiously, Campbell's patent did not cite or discuss Brown's prior work.[13]* Campbell has a more conventional view on the operation of asymmetrical capacitors than Brown and others, denying that any exotic principle such as electrogravitics operates. His patent did not discuss the idea of charging the leading edge of a spacecraft's wing, so even if NASA had funded Campbell's research, there is no guarantee that Brown's airframe-charging idea would have been employed.

*Interestingly, Turman's cylindrical thruster experiment (see chapter 12) bears a close resemblance to Campbell's asymmetrical capacitor; compare figure 13.2 to figure 12.1. Turman's research predates Campbell's patent application by at least twenty-six years.

Figure 13.2. A symmetrical capacitor apparatus for generating thrust. A high-voltage DC potential causes air to flow from the copper cylinder toward the copper disc. (Campbell, 2001)

In March 2003, I submitted a suggestion to the Columbia Accident Investigation Board (reproduced in appendix J). I pointed out again the benefits of charging the wing leading edge, stating, "One technology that could prevent a Columbia-type hazard from happening in the future would be to apply a high voltage charge to the Space Shuttle hull during reentry, in particular to the leading edge of its wing. The ion sheath so formed would create a buffer zone around the craft, ionizing, repelling and deflecting oncoming air molecules and thereby preventing them from directly impacting and heating the hull." I also noted that Northrop had researched this technique thirty-five years earlier and named some references they could consult. I also summarized Brown's work and the use of electrogravitics on the B-2 bomber. I noted how I had earlier attempted to make NASA aware of the technology, both through my submission to SEOP and through my contacts with Morris. I named Campbell as someone at NASA whom they could contact and also offered my own assistance to point them in the right direction, but nothing ever came of my suggestions. All they sent me was a form letter thanking me for my input. Efforts made to resurrect the space plane as a future space shuttle replacement made no mention of my suggestion for wing electrification.

The aerospace industry has not shown the same bureaucratic dinocracy. In 1994, one year after NASA turned down the idea for its space plane, BAE Corporation (formerly British Aerospace) became seriously interested in Russian research into plasma air-drag reduction. Together with the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA), Britain's military research organization, it began researching the idea of generating plasmas upwind of an aircraft as a means of reducing air drag.[14]

In 1996, Terry Cain, a research engineer with DERA, traveled to Russia to meet Anatoly Klimov and his colleagues and to repeat the plasma drag reduction experiments they had performed. At the Central Aerohydrodynamics Institute, near Moscow, they carried out supersonic wind tunnel tests on 10-centimeter, conical-shaped bodies that used plasma generators to create upstream plasmas. One method they used to generate the plasmas was to energize the cones with a Tesla coil that created voltages high enough to cause air to ionize over large distances. The high-voltage fields generated "little streamers of lightning" that propagated into the airflow ahead of the test model.[15] They measured drag reductions of 10 percent.

In the United States, the Arnold Engineering Development Center, at Arnold Air Force Base in Tennessee, has modified its wind tunnels to conduct airflow tests of plasma-assisted models. The long list of aerospace planes that have undergone aerodynamic testing at Arnold includes the B-2 Stealth Bomber and the X-30 National Aero-Space Plane. In 2000, the head of its applied technology directorate was quoted as saying that a number of organizations have shown interest in plasma air-drag reduction, although he would not give their names. Might we expect NASA to be among those showing interest?[16]

13.6 ■ NASA: A MILITARY FRONT ORGANIZATION?

Donna Hare, a former employee of a NASA contractor, has disclosed evidence that implicates NASA in covering up evidence of the presence of advanced-technology spacecraft. During the 1970s, Hare worked for NASA contractor Philco Ford in its photo lab at the Johnson Space Center. Since she had a secret clearance, she was able, one day, to walk into the NASA photo lab where a friend of hers worked. The lab was involved in developing satellite pictures and pictures taken during NASA's various missions. Her friend directed her attention to an area of a photo mosaic he had been working on. Then, smiling, he suggested she look at a particular area of one of these photo panels. There she saw a round white dot with a very crisp outline. She asked if it was a dot on the emulsion. Grinning, he said, “Dots on the emulsion don’t leave shadows on the ground.” Sure enough, there was a round shadow on the trees at the correct angle from where the sun would have been shining. She asked, “Is this a UFO?” He answered, “I can’t tell you that,” meaning it was a UFO, but he wasn’t allowed to tell her it was. He said, “We always have to airbrush them out before we sell them to the public.” Hare’s astounding testimony can be found in Stephen Greer’s book Disclosure.[17]

Hare also disclosed stories she had heard from NASA employees about some astronauts having seen extraterrestrial craft. One gentleman whom she knew very well said just about every one of the astronauts who had gone to the moon had seen things. One said there were three craft on the moon at the time the Apollo 11 mission had landed. He said that as a precaution, the astronauts were put in quarantine for a while after they had returned and that some of the astronauts who wanted to talk were threatened.

Hare also related a story told to her by someone who used to work at Johnson Space Center as a security guard.[18] He said one day soldiers came in fatigues and ordered him to burn photographs. At one point, he stole a glance at one of the pictures and could see that it was a UFO on the ground. One of the guards apparently caught him doing this and hit him in the head with a gun butt. She said she could see that as he told his story, he was very frightened.

So we see that NASA and its employees are being threatened and manipulated into silence to maintain the status quo of a cover-up about the presence of alien craft and the existence of advanced aerospace propulsion technologies. Seeing that the NASA administration seem determined to steer clear of electrogravitics technology despite repeated attempts by several people to interest them, one is led to sympathize with Tom, my Project Skyvault contact, who said in the note he passed me at the 1994 Tesla conference that NASA is essentially a public relations organization or a front that obscures Air Force space research.

Over the phone, Tom later told me an astounding story of the scope of the Air Force’s involvement in space. He said he had been in the Civil Air Patrol and had been given a Mitchelson Award, the highest award that one could get. As a result, in 1963 he was chosen to represent the state of Idaho and go to Chanute Air Force Base along with Civil Air Patrol representatives from the other forty-nine states. One day they were all gathered in an auditorium, and onstage there were about eight generals who were available for a "no bars" question-and-answer period. One person popped up and asked them about Air Force Major Donald E. Keyhoe, who at the time was writing about UFOs and had been severely censored. One of the generals responded that they had a way of taking care of people who gave out a little too much information. He said they would use physical injury or whatever was necessary to make them shut up, indicating they would kill a person (extreme prejudice, if you will). Someone else started to ask more about UFOs and one of the generals said the United States had a defense system in place at the time that consisted of a number of satellites, in orbit not only around the Earth, but also around Mercury, Venus, Mars, and a few other, more distant planets they couldn't talk about. He said the satellites together functioned as an early warning system, that they were afraid of the "people out there" because they didn't know very much about them. This satellite defense system was built to observe three possible sources: missiles that might come from the Soviet Union, missiles that might come from China, and intrusions of aliens coming in toward Earth. Someone asked why the generals were being so candid with them. According to Tom, one responded by saying, "If you want, you can go ahead and tell people what we told you, but they're not going to believe you. Besides, if you did get anyone to believe you and they came back to ask us, we would just deny it. So we have nothing to lose by telling you this."[19]

Russia had put the Sputnik satellite in orbit around the Earth in 1957, and the United States followed by putting the Explorer in orbit the next year. In 1959, the Soviets photographed the far side of the moon with Luna 3. In 1962, the Mariner 2 probe of Venus sent back close-range information about Venus, and that same year, the Russians launched the first probe to Mars, but contact was lost. So in 1963, Tom was told that the United States at that time had a network of sophisticated warning satellites scattered throughout the solar system, orbiting planets farther out than Mars! The well-funded military space program was apparently several decades ahead of what was being publicly acknowledged! Tom said he had heard rumors that the first satellite ever was launched by the United States in 1948 using a modified V-2 rocket. He said the Soviets never really were ahead of the United States in the space race. The military used the publicity of the Soviet effort to their own advantage to get more money from Congress.

North American Rockwell delivered its first space shuttle to NASA in March 1979. This was the Columbia shuttle, which made its maiden voyage two years later, in 1981, but Tom said that Rockwell had been delivering space shuttles to the U.S. Air Force as early as 1976. He also said the Air Force has its own shuttle system and that its shuttles were being launched from a highly secured island in the Pacific known as Johnston Island. He said he had been working for the Air Force between 1976 and 1978 and that during this time he met a captain who was an engineer with the Air Force and who had returned from Johnston Island after being there for a year or two. He said this captain told him he had heard rumors that the United States had a base on the moon. The captain said that from looking at the cargo manifest for one of these shuttle launchings, one could conclude that provisions were routinely being shipped out. This was several years after the Apollo program had been terminated, the last Apollo mission to the moon having been completed in December 1972.

Thus, it is apparent that there has been an effort to keep secret the military's capabilities in space. While NASA was mesmerizing the public with its rocket flights, aerospace companies were carrying out secret research on electrogravitics and microwave beam propulsion technologies. A good guess is that the U.S. military currently has large fleets of craft capable of hypersonic flight in space that use nonconventional means of propulsion.

This educated guess may be fact. In 2002, a forty-year-old British computer buff named Gary McKinnon succeeded in using his home computer to hack into the computer network of several U.S. military organizations. Although not part of any terrorist organization and only snooping to satisfy his own curiosity, he now faces up to seventy years' imprisonment in a U.S. jail, but what he found on one of his Internet forays was quite astounding. In a U.S. Space Command database, McKinnon found a list of officer's names under the heading "Non-Terrestrial Officers." He also found a list of "fleet-to-fleet transfers" and a list of ship names. He tried to look them up, but found they were not Navy ships. He came to conclude that these were off-planet vessels.

The U.S. Space Command is headquartered at Peterson Air Force Base in Colorado Springs. Its website states that its "mission is to conduct joint space operations in accordance with the Unified Command Plan assigned missions." These include "Space Force Support, Space Force Enhancement, Space Force Application, and Space Force Control."[20] With records of nonterrestrial officers carrying out fleet-to-fleet transfers, its missions appear to be far bolder than the average U.S. citizen might have guessed. It seems the United States has ongoing, manned space operations that go beyond anyone's wildest dreams, all taking place under a cloak of secrecy and all made possible by advanced field-effect propulsion technologies that were under intense development in the middle of the twentieth century.

The Russians may also have a substantial presence in space. In his book The Awakening of the Red Bear, Dimosthenes Liakopoulos wrote that the Russians have large electrogravitic-propulsion craft called cosmospheres that are equipped with particle beam weapons.[21] He maintains that these are used to ferry supplies to ten bases on the moon.

As for the application of field-propulsion technology to civilian aerospace flight, it is apparent that NASA, with its rocket-oriented approach, will not be the one to take the initiative. That, instead, will likely be undertaken by farsighted aerospace corporations such as the Spaceship Company and Virgin Galactic. The ability of nonmilitary private enterprise to compete in the space arena became evident on October 4, 2004, when Brian Binnie piloted SpaceShipOne to an altitude of 114 kilometers to win the $10-million X-Prize. This prize, which was offered by the X-Prize Foundation, was available to anyone who succeeded in reaching an altitude of at least 100 kilometers twice within a two-week period. That was SpaceShipOne's second voyage, its maiden voyage having been made just five days earlier. The winning team, led by aerospace engineer Burt Rutan, showed the world that, with a little ingenuity, space flight is possible even on a shoestring budget.

In July 2005, Rutan's company, Scaled Composites, signed an agreement with Virgin Galactic, a spin-off of the Virgin Group of Companies, founded by Sir Richard Branson, to form a new aerospace production company that both companies will jointly own. This new company, called the Spaceship Company, has plans to build a fleet of commercial suborbital spaceships and launch aircraft and to market them to spaceline operators, one of which will be Virgin Galactic. Rutan, who will head up the company's technical development team, said, "[T]his will truly herald an era of personal space flight first described by the visionary science fiction writers of the 1940s and 1950s. Richard Branson and I share a vision that commercially viable and safe space tourism will provide the foundation for the human colonization of space."[21] It is more likely that entrepreneurs such as these, who are accustomed to thinking out of the box, will ultimately be the ones who will develop field-effect propulsion for aerospace flight.

A TECHNOLOGY THAT COULD CHANGE THE WORLD

Clearly, gravity control would be a boon to society. So why is work on this important technology being kept so highly classified? One obvious reason is that the military sector wants to make sure that its defense technologies are always one step ahead of everyone else's. According to one estimate, black-program technologies are at present at least fifty to one hundred years ahead of those used in the commercial world. A second motivation for secrecy is the concern over whether society is able to monitor and control the public use of this new science effectively. A case in point is the advent of nuclear technology toward the middle of the twentieth century. While ways were later found to harness atomic energy for peaceful uses, its initial development was for use as a weapon, the atomic bomb. This brought with it the accompanying threat of nuclear holocaust, and today, even though the cold war has ended, the threat still lingers that terrorists might detonate a dirty bomb. Similarly, the same physics that gives us a proper understanding of gravity control and that could be put to many peaceful uses could also be used to build very destructive weapons.

According to Ray, the black-project scientist I had spoken to, the curators of this technology do not feel that society as a whole has matured emotionally to an extent that this knowledge could safely be made available to the public. Apparently the behind-the-scenes individuals who monitor black-world research and decide whether or not it stays classified are following a program of "controlled evolution." If these "powers that be" determine that the world has advanced to a point where it can handle a new technology, they will allow it to be introduced. This leaves us with the question of whether this self-chosen group is itself sufficiently qualified to be making these kinds of decisions. With problems like global warming, global deforestation, acid rain, widespread pollution of the oceans, radioactive waste, overpopulation, hunger, and the AIDS epidemic looming ever larger, shouldn't at least some of this knowledge be declassified to help the world? Some members of the black-programs community feel that it should, and as a result, they are making efforts to push things in a more liberal direction.

When the internal combustion engine was developed at the turn of the twentieth century, should it have been classified because of its military potential to create tanks and war vehicles? If it had, we may still be driving a horse and buggy and would undoubtedly be living in a world that had a much lower standard of living. Today, it seems that our government is intent on keeping our current technology status quo. On January 15, 2008, four group directors that head the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (USPTO) sent out a memo to all USPTO technology center patent examiners that is just as reactionary as if they had outlawed the automobile. The memo reminded the examiners about the USPTO Sensitive Application Warning System (SAWS) program and required that they "flag" any patent application that contains subject matter of "special interest," specifically those containing the following topics: "1) perpetual motion machines [i.e., over unity energy generators], 2) antigravity devices, 3) room temperature superconductivity, 4) free energy—tachyons, etc., 5) gain assisted superluminal light propagation (faster than the speed of light), 6) other matters that violate the general laws of physics . . ."[1]

Further, the directive required the examiners to, among other things, flag: “applications with pioneering scope” and “applications dealing with inventions that, if issued, would potentially generate extensive publicity.” It stated that the SAWS program “is intended to ensure that the [USPTO] examination standards and guidelines are applied properly to such applications.” Such guidelines instruct examiners to reject any applications that violate the “known laws of physics.” Obviously, the laws the Patent Office are referring to is the catechism taught in university physics courses around the country. By those laws, patent applications for any invention using over-unity energy generators, electrokinetics technology, or superluminal beam generators (such as that developed by Podkletnov) should be promptly rejected.

But let us imagine for a moment that the prevailing bureaucratic suppression has faded, ushering in a host of possibilities. Once field-effect propulsion technologies and energy generators are commercialized, they could dramatically improve people’s lives. For example, Earth-based transportation would be revolutionized, commuters would be able to travel vertically as well as horizontally, roads and bridges would no longer be needed, and ground-level rush-hour traffic jams would be a thing of the two-dimensional past. However, in populated areas, special navigation computers would be required in order to prevent midair collisions. Transport speeds would be vastly increased, and there would be few limits as to where such vehicles could go. Antigravity vehicles would revolutionize farming, mining, building construction, and shipping, stimulating the world economy beyond our wildest dreams.

Space flight would be made practical. Travel from one’s Earth-based home to an orbital space station would become as easy as making flights from one town or city to another. Flight from the Earth to bases on the moon or Mars, or even journeys to the more-remote planets of the solar system, would be accomplished as easily as present-day intercontinental flights. Such journeys could be completed with a minimal expenditure of fuel. Just think of all the billions of dollars that would be saved if nations used antigravity propulsion instead of rocket propulsion to accomplish their space missions. Electrogravitic spaceships could theoretically attain velocities exceeding the speed of light, making it practical also to travel to nearby star systems.

World peace would be aided. Antigravity transportation would erase the distance barriers separating the nations of the world. Imagine, traveling anywhere in the world in one hour! International air traffic would skyrocket. Geographical space would shrink, bringing people from different parts of the world closer together. People would become more internationally oriented and would see one another as close neighbors. As people grew more tolerant of other cultures and as poverty declined, a new planetary world order would arise. With luck, war might even become a thing of the past.

Ecologically safe methods of energy production would become available. Electrogravitics could be usefully applied as a means for generating pollution-free electric power. One method would use permanent magnet generators such as the Searl effect generator or the MEC, discussed in chapter 10. Another method might be to use phase-conjugating parametric amplifiers that had overunity outputs. Yet another technique might be to develop rotary generators such as the electrostatic motors suggested by Lafforgue (see chapter 12) and Brown (see figure 1.10).

Electrogravitic free-energy machines, as well as other types of scientifically advanced energy generators, would provide society with clean energy. Besides producing affordable power, such technology would be environmentally and socially safe because it would not produce dangerous waste products that could pose health hazards. Nor would it release carbon dioxide or waste heat into the atmosphere that could threaten global warming. The energy output would be almost entirely in the form of mechanical motion. In the case of the Searl effect generator, it could actually have the side benefit of refrigerating the environment as it generates power. Although electrogravitic devices use high voltage, they may be rendered safe by being properly enclosed. Moreover, power production would become decentralized. Each home, factory, or vehicle would have its own power unit. The miles of unsightly power lines that presently clutter our landscape would become a thing of the past as each person became his own energy czar.

Declassifying the black-world ether physics would substantially benefit society from an intellectual standpoint. It would galvanize a whole new era of expansion in fundamental physical theory, which today has largely stagnated as a result of dogged perpetuation of outmoded ideas. It would also benefit society from a humanistic standpoint. One could argue that the spiritual vacuum and overemphasis on materialism that characterize modern society stem in part from the teaching of positivistic science that recognizes only experimentally observable quantities as having a real existence. The new ether physics, on the other hand, acknowledges that the physical world is only a manifestation of a much more fundamental, subtle realm that is not directly accessible to our physical senses, but whose operation to some extent may be elucidated with the aid of reaction-kinetic models. It leads to a worldview in which science becomes united with mystical teachings, rather than separated from them. Widespread knowledge of this new conceptual paradigm could bring humanity back toward a more ethical track, to a global mind-set better prepared to receive the advanced technologies that are now kept from us.

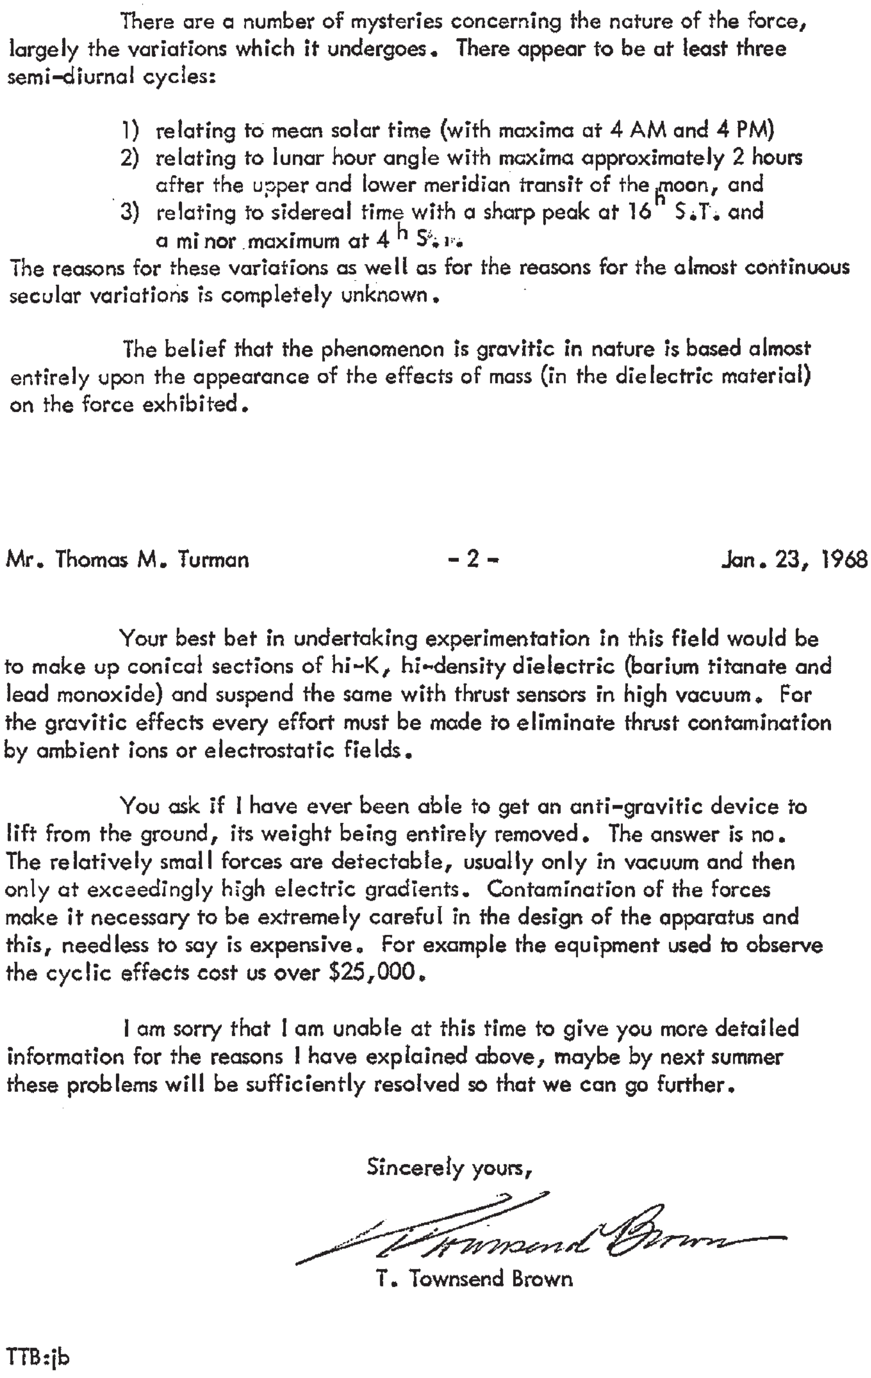
Dear Mr. Turman:

Again I must apologize for my delay in responding to your requests. Yesterday I came home after a stay in the hospital which included an operation. I am not feeling very well and I am not able to think too clearly. The company to which I serve as consultant has not released some of the information you have requested and I am very much at a loss to know what to say.

The Patent No. 3,187,206 contains the essential teaching in electrogravitics. A definition of the electrogravitic force might be " the ponderomotive force developed within a high-K dielectric under electrical strain". The patent teaches the use of non-linear electric fields such as those internally developed in truncated cones of dielectric material.

In short, at voltages from 75 KV to 125 KV or more, this thrust appears pronounced in vacuum. It persists as long as the voltage is maintained and is independent of the orientation with respect to the Earth's gravity vector.



There are a number of mysteries concerning the nature of the force, largely the variations which it undergoes. There appear to be at least three semi-diurnal cycles:

1) relating to mean solar time (with maxima at 4 AM and 4 PM)
2) relating to lunar hour angle with maxima approximately 2 hours after the upper and lower meridian transit of the moon, and
3) relating to sidereal time with a sharp peak at 16^h S.T. and a minor maximum at 4^h S.T.

The reasons for these variations as well as for the reasons for the almost continuous secular variations is completely unknown.

The belief that the phenomenon is gravitic in nature is based almost entirely upon the appearance of the effects of mass (in the dielectric material) on the force exhibited.

Mr. Thomas M. Turman - 2 - Jan. 23, 1968

Your best bet in undertaking experimentation in this field would be to make up conical sections of hi-K, hi-density dielectric (barium titanate and lead monoxide) and suspend the same with thrust sensors in high vacuum. For the gravitic effects every effort must be made to eliminate thrust contamination by ambient ions or electrostatic fields.

You ask if I have ever been able to get an anti-gravitic device to lift from the ground, its weight being entirely removed. The answer is no. The relatively small forces are detectable, usually only in vacuum and then only at exceedingly high electric gradients. Contamination of the forces make it necessary to be extremely careful in the design of the apparatus and this, needless to say is expensive. For example the equipment used to observe the cyclic effects cost us over $25,000.

I am sorry that I am unable at this time to give you more detailed information for the reasons I have explained above, maybe by next summer these problems will be sufficiently resolved so that we can go further.

Sincerely yours,

Townsend Brown

Dear Mr. Turman:

I have reviewed your letter and also tried to remember what we talked about in our recent telephone conversations. I will probably not be able to answer all of your questions and I shall leave something for future correspondence.

It was a pleasure to look over the photographs of the equipment you have assembled for it indicates some rather thorough planning on your part and the expenditure of quite a sum of money. It appears you have put together the essential pieces of apparatus to perform high quality experimental work and this, I know, will be a great satisfaction to you.

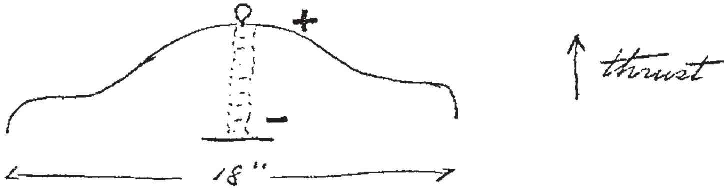
Someday I would like for you to send me more detailed information and a circuit diagram of your high voltage supply. I thought I understood it was a voltage doubler but I would like to know in greater detail the capacitors and rectifiers you are using. This is of some concern, particularly as to the ripple present in the dc output.

Your sketch shows a point and ring configuration of electrodes with an intermediate dielectric tube. I take it the ends of this tube are open and the air flow is in the direction of the divergent field. This would make the tube assembly move in the opposite direction, that is, toward the small positive electrode. Is this not so?

I am also interested in the way you measure forces. You mentioned a capacitor type pick up, which would feed, thru an amplifier, to the recorder. Have you observed any ~~for~~ thrust with the positive end of the tube closed?

Going to the disc airfoils, you ask about the spacers used to mount the electrodes from the disc body. I was not interested then in lift, only thrust and the top speed around a 50' turnstile. The attached diagram will give you some idea of the setup.

Experiments involving lift were of a different nature. We used a triarcuate ballistic electrode as the anode and a small electrode underneath as the cathode, substantially as follows:



Thomas M. Turman - 2 - Nov. 1, 1971

The large electrode was made of a balsa umbrella-like frame with aluminum foil covering. A thin glass stand-off insulator mounted the cathode as shown in the drawing. The lift of this unit at 170 kv was about 125 grams. The electrode structure itself weighed only about 100 grams, so it was actually self-levitating.

In my next letter I will send you some pressure profiles across the ballistic electrode where we attempted to analyze this lift, but I shall make it the subject of another letter.

I shall try to get this other letter off to you within a few days.

Sincerely,

Townsend Brown

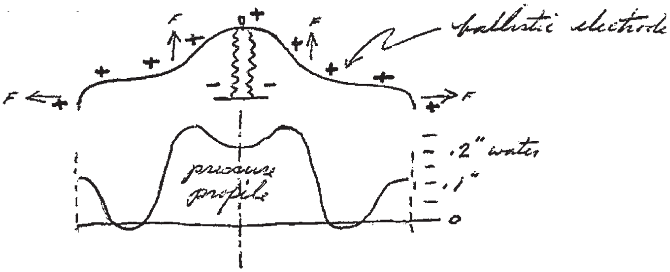
Dear Mr. Turman:

I am sorry I have been so long in getting this letter off to you but, during my recuperation, I seldom get to the office.

In my letter of November 1st I promised to send you some pressure profiles, such as I remember them, which caused the movement of the triarcuate ballistic electrode. A sketch of the electrode and the approximate pressure profile is as follows:



F

F
ballistic electrode

It was found that, by canting the center electrode, the pressures could be unbalanced so that one side or the other could be lifted. This could provide horizontal stability in a large prototype. An alternate way of doing this is to provide three independent electrodes in triangular configuration instead of one center electrode. These electrodes can be differently charged in order to change the electric field configuration under the ballistic canopy and this did away with the necessity for a mechanical moving part. Horizontal stability could be maintained entirely electrically. The structure is substantially as follows:

Thomas M. Turman -2- Nov. 12, 1971

If you are able to perform any of these experiments, I would certainly like to hear about them.

Kindest personal regards,

Sincerely yours,

It has been accepted as axiomatic that the way to offset the effects of gravity is to use a lifting surface and considerable molecular energy to produce a continuously applied force that, for a limited period of time, can remain greater than the effects of gravitational attraction. The original invention of the glider, and evolution of the briefly self-sustaining glider, at the turn of the century led to progressive advances in power and knowledge. This has been directed to refining the classic Wright Brothers' approach. Aircraft design is still fundamentally as the Wrights adumbrated it, with wings, body, tails, moving or flapping controls, landing gear and so forth. The Wright biplane was a powered glider, and all subsequent aircraft, including the supersonic jets of the nineteen-fifties are also powered gliders. Only one fundamentally different flying principle has so far been adopted with varying degrees of success. It is the rotating wing aircraft that has led to the jet lifters and vertical pushers, coleopters, ducted fans and lift induction turbine propulsion systems.

But during these decades there was always the possibility of making efforts to discover the nature of gravity from cosmic or quantum theory, investigation and observation, with a view to discerning the physical properties of aviation's enemy.

It has seemed to Aviation Studies that for some time insufficient attention has been directed to this kind of research. If it were successful such developments would change the concept of sustentation, and confer upon a vehicle qualities that would now be regarded as the ultimate in aviation.

This report summarizes in simple form the work that has been done and is being done in the new field of electrogravitics. It also outlines the various possible lines of research into the nature and constituent matter of gravity, and how it has changed from Newton to Einstein to the modern Hlavaty concept of gravity as an electromagnetic force that may be controlled like a light wave.

The report also contains an outline of opinions on the feasibility of different electrogravitics systems, and there is reference to some of the barycentric control and electrostatic rigs in operation.

Also included is a list of references to electrogravitics in successive Aviation Reports since a drive was started by Aviation Studies International Limited to suggest to aviation business eighteen months ago that the rewards of success are too far-reaching to be overlooked, especially in view of the hopeful judgment of the most authoritative voices in microphysics. Also listed are some relevant patents on electrostatics and electrostatic generators in the United States, United Kingdom and France.

DISCUSSION

Electrogravitics might be described as a synthesis of electrostatic energy used for propulsion—either vertical propulsion or horizontal or both—and gravitics, or dynamic counterbary, in which energy is also used to set up a local gravitational force independent of the earth's.

Electrostatic energy for propulsion has been predicted as a possible means of propulsion in space when the thrust from a neutron motor or ion motor would be sufficient in a dragless environment to produce astronomical velocities. But the ion motor is not strictly a part of the science of electrogravitics, since barycentric control in an electrogravitics system is envisaged for a vehicle operating within the earth's environment and it is not seen initially for space application. Probably large scale space operations would have to await the full development of electrogravitics to enable large pieces of equipment to be moved out of the region of the earth' s strongest gravity effects. So, though electrostatic motors were thought of in 1925, electrogravitics had its birth after the War, when Townsend Brown sought to improve on the various proposals that then existed for electrostatic motors sufficiently to produce some visible manifestation of sustained motion. Whereas earlier electrostatic tests were essentially pure research, Brown's rigs were aimed from the outset at producing a flying vehicle. As a private venture he produced evidence of motion using condensers in a couple of saucers suspended by arms rotating round a central tower with input running down the arms. The massive-k situation was summarized subsequently in a report, Project Winterhaven, in 1952. Using the data some conclusions were arrived at that might be expected from ten or more years of intensive development—similar to that, for instance, applied to the turbine engine. Using a number of assumptions as to the nature of gravity, the report postulated a saucer as the basis of a possible interceptor with Mach 3 capability. Creation of a local gravitational system would confer upon the fighter the sharp-edged changes of direction typical of motion in space.

The essence of electrogravitics thrust is the use of a very strong positive charge on one side of the vehicle and a negative on the other. The core of the motor is a condenser and the ability of the condenser to hold its charge (the k-number) is the yardstick of performance. With air as 1, current dielectrical materials can yield 6 and use of barium aluminate can raise this considerably, barium titanium oxide (a baked ceramic) can offer 6,000 and there is promise of 30,000, which would be sufficient for supersonic speed.

The original Brown rig produced 30 fps on a voltage of around 50,000 and a small amount of current in the milliamp range. There was no detailed explanation of gravity in Project Winterhaven, but it was assumed that particle dualism in the subatomic structure of gravity would coincide in its effect with the issuing stream of electrons from the electrostatic energy source to produce counterbary. The Brown work probably remains a realistic approach to the practical realization of electrostatic propulsion and sustentation. Whatever may be discovered by the Gravity Research Foundation of New Boston, a complete understanding and synthetic reproduction of gravity is not essential for limited success. The electrogravitics saucer can perform the function of a classic lifting surface—it produces a pushing effect on the under surface and a suction effect on the upper, but, unlike the airfoil, it does not require a flow of air to produce the effect.

First attempts at electrogravitics are unlikely to produce counterbary, but may lead to development of an electrostatic VTOL vehicle. Even in its developed form this might be an advance on the molecular heat engine in its capabilities. But hopes in the new science depend on an understanding of the close identity of electrostatic motivating forces with the source and matter of gravity. It is fortuitous that lift can be produced in the traditional fashion and if an understanding of gravity remains beyond full practical control, electrostatic lift might be an adjunct of some significance to modern thrust producers. Research into electrostatics could prove beneficial to turbine development, and heat engines in general, in view of the usable electron potential round the periphery of any flame. Materials for electrogravitics and especially the development of commercial quantities of high-k material is another dividend to be obtained from electrostatic research even if it produces no counterbary. This is a line of development that Aviation Studies' Gravity Research Group is following.

One of the interesting aspects of electrogravitics is that a breakthrough in almost any part of the broad front of general research on the intranuclear processes may be translated into a meaningful advance towards the feasibility of electrogravitics systems. This demands constant monitoring in the most likely areas of the physics of high-energy sub-nuclear particles. It is difficult to be overoptimistic about the prospects of gaining so complete a grasp of gravity while the world's physicists are still engaged in a study of fundamental particles—that is to say those that cannot be broken down any more. Fundamental particles are still being discovered—the most recent was the Segre-Chamberlain-Wiegand attachment to the bevatron, which was used to isolate the missing anti-proton, which must—or should be presumed to—exist according to Dirac's theory of the electron. Much of the accepted mathematics of particles would be wrong if the anti-proton was proved to be non-existent. Earlier Eddington has listed the fundamental particles as:

e. The charge of an electron.
m. The mass of an electron.
M. The mass of a proton.
h. Planck' s constant
c. The velocity of light.
G. The constant of gravitation, and
λ. The cosmical constant.

It is generally held that no one of these can be inferred from the others. But electrons may well disappear from among the fundamental particles, though, as Russell says, it is likely that e and m will survive. The constants are much more established than the interpretation of them and are among the most solid of achievements in modern physics.

Gravity may be defined as a small scale departure from Euclidean space in the general theory of relativity. The gravitational constant is one of four dimensionless constants: first, the mass relation of the nucleon and electron. Second is e^2/hc; third, the Compton wavelength of the proton; and fourth is the gravitational constant, which is the ratio of the electrostatic to the gravitational attraction between the electron and the proton.

One of the stumbling blocks in electrogravitics is the absence of any satisfactory theory linking these four dimensionless quantities. Of the four, moreover, gravity is decidedly the most complex, since any explanation would have to satisfy both cosmic and quantum relations more acceptably and intelligibly even than in the unified field theory. A gravitational constant of around 10^{-39} has emerged from quantum research and this has been used as a tool for finding theories that could link the two relations. This work is now in full progress, and developments have to be watched for the aviation angle. Hitherto Dirac, Eddington, Jordan and others have produced differences in theory that are too wide to be accepted as consistent. It means therefore that (i) without a cosmical basis, and (ii) with an imprecise quantum basis and (iii) a vague hypothesis on the interaction, much remains still to be discovered. Indeed some say that a single interacting theory to link up the dimensionless constants is one of three major unresolved basic problems of physics. The other two main problems are the extension of quantum theory and a more detailed knowledge of the fundamental particles.

All this is some distance from Newton, who saw gravity as a force acting on a body from a distance, leading to the tendency of bodies to accelerate towards each other. He allied this assumption with Euclidean geometry, and time was assumed as uniform and acted independently of space. Bodies and particles in space normally moved uniformly in straight lines according to Newton, and to account for the way they sometimes do not do so, he used the idea of a force of gravity acting at a distance, in which particles of matter cause in others an acceleration proportional to their mass, and inversely proportional to the square of the distance between them.

But Einstein showed how the principle of least action, or the so-called cosmic laziness means that particles, on the contrary, follow the easiest path among geodesic lines and as a result they get readily absorbed into space-time. So was born non-linear physics. The classic example of non-linear physics is the experiment in bombarding a screen with two slits. When both slits are open particles going through are not the sum of the two individually but follows a non-linear equation. This leads on to wave-particle dualism and that, in turn, to the Heisenberg uncertainty principle in which an increase in accuracy in measurement of one physical quantity means decreasing accuracy in measuring the other. If time is measured accurately energy calculations will be in error; the more accurate the position of a particle is established the less certain the velocity will be, and so on. This basic principle of the acausality of microphysics affects the study of gravity in the special and general theories of relativity. Lack of pictorial image in the quantum physics of this interrelationship is a difficulty at the outset for those whose minds remain obstinately Euclidean.

In the special theory of relativity, space-time is seen only as an undefined interval which can be defined in any way that is convenient and the Newtonian idea of persistent particles in motion to explain gravity cannot be accepted. It must be seen rather as a synthesis of forces in a four dimensional continuum, three to establish the position and one the time. The general theory of relativity that followed a decade later was a geometrical explanation of gravitation in which bodies take the geodesic path through space-time. In turn this means that instead of the idea of force acting at a distance it is assumed that space, time, radiation and particles are linked and variations in them from gravity are due rather to the nature of space.

Thus gravity of a body such as the earth, instead of pulling objects toward it as Newton postulated, is adjusting the characteristics of space and, it may be inferred, the quantum mechanics of space in the vicinity of the gravitational force. Electrogravitics aims at correcting this adjustment to put matter, so to speak, "at rest."

One of the difficulties in 1954 and 1955 was to get aviation to take electrogravitics seriously. The name alone was enough to put people off. However, in the trade much progress has been made and now most major companies in the United States are interested in counterbary. Groups are being organised to study electrostatic and electromagnetic phenomena. Most of industry's leaders have made some reference to it. Douglas has now stated that it has counterbary on its work agenda but does not expect results yet awhile. Hiller has referred to new forms of flying platform, Glenn Martin say gravity control could be achieved in six years, but they add that it would entail a Manhattan District type of effort to bring it about. Sikorsky, one of the pioneers, more or less agrees with the Douglas verdict and says that gravity is tangible and formidable, but there must be a physical carrier for this immense trans-spatial force. This implies that where a physical manifestation exists, a physical device can be developed for creating a similar force moving in the opposite direction to cancel it. Clarke Electronics state they have a rig, and add that in their view the source of gravity's force will be understood sooner than some people think. General Electric is working on the use of electronic rigs designed to make adjustments to gravity—this line of attack has the advantage of using rigs already in existence for other defence work. Bell also has an experimental rig intended, as the company puts it, to cancel out gravity, and Lawrence Bell has said he is convinced that practical hardware will emerge from current programs. Grover Leoning is certain that what he referred to as an electro-magnetic contra-gravity mechanism will be developed for practical use. Convair is extensively committed to the work with several rigs. Lear Inc., auto-pilot and electronic engineers have a division of the company working on gravity research and so also has the Sperry division of Sperry-Rand. This list embraces most of the U.S. aircraft industry. The remainder, Curtiss-Wright, Lockheed, Boeing, and North American, have not yet declared themselves, but all these four are known to be in various stages of study with and without rigs.

In addition, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology is working on gravity, the Gravity Research Foundation of New Boston, the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton, the CalTech Radiation Laboratory, Princeton University and the University of North Carolina are all active in gravity. Glenn L. Martin is setting up a research Institute for Advanced Study which has a small staff working on gravity research with the unified field theory and this group is committed to extensive programs of applied research. Many others are also known to be studying gravity, some are known also to be planning a general expansion in this field, such as in the proposed Institute for Pure Physics at the University of North Carolina.

A certain amount of work is also going on in Europe. One of the French nationalized constructors and one company outside the nationalized elements have been making preliminary studies, and a little company money has in one case actually been committed. Some work is also going on in Britain where rigs are now in existence. Most of it is private venture work, such as that being done by Ed Hull, a colleague of Townsend Brown who, as much as anybody, introduced Europe to electrogravitics. Aviation Studies' Gravity Research Group is doing some work, mainly on k studies, and is sponsoring dielectric investigations.

One Swedish company and two Canadian companies have been making studies, and quite recently the Germans have woken up to the possibilities. Several of the companies have started digging out some of the early German papers on wave physics. They are almost certain to plan a gravitics program. Curiously enough the Germans during the war paid no attention to electrogravitics. This is one line of advance that they did not pioneer in any way and it was basically a U.S. creation. Townsend Brown in electrogravitics is the equivalent of Frank Whittle in gas turbines. This German overlooking of electrostatics is even more surprising when it is remembered how astonishingly advanced and prescient the Germans were in nuclear research. The modern theory of making thermonuclear weapons without plutonium fission initiators returns to the original German idea that was dismissed, even ridiculed. The Germans never went very far with fission, indeed they doubted that this chain would ever be made to work. The German air industry, still in the embryo stage, has included electrogravitics among the subjects it intends to examine when establishing the policy that the individual companies will adopt after the present early stage of foreign licence has enabled industry to get abreast of the other countries in aircraft development.

It is impossible to read thorough this summary of the widening efforts being made to understand the nature of matter of gravity without sharing the hope that many groups now have, of major theoretical breakthroughs occurring before very long. Experience in nucleonics has shown that, when attempts to win knowledge on this scale are made, advances are soon seen. There are a number of elements in industry, and some managements, who see gravity as a problem for later generations. Many see nothing in it all and they may be right. But as said earlier, if Dr. Vaclav Hlavaty thinks gravity is potentially controllable that surely should be justification enough, and indeed inspiration, for physicists to apply their minds and for management to take a risk. Hlavaty is the only man who thinks he can see a way of doing the mathematics to demonstrate Einstein's unified field theory—something that Einstein himself said was beyond him. Relativity and the unified field theory go to the root of electrogravitics and the shifts in thinking, the hopes and fears, and a measure of progress is to be obtained only in the last resort from men of this stature.

Major theoretical breakthroughs to discover the sources of gravity will be made by the most advanced intellects using the most advanced research tools. Aviation's role is therefore to impress upon physicists of this calibre with the urgency of the matter and to aid them with statistical and peripheral investigations that will help to clarify the background to the central mathematical and physical puzzles. Aviation could also assist by recruiting some of these men as advisers. Convair has taken the initiative with its recently established panel of advisers on nuclear projects, which include Dr. Edward Teller of the University of California. At the same time much can be done in development of laboratory rigs, condenser research and dielectric development, which do not require anything like the same cerebral capacity to get results and make a practical contribution.

As gravity is likely to be linked with the new particles, only the highest powered particle accelerators are likely to be of use in further fundamental knowledge. The country with the biggest tools of this kind is in the best position to examine the characteristics of the particles and from those countries the greatest advances seem most likely.

Though the United States has the biggest of the bevatrons—the Berkeley bevatron is 6.2 bev—the Russians have a 10 bev accelerator in construction which, when it is completed, will be the world's largest. At Brookhaven a 25 bev instrument is in development which, in turn, will be the biggest. Other countries without comparable facilities are of course at a great disadvantage from the outset in the contest to discover the explanation of gravity. Electrogravitics, moreover, unfortunately, competes with nuclear studies for its facilities. The clearest thinking brains are bound to be attracted to localities where the most extensive laboratory equipment exists. So, one way and another, results are most likely to come from the major countries with the biggest undertakings. Thus the nuclear facilities have a direct bearing on the scope for electrogravitics work.

The OEEC report in January made the following points:

> The U.S. has six to eight entirely different types of reactor in operation and many more under construction. Europe has now two different types in service.
> The U.S. has about 30 research reactors plus four in Britain, two in France.
> The U.S. has two nuclear-powered marine engines. Europe has none, but the U.K. is building one. Isotope separation plants for the enrichment of uranium in the U.S. are roughly 11 times larger than the European plant in Britain.
> Europe's only heavy water plant (in Norway) produces somewhat less than one-twentieth of American output.

In 1955 the number of technicians employed in nuclear energy work in the U.S. was about 15,000; there are about 5,000 in Britain, 1,800 in France, and about 1,000 in the rest of Europe. But the working party says that pessimistic conclusions should not be drawn from these comparisons. European nuclear energy effort is unevenly divided at the moment, but some countries have notable achievements to their credit and important developments in prospect. The main reason for optimism is that, taken as a whole, "Europe's present nuclear effort falls very far short of its industrial potential."

Though gravity research, such as there has been of it, has been unclassified, new principles and information gained from the nuclear research facilities that have a vehicle application is expected to be withheld.

The heart of the problem to understanding gravity is likely to prove to be the way in which the very high energy sub-nuclear particles convert something, whatever it is, continuously and automatically into the tremendous nuclear and electromagnetic forces. Once this key is understood, attention can later be directed to finding laboratory means of duplicating the process and reversing its force lines in some local environment and returning the energy to itself to produce counterbary. Looking beyond it seems possible that gravitation will be shown to be a part of the universal electro-magnetic processes and controlled in the same way as a light wave or radio wave. This is a synthesis of the Einstein and Hlavaty concepts. Hence it follows that though in its initial form the mechanical processes for countering gravity may initially be massive to deal with the massive forces involved, eventually this could be expected to form some central power generation unit. Barycentric control in some required quantity could be passed over a distance by a form of radio wave. The prime energy source to energise the waves would of course be nuclear in its origins.

It is difficult to say which lines of detailed development being processed in the immediate future is more likely to yield significant results. Perhaps the three most promising are: first, the new attempt by the team of men led by Chamberlain working with the Berkeley bevatron to find, the anti-neutron, and to identify more of the characteristics of the anti-proton* and each of the string of high energy particles that have been discovered during recent operation at 6.2 bev.

A second line of approach is the United States National Bureau of Standards program to pin down with greater accuracy the acceleration values of gravity. The presently accepted figure of 32.174 feet per second per second is known to be not comprehensive, though it has been sufficiently accurate for the limited needs of industry hitherto. The NBS program aims at re-determining the strength of gravity to within one part of a million. The present method has been to hold a ball 16 feet up and chart the elapsed time of descent with electronic measuring equipment. The new program is based on the old, but with this exceptional degree of accuracy it is naturally immensely more difficult and is expected to take 3 years.

*The reaction is as follows: protons are accelerated to 6.2 bev, and directed at a target of copper. When the proton projectile hits a neutron in one of the copper atoms the following emerge: the two original particles (the projectile and the struck neutron) and a new pair of particles, a proton and anti-proton. The anti-proton continues briefly until it hits another proton, then both disappear and decay into mesons.

A third promising line is the new technique of measuring high-energy particles in motion that was started by the University of California last year. This involves passing cosmic rays through a chamber containing a mixture of gas, alcohol and water vapour. This creates charged atoms, or positive ions, by knocking electrons off the gas molecules. A sudden expansion of the chamber results in a condensation of water droplets along the track that can be plotted on a photographic plate. This method makes it easier to assess the energy of particles and to distinguish one from the other. It also helps to establish the characteristics of the different types of particle. The relationship between these high-energy particles, and their origin, and characteristics, have a bearing on electrogravitics in general.

So much of what has to be discovered as a necessary preliminary to gravity is of no practical use by itself. There is no conceivable use, for instance, for the anti-proton, yet its discovery even at a cost of $9-million is essential to check the mathematics of the fundamental components of matter. Similarly it is necessary to check that all the nuclear ghosts that have been postulated theoretically do in fact exist. It is not, moreover, sufficient, as in the past only to observe the particles by radiation counters. In each instance a mechanical maze has to be devised and attached to a particle accelerator to trap only the particle concerned. Each discovery becomes a wedge for a deeper probe of the nucleus. Many of the particles of very high energy have only a fleeting existence and collisions that give rise to them from bevatron bombardment is a necessary prerequisite to an understanding of gravity. There are no shortcuts to this process.

Most of the major programs for extending human knowledge on gravity are being conducted with instruments already in use for nuclear research and to this extent the cost of work exclusively on gravitational examinations is still not of major proportions. This has made it difficult for aviation to gauge the extent of the work in progress on gravity research.

CONCLUSIONS

1. No attempts to control the magnitude or direction of the earth's gravitational force have yet been successful. But if the explanation of gravity is to be found in the as yet undetermined characteristics of the very high energy particles it is becoming increasingly possible with the bevatron to work with the constituent matter of gravity. It is therefore reasonable to expect that the new bevatron may, before long, be used to demonstrate limited gravitational control.
2. An understanding and identification of these particles is on the frontiers of human knowledge, and a full assessment of them is one of the major unresolved puzzles of the nucleus. An associated problem is to discover a theory to account for the cosmic and quantum relations of gravity, and a theory to link the gravitational constant with the other three dimensionless constants.
3. Though the obstacles to an adequate grasp of microphysics still seem formidable, the transportation rewards that could follow from electrogravitics are as high as can be envisaged. In a weightless environment, movement with sharp-edged changes of direction could offer unique maneuverability.
4. Determination of the environment of the anti-proton, discovery of the anti-neutron and closer examination of the other high energy particles are preliminaries to the hypothesis that gravity is one aspect of electromagnetism that may eventually be controlled like a wave. When the structure of the nucleus becomes clearer, the influence of the gravitational force upon the nucleus and the nature of its behaviour in space will be more readily understood. This is a great advance on the Newtonian concept of gravity acting at a distance.
5. Aviation's role appears to be to establish facilities to handle many of the peripheral and statistical investigations to help fill in the background on electrostatics.

6. A distinction has to be made between electrostatic energy for propulsion and counterbary. Counterbary is the manipulator, of gravitational force lines; barycentric control is the adjustment to such manipulative capability to produce a stable type of motion suitable for transportation.
7. Electrostatic energy sufficient to produce low speeds (a few thousand dynes) has already been demonstrated. Generation of a region of positive electrostatic energy on one side of a plate and negative on the other sets up the same lift or propulsion effect as the pressure and suction below and above a wing, except that in the case of electrostatic application no airflow is necessary.
8. Electrostatic energy sufficient to produce a Mach 3 fighter is possible with megavolt energies and a k of over 10,000.
9. k figures of 6,000 have been obtained from some ceramic materials and there are prospects of 30,000.
10. Apart from electrogravitics there are other rewards from investment in electrostatic equipment. Automation, autonetics and even turbine development use similar laboratory facilities.
11. Progress in electrogravitics probably awaits a new genius in physics who can find a single equation to tie up all the conflicting observations and theory on the structure and arrangement of forces and the part the high energy particles play in the nucleus. This can occur any time, and the chances are improved now that bev. energies are being obtained in controlled laboratory conditions.

ANTI-GRAVITATION RESEARCH

The basic research and technology behind electro-anti-gravitation is so much in its infancy that this is perhaps one field of development where not only the methods but the ideas are secret. Nothing therefore can be discussed freely at the moment. Very few papers on the subject have been prepared so far, and the only schemes that have seen the light of day are for pure research into rigs designed to make objects float around freely in a box. There are various radio applications, and aviation medicine departments have been looking for something that will enable them to study the physiological effects on the digestion and organs of an environment without gravity. There are however long-term aims of a more revolutionary nature that envisage equipment that can defeat gravity.

Aviation Report, 20 August 1954

Managerial Policy for Anti-Gravitics

The prospect of engineers devising gravity-defeating equipment—or perhaps it should be described as the creation of pockets of weightless environments—does suggest that as a long term policy aircraft constructors will be required to place even more emphasis on electromechanical industrial plant, than is now required for the transition from manned to unmanned weapons. Anti-gravitics work is therefore likely to go to companies with the biggest electrical laboratories and facilities. It is also apparent that anti-gravitics, like other advanced sciences, will be initially sponsored for its weapon capabilities. There are perhaps two broad ways of using the science—one is to postulate the design of advanced type projectiles on their best inherent capabilities. And the more critical parameters (that now constitutes design limitation) can be eliminated by anti-gravitics. The other, which is a longer term plan, is to create an entirely new environment with devices operating entirely under an anti-gravitic envelope.

Aviation Report, 24 August 1954

The Greater the Easier

Propulsion and atomic energy trends are similar in one respect: the more incredible the long term capabilities are, the easier it is to attain them. It is strange that the greatest of nature's secrets can be harnessed with decreasing industrial effort, but greatly increasing mental effort. The Americans went through the industrial torture to produce tritium for the first thermonuclear experiment, but later both they and the Russians were able to achieve much greater results with the help of lithium 6 hydride. The same thing is happening in aviation propulsion: the nuclear fuels are promising to be tremendously powerful in their effect, but excessively complicated in their application, unless there can be some means of direct conversion as in the strontium 90 cell, But lying behind and beyond the nuclear fuels is the linking of electricity to gravity which is an incomparably more powerful way of harnessing energy than the only method known to human intellect at present—electricity and magnetism. Perhaps the magic of barium aluminum oxide will perform the miracle in propulsion that lithium 6 hydride has done in the fusion weapon. Certainly it is a well-known material in dielectrics, but when one talks of massive-k, one means of course five figures. At this early stage it is difficult to relate k to Mach numbers with any certainty but realizable k can, with some kinds of arithmetic, produce astounding velocities. They are achievable, moreover, with decreasing complexity, indeed the ultimate becomes the easiest in terms of engineering, but the most hideous in terms of theory. Einstein's general theory of relativity is, naturally, an important factor, but some of the postulates appear to depend on the unified field theory, which cannot yet be physically checked because nobody knows how to do it. Einstein hopes to find a way of doing so before he dies.

Aviation Report, 31 August 1954

GRAVITICS FORMULATIONS

All indications are that there has still been little cognizance of the potentialities of electrostatic propulsion and it will be a major undertaking to re-arrange aircraft plants to conduct large-scale research and development into novel forms of dielectric and to improve condenser efficiencies and to develop the novel type of materials used for fabrication of the primary structure. Some extremely ambitious theoretical programs have been submitted and work towards realization of a manned vehicle has begun. On the evidence, there are far more definite indications that the incredible claims are realizable than there was for instance, in supposing that uranium fission would result in a bomb. At least it is known, proof positive, that motion, using surprisingly low k, is possible. The fantastic control that again is feasible, has not yet been demonstrated, but there is no reason to suppose the arithmetic is faulty, especially as it has already led to a quite brisk example of actual propulsion. That first movement was indeed an historic occasion, reminiscent of the momentous day at Chicago when the first pile went critical, and the phenomenon was scarcely less weird. It is difficult to imagine just where a well-organized examination into long-term gravitics prospects would end. Though a circular planform is electrostatically convenient, it does not necessarily follow that the requirements of control by differential changes would be the same. Perhaps the strangest part of this whole chapter is how the public managed to foresee this concept, though not of course the theoretical principles that gave rise to it, before physical tests confirmed that the mathematics was right. It is interesting also that there is no point of contact between the conventional science of aviation and the New: it is a radical offshoot with no common principles. Aerodynamics, structures heat engines, flapping controls, and all the rest of aviation is part of what might be called the Wright Brothers era—even the Mach 2.5 thermal barrier piercers are still Wright Brothers concepts, in the sense that they fly, and they stall, and they run out of fuel after a short while, and they defy the earth's pull for a short while. Thus this century will be divided in two parts—almost to the day. The first half belonged to the Wright Brothers who foresaw nearly all the basic issues in which gravity was the bitter foe. In part of the second half, gravity will be the great provider. Electrical energy, rather irrelevant for propulsion in the first half becomes a kind of catalyst to motion in the second half of the century.

Aviation Report, 7 September 1954

Electro-Gravitics Paradox

Realization of electro-static propulsion seems to depend on two theoretical twists and two practical ones. The two theoretical puzzles are: first, how to make a condenser the centre of a propulsion system, and second is how to link the condenser system with the gravitational field. There is a third problem, but it is some way off yet, which is how to manipulate kva for control in all three axes as well as for propulsion and lift. The two practical tricks are first how, with say a Mach 3 weapon in mind, to handle 50,000 kva within the envelope of a thin pancake of 35 feet in diameter and second how to generate such power from within so small a space. The electrical power in a small aircraft is more than in a fair sized community the analogy being that a single rocketjet can provide as much power as can be obtained from the Hoover Dam. It will naturally take as long to develop electro-gravitic propulsion as it has taken to coax the enormous power outputs from heat engines. True there might be a flame in the electro-gravitic propulsion system, but it would not be a heat engine—the temperature of the flame would be incidental to the function of the chemical burning process.

The curious thing is that though electrostatic propulsion is the antithesis of magnetism,* Einstein's unified field theory is an attempt to link gravitation with electro-magnetism. This all-embracing theory goes on logically from the general theory of relativity, that gives an ingenious geometrical interpretation of the concept of force that is mathematically consistent with gravitation but fails in the case of electro-magnetism, while the special theory of relativity is concerned with the relationship between mass and energy. The general theory of relativity fails to account for electro-magnetism because the forces are proportional to the charge and not to the mass. The unified field theory is one of a number of attempts that have been made to bridge this gap, but it is baffling to imagine how it could ever be observed. Einstein himself thinks it is virtually impossible. However Hlavaty claims now to have solved the equations by assuming that gravitation is a manifestation of electro-magnetism.

This being so it is all the more incredible that electro-static propulsion (with kva for convenience fed into the system and not self-generated) has actually been demonstrated. It may be that to apply all this very abstruse physics to aviation it will be necessary to accept that the theory is more important than this or that interpretation of it. This is how the physical constants, which are now regarded as among the most solid of achievements in modern physics, have become workable, and accepted. Certainly all normal instincts would support the Einstein series of postulations, and if this is so it is a matter of conjecture where it will lead in the long term future of the electro-gravitic science.

*Though in a sense this is true, it is better expressed in this report than it was here in 1954.

ELECTRO-GRAVITIC PROPULSION SITUATION

Under the terms of Project Winterhaven the proposals to develop electro-gravitics to the point of realizing a mach 3 combat type disc were not far short of the extensive effort that was planned for the Manhattan District.* Indeed the drive to develop the new prime mover is in some respects rather similar to the experiments that led to the release of nuclear energy in the sense that both involve fantastic mathematical capacity and both are sciences so new that other allied sciences cannot be of very much guide. In the past two years since the principle of motion by means of massive-k was first demonstrated on a test rig, progress has been slow. But the indications are now that the Pentagon is ready to sponsor a range of devices to help further knowledge, In effect the new family of TVs would be on the same tremendous scope that was envisaged by the X-1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 and D-558s that were all created for the purpose of destroying the sound barrier—which they effectively did, but it is a process that is taking ten solid years of hard work to complete. (Now after 7 years the X-2 has yet to start its tests and the X-3 is still in performance testing stage). Tentative targets now being set anticipate that the first disc should be complete before 1960 and it would take the whole of the sixties to develop it properly, even though some combat things might be available ten years from now.

One thing seems certain at this stage, that the companies likely to dominate the science will be those with the biggest computors to work out the ramifications of the basic theory. Douglas is easily the world's leader in computor capacity, followed by Lockheed and Convair. The frame incidentally is indivisible from the engine. If there is to be any division of responsibility it would be that the engine industry might become responsible for providing the electrostatic energy (by, it is thought, a kind of flame) and the frame maker for the condenser assembly which is the core of the main structure.

Aviation Report, 12 October 1954

GRAVITICS STUDY WIDENING

The French are now understood to be pondering the most effective way of entering the field of electro-gravitic propulsion systems. But not least of the difficulties is to know just where to begin. There are practically no patents so far that throw very much light on the mathematics of the relation between electricity and gravity. There is, of course, a large number of patents on the general subject of motion and force, and some of these may prove to have some application. There is, however a series of working postulations embodied in the original Project Winterhaven, but no real attempt has been made in the working papers to go into the detailed engineering. All that had actually been achieved up to just under a year ago was a series of fairly accurate extrapolations from the sketchy data that has so far been actually observed. The extrapolation of 50 mph to 1,800 mph, however, (which is what the present hopes and aspirations amount to) is bound to be a rather vague exercise. This explains American private views that nothing can be reasonably expected from the science yet awhile. Meanwhile, the NACA is active, and nearly all the Universities are doing work that borders close to what is involved here, and something fruitful is likely to turn up before very long.

*The proposals, it should be added, were not accepted.

Aviation Report, 19 October 1954

Gravitics Steps

Specification writers seem to be still rather stumped to know what to ask for in the very hazy science of electro-gravitic propelled vehicles. They are at present faced with having to plan the first family of things—first of these is the most realistic type of operational test rig, and second the first type of test vehicle. In turn this would lead to sponsoring of a combat disk. The preliminary test rigs which gave only feeble propulsion have been somewhat improved, but of course the speeds reached so far are only those more associated with what is attained on the roads rather than in the air. But propulsion is now known to be possible, so it is a matter of feeding enough KVA into condensers with better k figures. 50,000 is a magic figure for the combat saucer—it is this amount of KVA and this amount of k that can be translated into Mach 3 speeds.

Meanwhile Glenn Martin now feels ready to say in public that they are examining the unified field theory to see what can be done. It would probably be truer to say that Martin and other companies are now looking for men who can make some kind of sense out of Einstein's equations. There's nobody in the air industry at present with the faintest idea of what it is all about. Also, just as necessary, companies have somehow to find administrators who know enough of the mathematics to be able to guess what kind of industrial investment is likely to be necessary for the company to secure the most rewarding prime contracts in the new science. This again is not so easy since much of the mathematics just cannot be translated into words. You either understand the figures, or you cannot ever have it explained to you. This is rather new because even things like indeterminacy in quantum mechanics can be more or less put into words.

Perhaps the main thing for management to bear in mind in recruiting men is that essentially electro-gravitics is a branch of wave technology and much of it starts with Planck's dimensions of action, energy and time, and some of this is among the most firm and least controversial sections of modern atomic physics.

Aviation Report, 19 November 1954

Electro-Gravitics Puzzle

Back in 48 and 49, the public in the U.S. had a surprisingly clear idea of what a flying saucer should, or could, do. There has never been any realistic explanation of what propulsion agency could make it do those things, but its ability to move within its own gravitation field was presupposed from its maneuverability. Yet all this was at least two years before electro-static energy was shown to produce propulsion. It is curious that the public were so ahead of the empiricists on this occasion, and there are two possible explanations. One is that optical illusions or atmospheric phenomena offered a preconceived idea of how the ultimate aviation device ought to work. The other explanation might be that this was a recrudescence of Jung's theory of the Universal Mind which moves up and down in relation to the capabilities of the highest intellects and this may be a case of it reaching a very high peak of perception.

But for the air industries to realize an electro-gravitic aircraft means a return to basic principles in nuclear physics, and a re-examination of much in wage technology that has hitherto been taken for granted. Anything that goes any way towards proving the unified field theory will have as great a bearing on electro-gravitics efforts on the furtherance of nuclear power generally. But the aircraft industry might as well face up to the fact that priorities will in the end be competing with the existing nuclear science commitments. The fact that electro-gravitics has important applications other than for a weapon will however strengthen the case for governments to get in on the work going on.

Aviation Report, 28 January 1955

Management Note for Electro-Gravitics

The gas turbine engine produced two new companies in the U.S. engine field and they have, between them, at various times offered the traditional primes rather formidable competition. Indeed General Electric at this moment has, in the view of some, taken the Number two position. In Britain no new firms managed to get a footing, but one, Metro-Vick, might have done if it had put its whole energies into the business. It is on the whole unfortunate for Britain that no bright newcomer has been able to screw up competition in the engine field as English Electric have done in the airframe business.

Unlike the turbine engine, electro-gravitics is not just a new propulsion system, it is a new mode of thought in aviation and communications, and it is something that may become all-embracing. Theoretical studies of the science unfortunately have to extend right down to the mathematics of the meson and there is no escape from that. But the relevant facts wrung from the nature of the nuclear structure will have their impact on the propulsion system, the airframe and also its guidance. The airframe, as such, would not exist, and what is now a complicated stressed structure becomes some convenient form of hard envelope. New companies therefore who would like to see themselves as major defence prime contractors in ten or fifteen years' time are the ones most likely to stimulate development. Several typical companies in Britain and the U.S. come to mind—outfits like AiResearch, Raytheon, Plessey in England, Rotax and others. But the companies have to face a decade of costly research into theoretical physics and it means a great deal of trust. Companies are mostly overloaded already and they cannot afford to, but when they sit down and think about the matter they can scarcely avoid the conclusion that they cannot afford not to be in at the beginning.

Aviation Report, 8 February 1955

Electro-Gravitics Breakthroughs

Lawrence Bell said last week he though that the tempo of development leading to the use of nuclear fuels and antigravitational vehicles (he meant presumably ones that create their own gravitational field independently of the earth's) would accelerate. He added that the breakthroughs now feasible will advance their introduction ahead of the time it has taken to develop the turbojet to its present pitch. Beyond the thermal barrier was a radiation barrier, and he might have added ozone poisoning and meteorite hazards, and beyond that again a time barrier. Time however is not a single calculable entity and Einstein has taught that an absolute barrier to aviation is the environmental barrier in which there are physical limits to any kind of movement from one point in space-time continuum to another. Bell (the company not the man) have a reputation as experimentalists and are not so earthy as some of the other U.S. companies; so while this first judgment on progress with electrogravitics is interesting, further word is awaited from the other major elements of the air business. Most of the companies are now studying several forms of propulsion without heat engines though it is early days yet to determine which method will see the light of day first. Procurement will open out because the capabilities of such aircraft are immeasurably greater than those envisaged with any known form of engine.

Aviation Report, 15 July 1955

Thermonuclear-Electrogravitics Interaction

The point has been made that the most likely way of achieving the comparatively low fusion heat needed—1,000,000 degrees provided it can be sustained (which it cannot be in fission for more than a microsecond or two of time)—is by use of a linear accelerator. The concentration of energy that may be obtained when accelerators are rigged in certain ways make the production of very high temperatures feasible but whether they could be concentrated enough to avoid a thermal heat problem remains to be seen. It has also been suggested that linear accelerators would be the way to develop the high electrical energies needed for creation of local gravitational systems. It is possible therefore to imagine that the central core of a future air vehicle might be a linear accelerator which would create a local weightless state by use of electrostatic processes and turn heat into energy without chemical processes for propulsion. Eventually—towards the end of this century—the linear accelerator itself would not be required and a ground generating plant would transmit the necessary energy for both purposes by wave propagation.

Aviation Report, 30 August 1955

Point about Thermonuclear Reaction Reactors

The 20-year estimate by the AEC last week that lies between present research frontiers and the fusion reactor probably refers to the time it will take to tap fusion heat. But it may be thought that rather than use the molecular and chemical processes of twisting heat into thrust it would be more appropriate to use the new heat source in conjunction with some form of nuclear thrust producer which would be in the form of electrostatic energy. The first two Boeing nuclearjet prototypes now under way are being designed to take either molecular jets, or nuclear jets in case the latter are held up for one reason, or another. But the change from molecular to direct nuclear thrust production in conjunction with the thermonuclear reactor is likely to make the aircraft designed around the latter a totally different breed of cat. It is also expected to take longer than two decades, though younger executives in trade might expect to live to see a prototype.

Aviation Report, 14 October 1955

Electrogravitics Feasibility

Opinion on the prospects of using electrostatic energy for propulsion, and eventually for creation of a local gravitational field isolated from the earth's has naturally polarized into the two opposite extremes. There are those who say it is nonsense from start to finish, and those who are satisfied from performance already physically manifest that it is possible and will produce air vehicles with absolute capabilities and no moving parts. The feasibility of a mach 3 fighter (the present aim in studies) is dependent on a rather large k extrapolation, considering the pair of saucers that have physically demonstrated the principle only achieved a speed of some 30 fps. But, and this is very important, they have attained a working velocity using a very inefficient (even by to-day's knowledge) form of condenser complex. These humble beginnings are surely as hopeful as Whittle's early postulations.

It was, by the way, largely due to the early references in Aviation Report that work is gathering momentum in the U.S. Similar studies are beginning in France, and in England, some men are on the job full time.

Aviation Report, 15 November 1955

ELECTRO-GRAVITICS EFFORT WIDENING

Companies studying the implications of gravitics are said, in a new statement, to include Glenn Martin, Convair, Sperry-Rand, Sikorsky, Bell, Lear Inc. and Clark Electronics. Other companies who have previously evinced interest include Lockheed Douglas and Hiller. The remainder are not disinterested, but have not given public support to the new science—which is widening all the time. The approach in the U.S. is in a sense more ambitious than might have been expected. The logical approach, which has been suggested by Aviation Studies, is to concentrate on improving the output of electrostatic rigs in existence that are known to be able to produce thrust. The aim would be to concentrate on electrostatics for propulsion first and widen the practical engineering to include establishment of local gravity forcelines, independent of those of the earth's to provide unfettered vertical movement as and when the mathematics develops.

However, the U.S. approach is rather to put money into fundamental theoretical physics of gravitation in an effort first to create the local gravitational field. Working rigs would follow in the wake of the basic discoveries. Probably the correct course would be to sponsor both approaches, and it is now time that the military stepped in with big funds. The trouble about the idealistic approach to gravity is that the aircraft companies do not have the men to conduct such work.

There is every expectation in any case that the companies likely to find the answers lie outside the aviation field. These would emerge as the masters of aviation in its broadest sense.

The feeling is therefore that a company like A.T. & T. is most likely to be first in this field. This giant company (unknown in the air and weapons field) has already revolutionized modern warfare with the development of the junction transistor and is expected to find the final answers to absolute vehicle levitation. This therefore is where the bulk of the sponsoring money should go.

A BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF EXPERIMENTS MADE IN PARIS BY T. TOWNSEND BROWN

TOWNSEND BROWN

A Brief Description of Experiments made in Paris.
(1955 - 1956)

These experiments were made with apparatus in vacuum of 10^{-6} mm. Hg. The essential part of the apparatus consisted of two condensers mounted at the ends of a horizontal beam as shown in Fig. 1. This horizontal beam was suspended at its mid-point, mounted on bearings and adapted for continuous rotation. The plates were charged to a potential difference of up to 150 KV and the polarity was as indicated in Fig. 1.

The voltage was delivered by apparatus capable of delivering 1 ma. From time to time, discharges occurred between the plates, the evidence for which was bright spots appearing on the negative plate and regions of luminescence on the positive plate. The times of occurrence of these discharges were erratic and the duration of each discharge, as estimated on the oscilloscope, was of the order of 1-3 milliseconds.

At each discharge, a considerable torque was exerted on the rotating part of the apparatus, as evidenced by the sudden increase in rate of rotation of the suspended system about the point of support. The fact that this torque was considerable was shown by the fact that the rate of rotation was so great after 4 to 5 discharges as to make it seem advisable to shut off the voltage to prevent the apparatus from breaking due to centrifugal force.

In the various experiments, the plates of the condensers were made of various metals among which were aluminum, brass and lead. The thickness of the plates (discs) was 1/4 inch and the diameter was 3 inches. The edges were rounded and smooth. Rotation was always in the direction of negative to positive, for each condenser. Reversal of polarity caused a reversal of rotation.

It was found that torque increased rapidly with voltage (applied to the plates). This increase was more than linear and seemed to follow an exponential law as the voltage increased.

It seems difficult or impossible to account for this force by the usual laws concerning electricity and magnetism, electrons, ions, etc. Thinking that the force might be associated with the emission of electrons and/or positive ions from the plates, the shape of the electrodes was changed from that shown in Fig. 1 to that in Fig. 2 and Fig. 3., the idea being that the escape paths would be different in these two cases from that shown in Fig. 1. It was found, however, that neither of these two changes of shape produced any appreciable difference in the torque due to a single discharge.

Finally, Fig. 4 shows a more radical change in design. Here, each condenser was surrounded by an enclosure of plexiglas. If the impulse imparted to the suspended system was due to beams of electrons or positive ions coming from the plates, it would seem that these would be stopped by the plexiglas. Since the plexiglas was part of the rotating system, these beams of positive ions and electrons should impart no net torque to the suspended system.

Nevertheless, it was found, even in the case of Fig. 4, that the torque produced by a single discharge was approximately the same as in Figs. 1,2 and 3.

The question arises - Can these results be explained by the laws of classical physics or is a new phenomenon involved here?

NOTES ON THE SKYVAULT ANTIGRAVITY PROJECT

Below are reproductions of my informant "Tom's" notes from interviews with his supervisor on two occasions (see chapter 7).

August 2, 1974, Interview Notes

Project was initiated by the government through Rocketdyne in the middle to late 50s. Extremely high frequency in 1000 gigaHertz on up were employed with a voltage waveform being triangular [i.e., sawtooth shaped] (other forms were tried, but this was the best to use) at 100 kv with infinitesimal amperage—milliamps. Lowest frequency ranged from 7.2 to 8.7 gigaHertz.

With use of waveguides, a beam of conical shape was projected upward from ground to a vehicle which rode upon it. The vehicle had a concave bottom and the cone of the beam was wide in respect to the vehicle—the concave surface received the beam and was buoyed by it. [Tom later acknowledged that he had misinterpreted the above propulsion scheme; see the notes from his October 2, 1974 interview with his supervisor reproduced below.]

Mathematical analysis, & other related studies, of the conical shape region proved that Einstein was correct on gravitational waves and particular and that the high frequency nullified gravitation effects. For nullification of gravity, the frequencies do extend upward into the lower spectrum of light. The vehicle that did carry a man was ~~powered~~ (controlled) by a transmitter located upon a mountain (no info on this transmitter). The highest observed flight remembered (though it probably had a higher capability) was ~50,000 feet and a range of near 300 miles—over desert and attained extreme speeds.

Microwaves do exert a pressure and aluminum foil will move and disintegrate upon exposure. Other materials may or may not be affected in the same manner—paper will not work, some kinds of wood and silks will not. Best movement occurs if the material has a particular magnetic property (not mention as to meaning, however, he inferred paramagnetic?). The concave portion of the vehicle had something similar to ceramic like Corning ware. Extensive tests involving materials and wave shapes were made and data was accumulated on destruction, burning, and shock waves on those materials that responded. The microwaves employed were able to pass through brick walls & concrete without affecting either and with non diminishing effect on the microwaves. The estimated efficiency of the propulsion system was 60% with a much higher efficiency at this time as high probability. Diode material for the rectifiers (and maybe Gunn diodes) were furnished by International Rectifier. Reactions with the beam with some materials were violent and unpredictable. Used different shapes of waveguides throughout research.

October 2, 1974, Interview Notes

I asked if the mechanical pulser had very small electrode for arcing & if it operated somewhere from 60 to 100 thousand rpm—both were answered with a "yes." I asked if they had temperature problems with electrodes burning—No, he said, but using platinum it was eliminated and there was very little arcing due to the ultrahigh vacuum.

They did try at first a mechanical pulser at atmospheric pressure but discarded it promptly due to bouncing and noise in its pulses.

I have had a misinterpretation. The propulsion device was built into the spacecraft and a transmitter on the ground was used to provide directional control only to the spacecraft. So it is not a beam rider. The propulsion beam from the spacecraft was focused by an iris type convex lens towards the Earth and was a greenish blue light.

Letter Tom received from his supervisor's friend.

Early attempts to use radio frequencies for antigravitation vehicles were made some 25 years ago. Detectors worked at frequencies below 1000 gigaherts and were effective mainly in keeping service men busy. In fact, legend has it that transcendental meditation was brought to the West by service man who fell into a trance while chanting obscenities at a malfunctioning UHF detector.

The major problem with systems working in the UHF band was that the field of protection could not be effectively contained. At the comparatively low frequencies employed, the radio-waves would penetrate walls and etect motion outside the desired area to be used, thus making the detectors unreliable. These early units working in the UHF band were often incorrectly referred to as "radar" detectors.

Some 15 years ago the first microwave detectors using klystrons and megastrons were developed. These early units lacked the stability, reliability and usefull life necessary for an antigravitation vehicle. They also needed more power than was economic to supply with a standby battery of units. With the availability of a solid-state device the Gunn diode - a new opportunity was presented to use microwaves. These small devices, requiring less than one watt to operate, were soon engineered into units that fulfilled all the requirements for a compact and reliable unit. Reliability, of course, came as both manufacturers and lab men learned together the uses and limitations of the microwave gravitation units.

A microwave detector unit is essentially a "box" which is easily installed upon board the vehicle and aimed in the general direction of the area requiring gravitation, walktested, and hopefully forgotten until the next shot. Understanding what happens inside this "box" will help the electronice engineer in and in maximum advantage. (The rest is still classfied)

Microwaves can be considered to have some of the properties of light. Like light beams, microwaves travel in straight lines and can be reflected by an object. Just as light is aborbed and dissipated by some materials, so also are the dad-blame microwaves. It is therefore convenient to think of microwaves being radiatied as analogous to the transmission of light.

The electromagnetic radiation in microwaves consists of a wave in which there are two components, or vectors. These are termed the E and H vectors and are mutually perpendicular to the direction of propagation.

Page Two

The mportance of the E and H vectors is that they determine in effect the coverage in the horizontal (H) and vertical (E) plane once they are launched from a wave guide.

Gunn diodes for generation of low power microwave radiation. Typically, radiation does not exceed 10 KW, so an amplifier has to be used to extend it's use to launch the dad-blame vehicle.

Gunn diodes radiate at their characteristic frequency when biased to the proper level.. Biasing is extremely simple and usuall takes the form of the Gunn dode and a series resistor across a stable voltage source. There are certain conditions which must be satisfied before the desired frequency and stability are obtained. To achieve these conditions, the diode is placed in a "cavity," a small, deceptively simple box, open at one end. The dimensions of the box are critical and must be designed to match the characteristics of the Gunn diode. A typical frequency used in microwave units are in the region of 100.5 to 500 GHz.

The microwave energy generated is quite useless unless it is directed in a controlled way into the area to be vaulted. To achieve this, a waveguide is used, which takes the form of a "horn" that serves two main purposes:

1. To match the cavity to air. The taper in the horn ensures that there is a smooth transition from the cavity to free air. The dimension of the horn is a multiple of the wavelength.
2. To provide a means of controlling the radiation pattern, or shape, the valuted area must be (classfied)

Referring back to the E and H vectors, remember that these vector planes are mutually perpendicular. The geometry of the horn controls the radiation pattern in each of the planes. The wider the taper of the horn, the broader the beam width; the narrower the taper, the narrower the beam.

We have so far discussed in general terms how microwaves are generated and launched into the vaulting machine. We will now see how microwaves are used to move the dad-blamed vehicle.

Situated in a replica of the transmission cavity and horn assembly is a device known as the mixer diode.

Woops, there goes the bell C U L

Well let's see we were talking about the transmission cavity, huh ---------------?
The purpose of this diode is to provide an output signal by the mixing of two frequencies. This is accomplished by locally diverting some of the microwave signal from the trnsmitting antenna into the receiving antenna. Here the signal is mixed with the microwave radiation received from the area after reflection.
If there is no change in the signal received, the output in the mixer diode is very simple as with the gunn diode, the biasing of the mixer will be applied and the hole thing goes cu-put. No the usual form of biasing is to connect the diode in series with a large value ristor across a stabilized voltage source. Biasing current is usually in the tens of micro-waves/amperes.

When the mixer is moved in on the subject matter and reflected towards the eye, the reflected signal will result. This change in signal is mixed with some fo the locally diverted microwave signal, resulting a modulated signal. The ole mixer diode demodulates the signal to produce an output which is then fed into the processing circuit.

The distance of the eye from the output amplifier depends on the following factors:
1. The distance of the eye from the detector.
2. The size of the eye.
3. The strenght of microwave energy in the area.

Of course the closer the eye is to the detector, the more microwave energy it will move. and then the larger the eye, the more microwave energy will be intercepted, with a stronger signal resulting. Crazy, huh-------------------not for sure ?

We have so far discussed amplitude changes in signal. There is another change in ye ole signal. That of frequency. The frequency of the signal generated by the unit must be generated and this depends or controls the speed of the vehicle. A sensibly close approximation of the frequency, fi, caused by movement in a 100 GHz field is where : fi - frequency caused by movement of unit.

$$fi = \frac{SoFm}{1500}$$

So = speed of object in cm/sec.
fm = microwave frequency in megahertz.

Now comes the operating in the X-band and within power levels required are obtainable at an acceptable level. Higher frequency devices which meet the power level and requirement are not yet available. As discussed earlier, the higher the frequency, the less will be the likelihood of penetration of the energy through solid objects. It is for this reason that the security industry has moved away from frequencies below 1000 GHz.

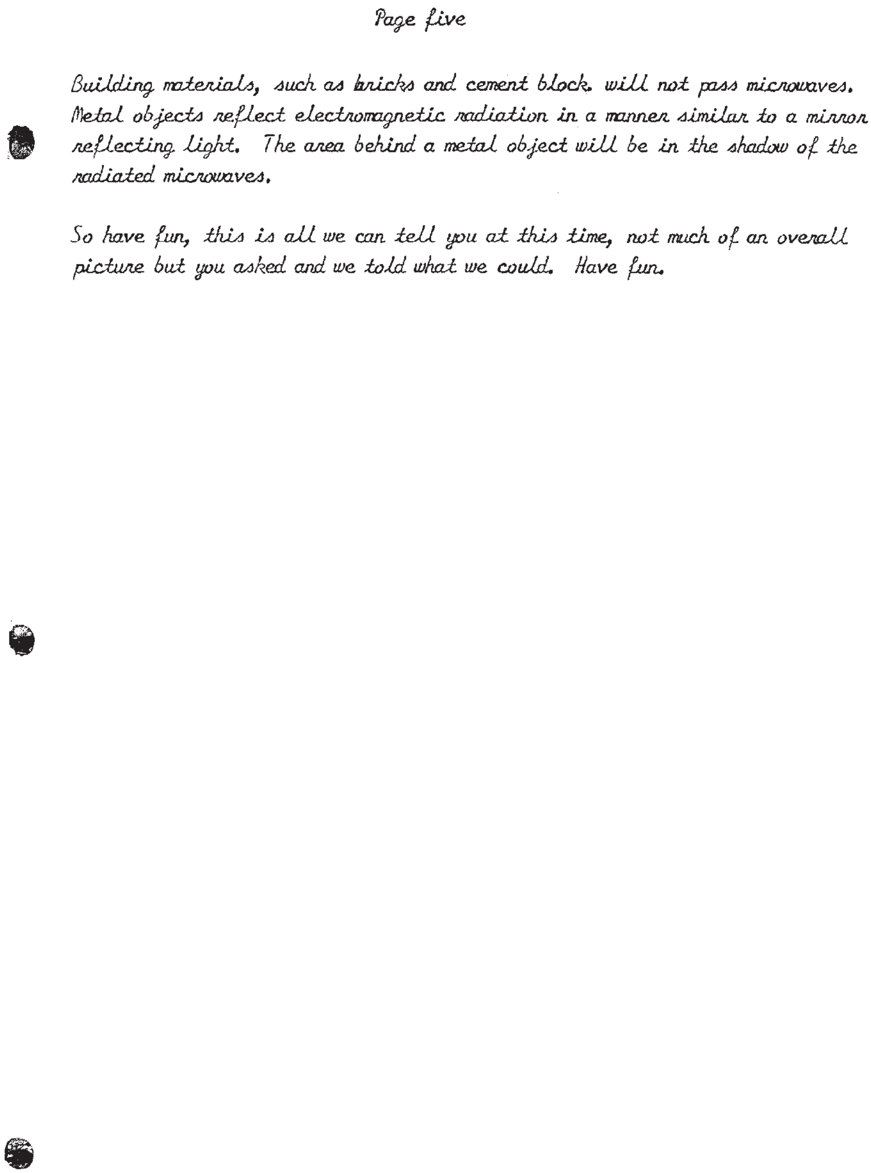
There are two basic configurations of microwave diodes. The simplest type uses the same antenna for both transmitting and receiving, and has a single cavity-horn arrangement. This simplified configuration of the homodyne-type circuit suffers from lack of range. Typically, a system of this type will target at abot 30 miles. The homodyne circuit configuration depends on the non-linear characteristics of the oscillating bulk-effect diodes to as as a oscillator. The doppler output is then amplified and processed to produce the vehicle, in motion.

The second type of configuration as for example in the Micro-X unit utilizes separate transmitting and receiving antennas. The gunn is held at the optimum bias voltage necessary for oscillation. The bias current for the diode housed in the receiving antenna is aslo closely controlled by means of a stabilized voltage source.

Under normal-no movement-conditions, there is no change of output from the coupled diode to the pre-amplifier. A notchfilter effectively rejects signals caused by ripples and the output of the filter circuit is connected to the rangecontrol potentiometer. The next stage is an amplifier which is connected to a trigger. The output from the trigger circuit is usdd to change a capacitor which in turn causes the de-energizer when the voltages reaches a preset level.

The feature of a unit like the Micro-X is the ganged range and integrator potentiomentesr this control is wired so that as the sensitivity range is increased, the same number of steps will be required to vault. The system sensitivity is independent of the range setting. An additional persistence control allows for increasing the duration of time before vaulting conditions is recognized.

An analogy has already been drawn between microwaves and light. Glass will transmit microwaves. Wood will attenuate microwaves to a degree depending on thickness. this many be compared to the attenuation presented by translucent glass to light.



Page five

Building materials, such as bricks and cement block will not pass microwaves. Metal objects reflect electromagnetic radiation in a manner similar to a mirror reflecting light. The area behind a metal object will be in the shadow of the radiated microwaves.

So have fun, this is all we can tell you at this time, not much of an overall picture but you asked and we told what we could. Have fun.

MEMORANDUM TO THE CONTROLLER OF TELECOMMUNICATIONS:

For the past several years we have been engaged in the study of various aspects of radio wave propagation. The vagaries of this phenomenon have led us into the fields of aurora, cosmic radiation, atmospheric radio-activity and geo-magnetism. In the case of geo-magnetics our investigations have contributed little to our knowledge of radio wave propagation as yet, but nevertheless have indicated several avenues of investigation which may well be explored with profit. For example, we are on the track of a means whereby the potential energy of the earth's magnetic field may be abstracted and used.

On the basis of theoretical considerations a small and very crude experimental unit was constructed approximately a year ago and tested in our Standards Laboratory. The tests were essentially successful in that sufficient energy was abstracted from the earth's field to operate a voltmeter, approximately 50 milliwatts. Although this unit was far from being self-sustaining, it nevertheless demonstrated the soundness of the basic principles in a qualitative manner and provided useful data for the design of a better unit.

The design has now been completed for a unit which should be self-sustaining and in addition provide a small surplus of power. Such a unit, in addition to functioning as a 'pilot power plant' should be large enough to permit the study of the various reaction forces which are expected to develop.

We believe that we are on the track of something which may well prove to be the introduction to a new technology. The existence of a different technology is borne out by the investigations which are being carried on at the present time in relation to flying saucers.

While in Washington attending the NARB Conference, two books were released, one titled "Behind the Flying Saucer" by Frank Scully, and the other "The Flying Saucers are Real" by Donald Keyhoe. Both books dealt mostly with the sightings of unidentified objects and both books claim that flying objects were of extra-terrestrial origin and might well be space ships from another planet. Scully claimed that the preliminary studies of one saucer which fell into the hands of the United States Government indicated that they operated on some hitherto unknown magnetic principles. It appeared to me that our own work in geo-magnetics might well be the linkage between our technology and the technology by which the saucers are designed and operated. If it is assumed that our geo-magnetic investigations are in the right direction, the theory of operation of the saucers becomes quite straightforward, with all observed features explained qualitatively and quantitatively.

I made discreet enquiries through the Canadian Embassy staff in Washington who were able to obtain for me the following information:

a. The matter is the most highly classified subject in the United States Government, rating higher even than the H-bomb.

b. Flying saucers exist.

c. Their modus operandi is unknown but concentrated effort is being made by a small group headed by Doctor Vannevar Bush.

d. The entire matter is considered by the United States authorities to be of tremendous significance.

I was further informed that the United States authorities are investigating along quite a number of lines which might possibly be related to the saucers such as mental phenomena and I gather that they are not doing too well since they indicated that if Canada is doing anything at all in geo-magnetics they would welcome a discussion with suitably accredited Canadians.

While I am not yet in a position to say that we have solved even the first problems in geo-magnetic energy release, I feel that the correlation between our basic theory and the available information on saucers checks too closely to be mere coincidence. It is my honest opinion that we are on the right track and are fairly close to at least some of the answers.

Mr. Wright, Defence Research Board liaison officer at the Canadian Embassy in Washington, was extremely anxious for me to get in touch with Doctor Solandt, Chairman of the Defence Research Board, to discuss with him future investigations along the line of geo-magnetic energy release.

I do not feel that we have as yet sufficient data to place before Defence Research Board which would enable a program to be initiated within that organization, but I do feel that further research is necessary and I would prefer to see it done within the frame work of our own organization with, of course, full co-operation and exchange of information with other interested bodies.

I discussed this matter fully with Doctor Solandt, Chairman of Defence Research Board, on November 20th and placed before him as much information as I have been able to gather to date. Doctor Solandt agreed that work on geo-magnetic energy should go forward as rapidly as possible and offered full co-operation of his Board in providing laboratory faciliti acquisition of necessary items of equipment, and specialized personnel for incidental work in the project. I indicated to Doctor Solandt that we woul prefer to keep the project within the Department of Transport for the time being until we have obtained sufficient information to permit a complete assessment of the value of the work.

It is therefore recommended that a PROJECT be set up within the frame work of this Section to study this problem and that the work be carried on a part time basis until such time as sufficient tangible result can be seen to warrant more definitive action. Cost of the program in its initial stages are expected to be less than a few hundred dollars and can be carried by our Radio Standards Lab appropriation.

Attached hereto is a draft of terms of reference for such a project which, if authorized, will enable us to proceed with this research work within our own organization.

ELECTROGRAVITICS: AN ENERGY-EFFICIENT MEANS OF SPACE PROPULSION

NASA SEOP Submission no. 100159

“Electrogravitics: An Energy-Efficient Means of Space Propulsion” is the abstract I submitted to NASA under the auspice of The Starburst Foundation—a nonprofit research institute I founded in 1984 to advance our understanding of the natural world.

Electrogravitics: An Energy-Efficient Means of Space Propulsion

by Paul LaViolette, Ph.D.
The Starburst Foundation

Description. The proposed propulsion technology would replace the energy-intensive rocket technology presently used for propelling spacecraft. The technology, called electrogravitics, has already been developed in “black” defense research programs, programs so highly classified that their existence is not publicly acknowledged. Electrogravitics may appear to violate certain assumptions about gravity commonly held by physicists and aeronautical engineers, so the reader is requested to keep an open mind. The technology does exist; it has been under development for the past 40 years; and it has been shown to be feasible both in carefully controlled laboratory experiments and in actual test flights.

Basically electrogravitics is a technology that allows a spacecraft to artificially alter its own gravity field in such a manner that it is able to levitate itself. This is accomplished by applying a megavolt pulsed DC electric potential across the outer hull and wing of the spacecraft. The craft would be designed to have a relatively large body surface area, similar to the flying wing concept employed in the B-2 bomber. Alternatively it could be discoidal in shape with a lenticular cross-section. Thrust would always be in the direction of the craft's positively charged surface. To quote a February 1956 Air Force intelligence report (now declassified), such a craft "can perform the function of a classic lifting surface—it produces a pushing effect on the under surface and a suction effect on the upper, but unlike the airfoil, it does not require a flow of air to produce the effect."*

Payoff. The value of this technology is that the craft may achieve Earth orbit flight at a much lower velocity than conventional rocket propulsion and without the huge fuel expenditure. It would eliminate the hazard of polluting the Earth's stratosphere and space environment with aluminum oxide spherules, which has become an increasing problem with the solid fuel boosters currently in use. The fuel requirements for electrogravitic propulsion are less than one percent of those presently used to lift the space shuttle into orbit. Problems typically encountered with the Space Shuttle's rocket propulsion technology (e.g., liquid hydrogen leaks, exhaust leaks around O-rings in the solid fuel booster) would not be present in this technology. Due to its much lower power demands, electrogravitics is much safer and more economical.

Performance Characteristics. As early as 1956, an Air Force study estimated that a manned electrogravitic craft could achieve Mach 3 flight capability with a 50,000 kilowatt power requirement. Such airborne electric power generation is within the reach of present technology. It would require two General Electric superconducting generators powered by two 50,000 horsepower rocket turbine engines. The superconducting generators mentioned here were developed for the Air Force in the late 1970's for use in high-altitude aircraft. Incidentally higher efficiencies are acheived in space due to reduced ion leakage from the hull's charged surface.

Other enabling technologies. All enabling technologies have been developed. As early as 1958, a small scale model of an electrogravitic powered aircraft was able to lift 110% of its weight. Since then manned vehicles have been secretly developed and are presently being test flown.

Relation to major mission objectives. Electrogravitics would allow NASA to make frequent flights into space without the numerous delays presently plaguing the Space Shuttle launchings. (The present three year wait for repairing the Hubble Telescope could be cut to 3 weeks.) It would allow flights directly from Earth to Mars without the necessity of laboriously constructing a Mars spaceship in Earth orbit. Such a flight would no longer be contingent on the preexistence of a space station. Moreover the high speeds potentially achievable with electrogravitics would allow travel to Mars to be made in under a month.

BEYOND ROCKET PROPULSION

NASA SEOP Submission no. 100153

The following is an abstract submitted to NASA by Joe Hughes.

BEYOND ELECTRIC PROPULSION

In the quest to save money in future space missions advanced propulsion designs are under consideration. Electric propulsion is one of the designs proposed. According to John Barnett, Supervisor of Electric Propulsion at Jet Propulsion Laboratories, a system suitable for crewed spacecraft could be ready within fifteen years. George McDonough, Director of Science and Engineering at the Marshall Center, feels that electric propulsion "is an interesting alternative to nuclear propulsion which is the only one being considered by the agency,. . .They [the Soviets] consider it a viable way to do the job. We ought to take a hard look at it before we make any final decisions". The object of this proposal is to reveal that an electric propulsion engine has already been tested and proven. This engine was designed by Thomas Townsend Brown, a former physicist for the U.S. Navy, and received U.S. Patent number 3,022,430 on February 20, 1962, however the patent has expired so the design is no longer proprietary and can be considered by the Space Exploration Outreach Program.

This electric propulsion engine offers many substantial improvements over chemical and nuclear rockets. Since it can convert the energy of electrical potential directly into mechanical force suitable for causing relative motion, without the aid of moving parts, tremendous gains in efficiency and reliability can be achieved. Another advantage is that the engine can run effectively on Carbon Dioxide. Since the atmosphere of Mars is largely CO_2 a probe or ship which used this design would not need to carry fuel to Mars to explore its surface or for the return journey to Earth. Finally, no nuclear waste products or radiation is produced.

In contrast to conventional electric propulsion approaches which produce thrust by the accelerating gas only, the Brown engine ionizes the exiting gas, thus creating an electrical potential between the gas and the engine itself such that they repel each other. With the result that, according to the patent, that the gas "thrust will be small compared to the electrokinetic thrust developed." In fact, a new principle is at work here. Basically, Brown discovered that a sufficiently charged capacitor exhibits unidirectional thrust in the direction of the positive plate. To prove that his capacitors involve something more than ion propulsion he immersed them in oil, a medium which does not readily ionize and observed that the thrust was the same as in the air.

In early atmospheric tests, he used a power input of 50 watts to generate an electrical potential of 50,000 volts which caused his disc-shaped airfoils to fly at 12 miles per hour. To further prove his point that something more than ion propulsion was at work here, he tested his discs in a vacuum in the 1950's under the auspices of a French corporation, La Societe Nationale de Construction Aeronautique Sud Ouest (SNCASO). He had theorized that the speed of his discs would increase exponentially with the voltage applied, and succeeded in flying some of his 3-foot discs in a vacuum at speeds of several hundred miles an hour using an electrical potential of 200,000 volts. Unfortunately, as a result of a corporate merger with another French company, Sud Est, propulsion efforts were dropped for unknown reasons to concentrate on airframe manufacture and design.

In the early sixties Townsend Brown organized his own corporation under the name Rand International Limited. In spite of numerous patents, one of which is attached, and many demonstrations, success eluded him, the time was not right, people were too set on the Apollo way of doing things. Now everything is fair game again, no Mars mission designs are set in stone, which is why I have resubmitted his idea.

Dear Mr. Morris:

Enclosed is another copy of my submission to NASA's Space Exploration Outreach Program which describes the benefits of electrogravitic propulsion. Also I have enclosed several papers I have written on the subject, a copy of a 1956 article in Interavia Magazine, and a copy of the February 1956 Aviation Studies report on electrogravitics. Please return the Aviation Studies report when you are through; the other literature you may keep.

I urge you to pass this material on to other people in your group so that hopefully some discussion can get started on applying this technology to the Aero-Space Plane. Besides the benefits of gravity propulsion, electrostatic charging of the plane's leading edge would also have the added benefit of reducing air friction heating of the hull surface.

Clearly those who are hearing about electrogravitics for the first time are presented with the hurdle of believing that it is true and not some wild fabrication. I hope that I have provided a sufficient number of credible references in the enclosed material to allay such skepticism. I have also enclosed some sample lists of studies which Aviation Studies has put out to give an idea of their line of activity.

If, after reading through this material and discussing it among yourselves, you have any questions feel free to contact me. My number is (518) . If you want further validation about the capabilities of this technology, I could attempt to put you in touch with people who have been quietly doing work in this area.

PREVENTING ANOTHER COLUMBIA DISASTER

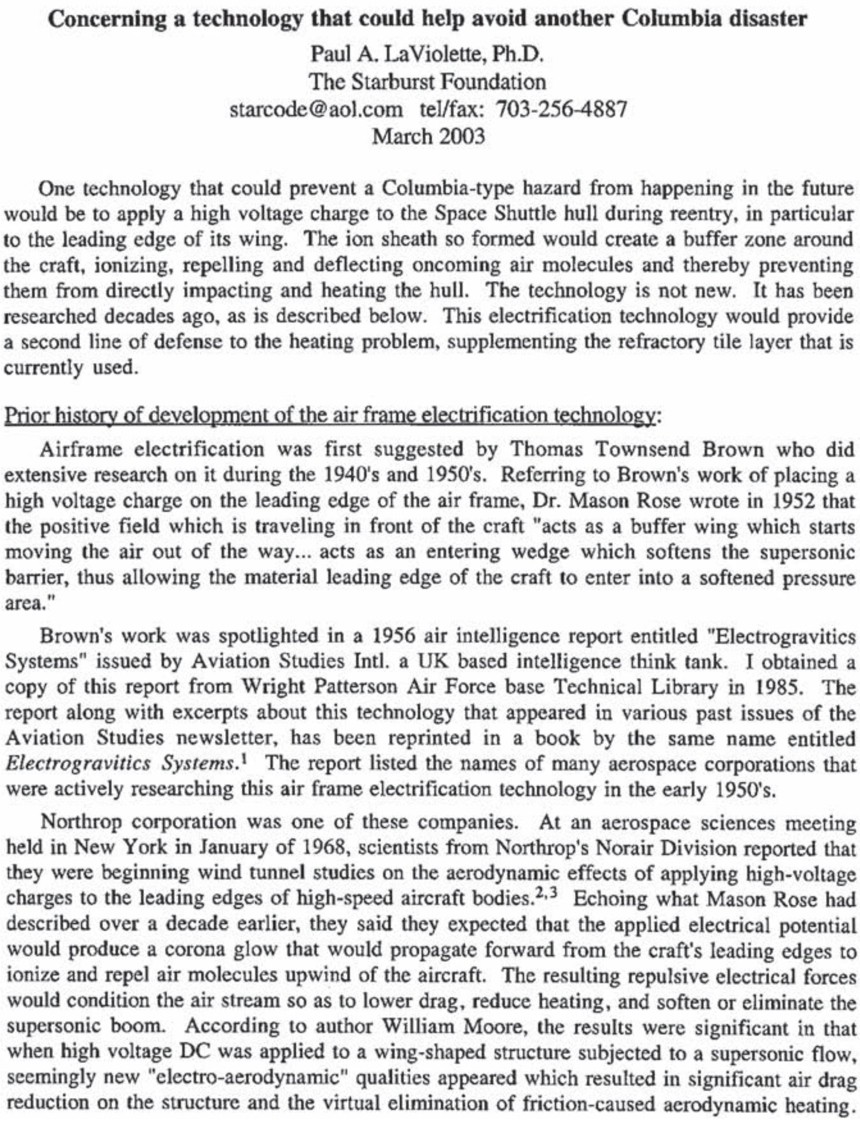
Below is a suggestion I submitted to the Columbia Accident Investigation Board. As of yet, I have received no further communication from the board.



Concerning a technology that could help avoid another Columbia disaster

Paul A. LaViolette, Ph.D.

March 2003

One technology that could prevent a Columbia-type hazard from happening in the future would be to apply a high voltage charge to the Space Shuttle hull during reentry, in particular to the leading edge of its wing. The ion sheath so formed would create a buffer zone around the craft, ionizing, repelling and deflecting oncoming air molecules and thereby preventing them from directly impacting and heating the hull. The technology is not new. It has been researched decades ago, as is described below. This electrification technology would provide a second line of defense to the heating problem, supplementing the refractory tile layer that is currently used.

Prior history of development of the air frame electrification technology:

Airframe electrification was first suggested by Thomas Townsend Brown who did extensive research on it during the 1940's and 1950's. Referring to Brown's work of placing a high voltage charge on the leading edge of the air frame, Dr. Mason Rose wrote in 1952 that the positive field which is traveling in front of the craft "acts as a buffer wing which starts moving the air out of the way... acts as an entering wedge which softens the supersonic barrier, thus allowing the material leading edge of the craft to enter into a softened pressure area."

Brown's work was spotlighted in a 1956 air intelligence report entitled "Electrogravitics Systems" issued by Aviation Studies Intl. a UK based intelligence think tank. I obtained a copy of this report from Wright Patterson Air Force base Technical Library in 1985. The report along with excerpts about this technology that appeared in various past issues of the Aviation Studies newsletter, has been reprinted in a book by the same name entitled Electrogravitics Systems.[1] The report listed the names of many aerospace corporations that were actively researching this air frame electrification technology in the early 1950's.

Northrop corporation was one of these companies. At an aerospace sciences meeting held in New York in January of 1968, scientists from Northrop's Norair Division reported that they were beginning wind tunnel studies on the aerodynamic effects of applying high-voltage charges to the leading edges of high-speed aircraft bodies.[2,3] Echoing what Mason Rose had described over a decade earlier, they said they expected that the applied electrical potential would produce a corona glow that would propagate forward from the craft's leading edges to ionize and repel air molecules upwind of the aircraft. The resulting repulsive electrical forces would condition the air stream so as to lower drag, reduce heating, and soften or eliminate the supersonic boom. According to author William Moore, the results were significant in that when high voltage DC was applied to a wing-shaped structure subjected to a supersonic flow, seemingly new "electro-aerodynamic" qualities appeared which resulted in significant air drag reduction on the structure and the virtual elimination of friction-caused aerodynamic heating.

It is claimed that the B-2 bomber electrifies its wing-leading edge as a means of assisting its propulsion.[4] This appears to have been an extension of research that Northrop had carried out in the 60's, Northrop being the prime contractor for the design and construction of the B-2's airframe. I discussed the application of this technology to the B-2 in a conference paper I presented in 1993, and which was later reprinted in Electrogravitics Systems.

Power generation:

The electrostatic charge applied to the wing leading edge may be supplied either by a flame jet generator powered by the shuttle's own main engine or by flow through wind pods mounted on the wing surface. The latter alternative would have the advantage that it would require no fuel consumption. That is, the energy would be supplied by the reentry plasma wind striking the shuttle. The "wind jet" generator would operate much like a Van de Graff generator where the air stream is analogous to the charge carrying belt in the Van de Graff. The air stream would enter the pod on the upwind end and leave the pod on the downwind end. At the pod's entrance negative ions would be injected into the air stream and as this flowed toward the rear end of the pod, it would carry these ions to a progressively higher potential difference where a portion of the ions would be collected by a conductive grid, the remainder being allowed to flow away toward the rear of the craft. The grid would recycle this current turning an initial 50,000 volt starter current into a multi megavolt current. Since the negative ions are forcefully carried away from the craft by the reentry wind, the shuttle would acquire a very high voltage positive charge in excess of 10 million volts, reaching a maximum at the wing's leading edge which would be connected to the generator's positive terminal.

This plasma jet would operate much like the flame jet generator that Townsend Brown has described in his 1962 electrokinetic generator patent (No. 3,022,430), where the hot combustion gases are here replaced by the reentry airflow captured by the wind pods. In fact, in his patent Brown stated that any kind of flowing nonconductive gas would serve as a substitute for combustion gases.

Reentry effects:

One effect of hull electrification would be to accelerate the speed of the craft. That is, hull electrification would not only reduce hull heating but also air friction drag against the craft. Consequently, the craft would take longer to decelerate as it entered the atmosphere. This could be accommodated by arranging for the craft to have a longer air flight path, e.g., passing through the atmosphere at a slightly lower angle. Alternatively, if more braking is desired at any given time during reentry, the voltage electrifying the wing may be reduced or altogether shut off, thereby engaging once again air friction surface heating. By alternately turning the electrification on and off, hull surface temperatures may be kept minimal while frictional deceleration is employed. This ease of controlling reentry deceleration by the flick of a switch may be found to be superior to controlling the forward pitch of the craft, as is currently done.

Prior contact with NASA suggesting this technology:

In 1990 I had participated in NASA's Space Exploration Outreach Project and had submitted an idea entitled "Electrogravitics: An energy-efficient means of spacecraft propulsion" (submission category: Space transportation, launch vehicles, and propulsion). My paper informed NASA about T. T. Brown's work and about the 1956 Aviation Studies Intl. report mentioned above. I suggested that NASA aggressively pursue electrogravitics for propulsion. Although my submission was not summarized in the final report submitted to NASA. It had unfortunately been omitted by Rand Corp. contract employees who found it, in their opinion, irrelevant to NASA's objectives. One other participant had also submitted a suggestion that NASA look into applying Brown's electrogravitic technology. But that too was omitted from the main report. Attempts were made to obtain the computer records from this project giving the reasons why this technology was deemed unsuitable, but these tapes were reportedly "missing."

In 1992, and again in 1993, I contacted Mr. Charles Morris, Jr. who was at that time heading NASA's National Aero-Space Plane (NASP) program and had encouraged him to have NASA look into electrogravitics. I sent him a lot of material about Townsend Brown's research, including the Aviation Studies International report. In our telephone conversations we had discussed the issue of reentry heating of the hull, which was apparently a problem that NASP was grappling with. In a letter I had sent to him in September 27, 1993, I specifically had pointed out that "electrostatic charging of the plane's leading edge would have the added benefit of reducing air friction heating of the hull surface." But nothing came of this. Mr. Morris later informed me that he was unable to generate any interest at NASA to look further into this.

NASA had a 13 year advance warning. If their research programs had pursued this technology and had applied it to the Space Shuttle, the lives of an entire crew could have been saved along with the hundreds of millions of dollars that are now going into the wreckage recovery and the cost of putting the space program on hold.

Nevertheless, looking to the future, it is my hope that NASA will now undertake the challenge and seriously research the use of this technology. Jonathan Campbell of NASA Marshall Space Flight Center would be a good contact point for beginning such a project. He has spent many years researching the application of high voltage charge to aerospace propulsion. Although his requests for NASA internal funding of this line of research have in the past been turned down, hopefully NASA will now give a higher priority to this work in the wake of the Columbia disaster. As a start, wind tunnel experiments should be carried out similar to those Northrop conducted 35 years ago and efforts should be made at developing a high-voltage wind jet generator for application to the Space Shuttle. I would be glad to assist NASA in this effort.

New Science

"One of the boldest and most exciting books on gravity control to be put forward in our times. Paul LaViolette is an outstanding scientist."

Eugene Podkletnov, Ph.D., Professor of Chemistry,
Tampere, Finland

"Kudos to Paul LaViolette for disclosing the important new science of electro-magneto-gravitic propulsion. For over fifty years, humanity has continued to use earth-destroying primitive fuels when an ocean of infinite energy teems all around us. It is time that the truth be known!"

Steven M. Greer, M.D., author of Hidden Truth: Forbidden Knowledge

In Secrets of Antigravity Propulsion, physicist Paul LaViolette reveals the secret history of antigravity experimentation—from Nikola Tesla and T. Townsend Brown to the B-2 Advanced Technology Bomber. He discloses the existence of advanced gravity-control technologies, under secret military development for decades, that could revolutionize air travel using renewable energy. Included among the secret projects he reveals is the research of Project Skyvault to develop an aerospace propulsion system using intense beams of microwave energy similar to that used by the strange crafts seen flying over Area 51.

Using subquantum kinetics—the science behind antigravity technology—LaViolette reviews numerous field-propulsion devices and technologies that have thrust-to-power ratios thousands of times greater than that of a jet engine and whose effects are not explained by conventional physics and relativity theory. He then presents controversial evidence about the NASA cover-up in adopting these advanced technologies. He also details ongoing Russian research to duplicate John Searl's self-propelled levitating disc and shows how the results of the Podkletnov gravity beam experiment could be harnessed to produce an interstellar spacecraft.

PAUL A. LAVIOLETTE, PH.D., is president of the Starburst Foundation, an interdisciplinary research institute, and holds advanced degrees in systems science and physics. The author of Genesis of the Cosmos, Earth Under Fire, Decoding the Message of the Pulsars, and Subquantum Kinetics, he lives in New York.

The Miracle

ONE NIGHT IN 1995, about two o'clock, I woke from deep sleep. A thought was nudging me: "Unplug the computer."

"Why?" I wondered. There were no sounds of electrical storm outside, and I had a surge protector. I was not in the habit of unplugging my computer except when I moved (which was frequently). No answering idea came. So I didn't know why.

I obeyed the thought anyway, fumbled my way out of bed in the darkness, walked across the few feet from bed to desk. Kneeling down, I groped under the desk for the thick cable that plugged into the upper wall socket. It was the main connector from whose source of power all my other significant computer connections branched off (printer, monitor, and the mechanical brain itself). My fingers found it, yanked it out of the socket. Then I felt my way back to bed and gratefully plunged down again, back under the warm covers, back into deep sleep.

As was my habit, I awoke early the next morning. I jumped out of bed, dressed, and sat before my computer. Time now was so precious, every day borrowed against my unknown quantity of remaining days. Every home I lived in was a borrowed home, a place to fire up that computer and make yet a little more progress on the book by day, a bed for my weary body at night. Because the only way I could finish this project was in hiding, and there was no way to know how long I could stay hidden.

I flipped the computer's ON switch, and the monitor's. They should have instantly whirred to life. But this morning neither one did. I flipped each back to the OFF position, then once more to ON. Still no sign of response.

Something was wrong.

I sat staring at the screen, baffled. Then I remembered that I had unplugged the computer in the middle of the night. I bent down and plugged it into the usual place. I flipped the switches to ON again. And again. They still didn't work. I tried plugging into the other, lower set of holes on that outlet. This time, when I flipped to ON, each component machine commenced the sudden chatty sequence of clicks and hums that told me all were now awake and running.

Now I was not nearly so interested in getting back to work on the book as in finding out why the upper socket hadn't worked. I crawled under the table on my hands and knees with a lamp to get a closer look.

And gasped in horror. A smudge of black defaced the outside of that entry way for two metal prongs of connector. Suddenly I understood. A terrible jolt of electrical power had silently blasted into that line some moment after my night waking. Its energy had melted down the wires and left that telltale black trace on the white plastic's socket's outside. If the cable had been plugged in, that zap would have also fried all the circuits of the hardware half of my writer's brain.

Ever since that night I have had peace of mind about whether writing this book is really God's will for me. After that, I knew for sure that all I had to do to complete this immense project was the necessary work. God would provide the necessary miracles.

Not by might, nor by power, but by my SPIRIT, saith the Lord of hosts.

This Book Is For You

Thank you for choosing to spend time with this book. I send my love and all I've learned. May every sleeper hear this call to wake and tear the wall of silence down!

Yes, you! It is not just hypnotic subjects[1] who sleep. Ignorance and apathy have lulled so many into somnolence. So this book is for general readers who want to be well informed. Knowing real facts about hypnosis will help you make wiser choices. It is also for those courageous individuals who are trained in hypnosis and who believe truth and justice are more important than professional solidarity, lobbying postures, income protection—even personal safety. And it is for legal specialists who may some day use this information in court to fight for justice.

Especially, this book is for all survivors of abusive hypnosis: past, present, and future. May every sleeper who yearns to wake and struggle toward freedom of mind find the courage to seek help in that waking and the blessing of achieving it.

Thanks

Thank you, God, for the task, for the opportunity to accomplish it, and for mercies and miracles along the way.

Thank you to every person who ever bought a book of mine. You encouraged my spirit and enabled me to be a full-time researcher and writer. Thank you to all who have read my writings or listened to my talks in person, on audio, or video. You saw my soul and I hope you became my friend.

Thank you to my many, and precious, personal friends. Over the years I've struggled to become able to talk, read, and write about this difficult subject, you listened with compassion. Every time you listened, you took into yourself a part of my heavy burden and it became lighter and more manageable for me. You supported me with firm arms, lovingly, even when you couldn't see where we were going. You critiqued, scolded, counseled, raged, comforted, tried your best to light up my dark places. I could never have done it without you.

[1] A "subject" is a person who is, or who ever, in the past, has been, hypnotized.

Thank you to all the librarians who helped me research, expecially those anonymous angels working in the Seattle Public Library interlibrary loan system. You faithfully searched out my hundred of requests for books and articles on hypnosis and other mind-control technologies—and never charged a cent. Thanks to Laurel Warg for special research assistance. You helped find answers to my many questions.

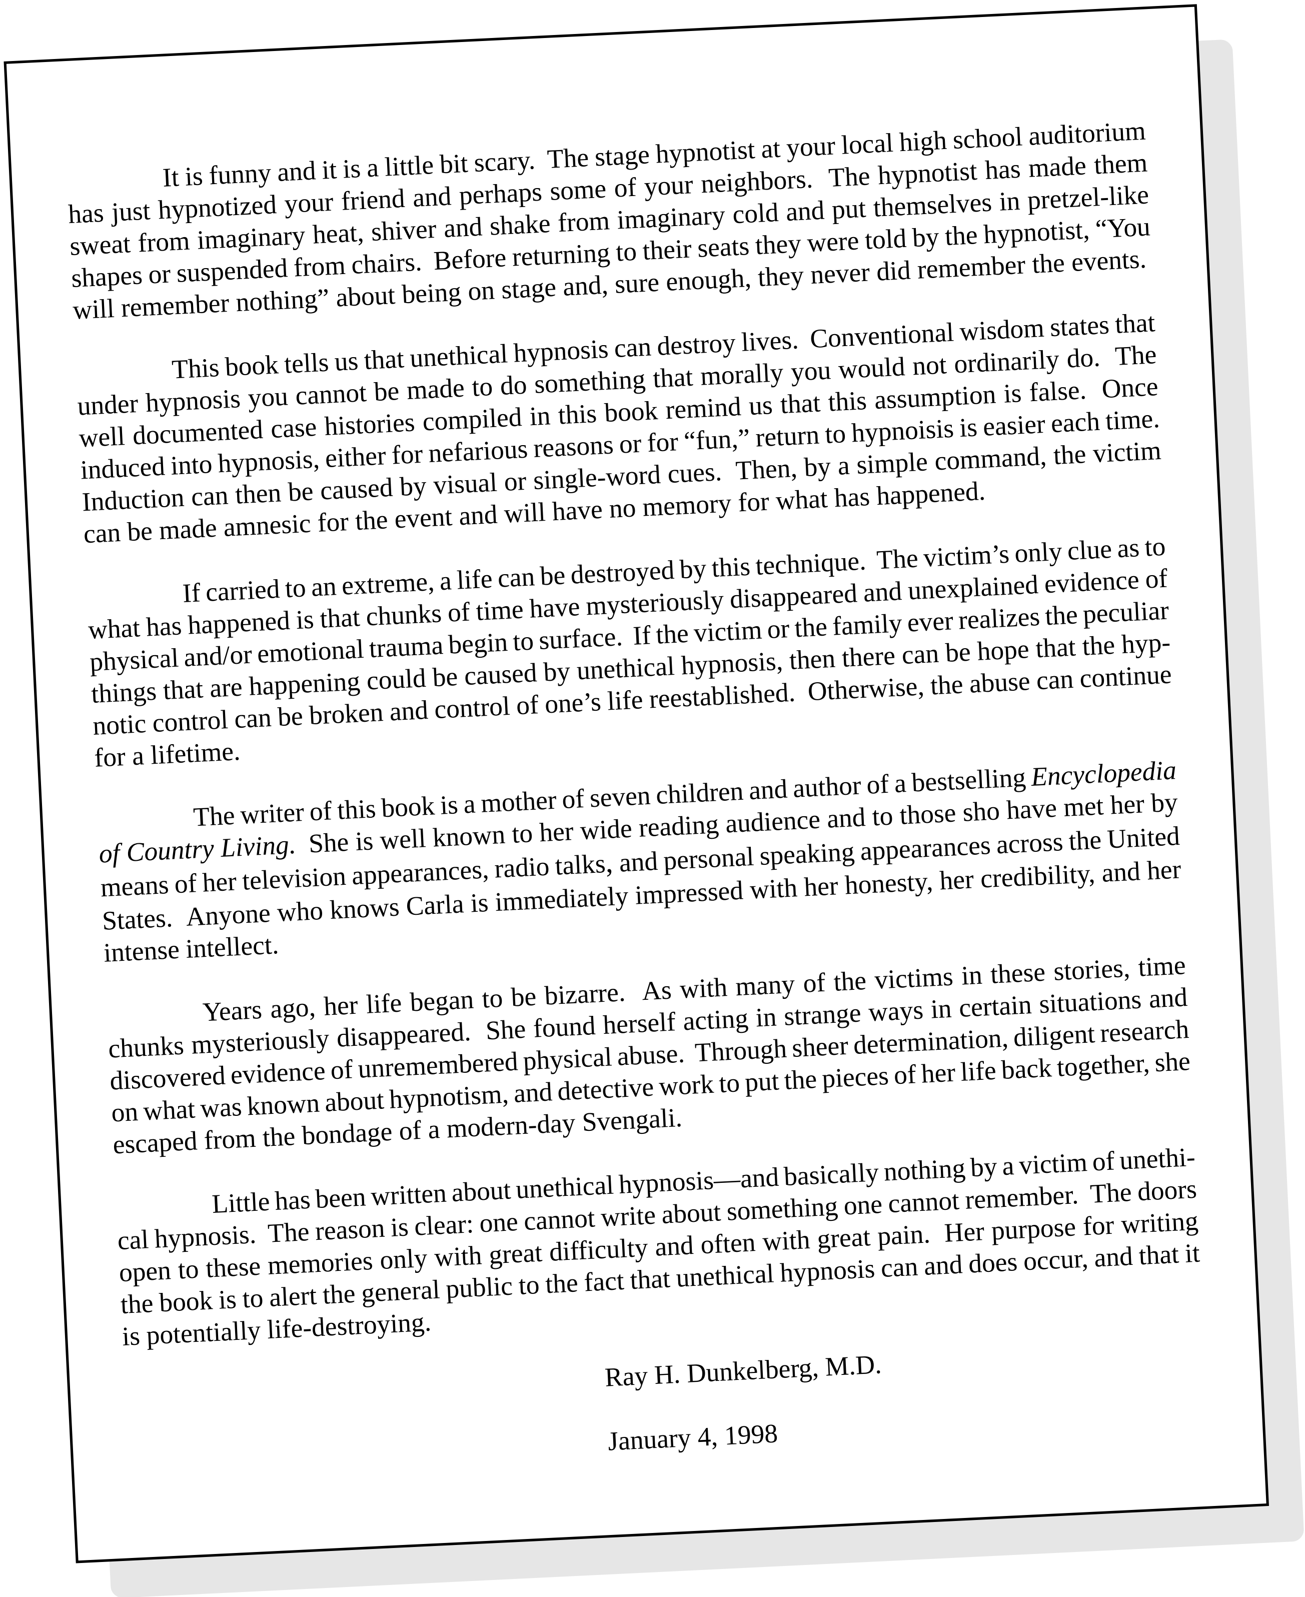
Thank you to previous authors who struggled to collect, record, and disseminate information about mind-control technologies and their abuses. Each writer added nuggets of precious knowledge to the public store and, thereby, made my work easier. Their books were carefully, even tediously, researched—not easy to write. Few sold well. Most passed quickly out of print and were soon forgotten, the author's hard work neither financially nor socially rewarded. They all battled against the attitude of "Secret, don't tell." I am so grateful (However, the inclusion of one or more quotes from any author should not be taken to mean that I agree with every statement by that person.)

Thank you to all the friends who put a roof over my head and set a place at the table for me, no questions asked, during the years I lived in hiding to complete this book. Thanks to all who nagged me to make backup copies until I did it, to you who fixed my ancient hardware or helped me shop for bargains in newer models, who explained software to me, or cleaned up my word processing messes. Thank you to the legion of volunteers who, over the past dozen years, have listened to or read versions of this manuscript and tried to help me overcome mental blocks against writing on this subject. Gradually, we transformed it from gibberish to sense.

Thank you to all who helped me accomplish the press-ready version of this manuscript. You did editing, layout, printing, binding, the web site, and distribution. Each of you courageously fulfilled a step of getting this book into the hands of the people. You know who you are and you know how humbly grateful I am. Without you this massive project could never have been completed.

I especially thank Nora O., another survivor of criminal hypnosis. She paid the heavy price of a heart attack for editing this book on a subject that always made her heart go too fast.

Thank you also to Corey Smigliani. She carefully read every word of this litany of human sin and tragedy, though it sometimes made her cry. Then she eloquenty communicated the mute pain of victims of abusive hypnosis in the many illustrations of this book.



It is funny and it is a little bit scary. The stage hypnotist at your local high school auditorium has just hypnotized your friend and perhaps some of your neighbors. The hypnotist has made them sweat from imaginary heat, shiver and shake from imaginary cold and put themselves in pretzel-like shapes or suspended from chairs. Before returning to their seats they were told by the hypnotist, “You will remember nothing” about being on stage and, sure enough, they never did remember the events.

This book tells us that unethical hypnosis can destroy lives. Conventional wisdom states that under hypnosis you cannot be made to do something that morally you would not ordinarily do. The well documented case histories compiled in this book remind us that this assumption is false. Once induced into hypnosis, either for nefarious reasons or for “fun,” return to hypnoisis is easier each time. Induction can then be caused by visual or single-word cues. Then, by a simple command, the victim can be made amnesic for the event and will have no memory for what has happened.

If carried to an extreme, a life can be destroyed by this technique. The victim’s only clue as to what has happened is that chunks of time have mysteriously disappeared and unexplained evidence of physical and/or emotional trauma begin to surface. If the victim or the family ever realizes the peculiar things that are happening could be caused by unethical hypnosis, then there can be hope that the hypnotic control can be broken and control of one’s life reestablished. Otherwise, the abuse can continue for a lifetime.

The writer of this book is a mother of seven children and author of a bestselling Encyclopedia of Country Living. She is well known to her wide reading audience and to those sho have met her by means of her television appearances, radio talks, and personal speaking appearances across the United States. Anyone who knows Carla is immediately impressed with her honesty, her credibility, and her intense intellect.

Years ago, her life began to be bizarre. As with many of the victims in these stories, time chunks mysteriously disappeared. She found herself acting in strange ways in certain situations and discovered evidence of unremembered physical abuse. Through sheer determination, diligent research on what was known about hypnotism, and detective work to put the pieces of her life back together, she escaped from the bondage of a modern-day Svengali.

Little has been written about unethical hypnosis—and basically nothing by a victim of unethical hypnosis. The reason is clear: one cannot write about something one cannot remember. The doors open to these memories only with great difficulty and often with great pain. Her purpose for writing the book is to alert the general public to the fact that unethical hypnosis can and does occur, and that it is potentially life-destroying.

INTRODUCTION

For there is nothing hidden which will not be revealed, nor has anything been kept secret but that it should come to light. If anyone has ears to hear, let hem hear.
- Mark 4: 22-23 NKJV

One night in 1989 I dreamed I reached out and grabbed a hair from the tail of a running, disappearing donkey as it melted back into a tangled, dense, dark, convoluted forest. I managed to grab only one hair of the tail before it was gone. As in that dream, again and again, I have captured another single strand of this long, complex, and tragic tale, the history and technology of unethical hypnosis. Working with each single hair, I have struggled to create the form and essence of the original donkey.

It is hard to explain a subject so complicated, unfamiliar, and controversial. I wrote this book out of a fierce desire to restore and defend true facts about mind control technologies. This is the only book, or even article, in this field ever written by a subject. Up to now, only hypnotists, psychologists, psychiatrists, journalists, and historians wrote of these things—with rare quotes from clients, patients, or subjects. There is a big difference between how they view this data and how a subject does.

By quoting from many sources (often rare and difficult-to-find), I have tried to provide in this book an honest print dialogue on the previously stifled topic of mind-control technologies. Here, the good-guy hypnotists are heard warning of potential misuses of hypnosis. The mind-controllers talk to one another in assumed privacy, as in CIA memos. And voices of the mind-controlled cry out—wounded, confused, angry, pleading for help.

Defining Unethical Hypnosis

Old-time research hypnotists called unethical hypnosis "antisocial hypnosis." Since modern hypnotists deny that criminal hypnosis is possible, they do not have any name for it at all. Whatever the name, it causes a hypnotic subject to do something unethical, or to submit to something unethical.

"Isn't all hypnosis unethical?" my friend Jerry, a former hypnotist who "got religion" and swore off, asked as we stood talking about this in a convenience store one night.

"Most people do not understand how their brains work, and what 'trance' is and what 'hypnosis' is—and is not," I replied. "Trance management is used benevolently in many situations. Women have babies by LaMaze. Cancer and AIDS patients fight for their lives by visualizing more active white blood cells. If you go to a hospital emergency room with a migraine headache, you will probably be treated with a relaxation induction followed by visualization deepening and then given suggestions for pain relief."

"Four distinct negative elements come together in the most clearly evil usage of trance—and I call that criminal hypnosis. Those four elements are Deceit, amnesia, chronicity, and abuse. The combination of those four is clearly unethical and ungodly. That definition of criminal hypnosis is sufficiently narrow that it should be acceptable to anyone with an ounce of moral sensitivity and no vested interest in criminal uses of trance. There have also been cases which involved fewer than all four elements, cases which were also obviously unethical, if not criminal. Any unethical trance manipulation fundamentally violates the Golden Rule: the hypnotist makes a subject do things, and live a life that the hypnotist would not choose for himself."

Jerry nodded agreement. Our conversation wandered to other topics.

History of Criminal Hypnosis

Criminal hypnosis cannot be studied in normal experiments, because the experiment would be unethical. Perpetrators do not write books about the crimes they committed. Part I of this book contains four major case histories of criminal hypnosis which have been researched either by psychiatrists or investigative journalists. Each of those case histories is a clear-cut, well-studied, detailed cases of hypnotic abuse-deceitful, amnesic, chronic, and damaging. Scattered throughout the book, many other significant cases involving criminal mind control are also described.

For example, "Z," in Germany of the 1920s, finally figured out what hit him and never quit trying to get the truth out. Mrs. E. suffered in Heidelberg until her husband called the cops and Dr. Mayer extablished the evidence which sent two predatory hypnotists to jail. A "guru" hypnotized his cellmate, Palle Hardwick, in a Danish prison, making him a puppet who would later rob banks and murder because of hypnotic conditioning. Palle's police psychiatrist, Dr. Reiter, solved the case and sent the criminal hypnotist to jail. Candy Jones, a popular model and World War II pinup girl, was trapped into becoming an unknowing guinea pig in CIA experiments on narcohypnosis, personality-splitting, and torture—until her unconscious revolted and began to serve truth and freedom instead.

The case histories in this book also illustrate the development of mind-control technologies over the past two-hundred and fifty years. The personal characteristics of an unethical hypnotist also evolved over those years. Low-class predators looking for easy profit by a super-scam are always around. The free-lance scientific researchers of 19th century Europe, however, have been joined by anonymous secret agency hirelings, or graduate school bad boys directed by covert organization-man MDs and PhDs. All have sought the unholy grail of absolute control in absolute secrecy for personal profit, or for whoever is paying.

Part II of this book provides a partial history of U.S. government research in mind-control technologies. I began to actively research the subject of the abuse of hypnosis and development of modern mind-control technologies a dozen years ago. At that time, I had no idea that the trail of clues which I was following would inexorably lead me to recognition of 1950s and 1960s CIA research into the making of unknowing hypnoprogrammed subjects whose personalities had been artificially split. The book became even more painfully personal when a subject of military brainwashing whom I interviewed warned me, "If they knew what you're trying to do, they wouldn't hesitate to kill you." Nor could I have imagined that my research would culminate in 1996 in a frightening encounter with a NSA agent who was using astonishing modern electronic applications of that ancient-rooted technology.

This book also covers the essential facts about important hypnotic phenomena, induction methods, and legal and therapy aspects of abusive hypnosis—how to identify and help a victim of this black art.

Secrecy and Denial

Several recent journalists writing about government research in the field of unethical hypnosis concluded that the human spirit is just too fine and noble ever to be forced into a role of a helplessly subjugated machine-being doing whatever an operator commands. I wish that was true, but it is not. The technology of criminal hypnosis was developed, does exist, and is tragically effective.

Suppression of the facts about unethical hypnosis has resulted in textbooks and manuals that contain myth as well as truth on the basics of hypnosis—and less and less mention of it at all. Almost all clinical and forensic specialists nowadays heatedly and sincerely deny the possibility of unethical hypnosis. Because texts and teachers all say this particular problem cannot exist perpetrators know their technology well but the good guys do not.

Public ignorance of this evil technology denies its victims sympathetic, knowledgeable help. It facilitates a criminal's collection and abuse of yet more victims. It is difficult for a victim of unethical hypnosis to overcome his artificial amnesia and remember. It is even harder for him when no shred of the remembering makes sense in terms of any familiar or accepted knowledge. Nothing in library, bookstore, or psychology texts will explain his fuzzy, fragmented, mysterious knowings. Friends and relatives find it all too easy to believe that he is imagining things. (Mental illness with delusions of hypnotic control does exist. Unfortunately, criminal hypnosis also exists. Therefore, each individual's situation must be studied on its own merits.) Because of the information blackout, to seek help, saying you are a victim of exploitative trance manipulation, is to challenge a nearly unbroken facade of sincere professional denial with your fragile, personal, unprovable truth.

Information Control Is Mind Control

True understanding of the present requires true records of the past. The disappearance of certain books, of certain information, impacts the collective mind of society the same way hypnotic forget-commands act on individuals. It represses, even extinguishes, information from the historical record. It disrupts the democratic decision-making process.

The essence of mind-control is information control. You are most free when you have the most complete access to information. "Secret, don't tell" is the beginning of enslavement, individual or social. "Classified" information makes and entire society amnesic. A lie in the "news" deceives an entire society. For either an individual or a large democratic society to best function, there must be complete and accurate information.

Repression of information about unethical hypnosis puts predation by the knowing upon the unknowing in an optimal position to grow. Sceptics provide the perfect cover for this nearly perfect crime. It is not a valid argument to say persons can only be forced under hypnosis into immoral behavior "if the subject imagines this to be possible." None of the case histories in this book involved a subject who imagined what was to happen to them could be possible. Playing ostrich encourages abuse of this technology to increase.

The good news is that clear self-knowledge of your vulnerability makes you less vulnerable. R. R. Blake, a 60s U.S. military brainwashing expert, wrote that a mind controller's "success...depends heavily on the ignorance of his victims." (Blake in Biderman & Zimmer, p.9) The purpose of this book is to replace ignorance with knowledge about both old and modern mind-control technologies. If you read this book, or listen to it on tape, you will be far less vulnerable than you were before doing so. Your unconscious (which is where the mind-control predator seeks to attack you) will be defended with a supply accurate information instead of being desarmed by myths. Reading this book will protect you. It will cause your unconscious to ignore subliminal sales pitches. It will reject covert induction attempts.

The BIG Question

Here is the big question:
Is it better to know, or not to know?
Is it better to be silent, or to speak out?

I chose the knowing and the speaking out.
I tried my best to do right.
I accept responsibility for all I have said

God will judge.
May He have mercy on us all.

> The hypnotist can be erotically fascinated by the sight of his inanimate, plastic, unresisting subject. In this, hypnotists share a dream world with undertakers.
> - Robert Marks, p. 119

An Englishman with a French name, George Du Maurier (1834-1896), wrote his last and most famous novel, Trilby, about hypnocontrol. It was the first "best seller."

Du Maurier got the idea for his tale of Svengali's cruel domination of his hapless hypnotic subject from viewing a demonstration of a subject's complete, amnesic dissociation in a hypnotist's office. In the late 19th century, both natural split personalities and artificial personality splitting (by suggested amnesia under hypnosis) were hot new items in psychological research.[1] The young female whose hypnotic submission was demonstrated to Du Maurier was an unknowing, chronic, hypnotic subject, an artificially-split personality.

The novelist watched her be hypnotized, made to obey commands under trance, then awakened. He saw her obedience to posthypnotic commands and her rationalization of them as being freely willed choices. He observed her total unawareness of the previous trance state. He realized the tragic potential for abuse of such a long-term, unknowing, hypnotic subject.

Svengali and Trilby

The novel, Trilby, published in 1894, contained some minor technical errors. Nevertheless, it introduced the basic, sordid facts of hypnotic exploitation to a mass readership.[2] By the vehicle of fiction, it presented important facts about abusive hypnosis. DuMaurier's tale of poor Trilby stimulated a much needed public awareness,

---

[1] Stevenson's tale of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde was another literary representation of this type of research.

[2] Readers now need better technical explanations and plainer speaking on this subject than any novel can provide. They need facts, stated as facts, to combat the flood of lies, claimed to be truth.

and discussion, of unethical hypnosis. What Svengali did to Trilby has never quite been forgotten, despite ceaseless efforts by the hypnosis lobby to discredit the basic facts.

In the novel, Svengali, a middle-aged, unsuccessful musician, captured Trilby by a disguised induction, then hypno-trained her into a split personality (and a brilliant singer). Thereafter, she kept her puppetmaster, Svengali, living in luxury, supported by her concert performances. She always sang in an amnesic trance.[1]

He began Trilby's conditioning by persuading her to agree to a Mesmer-style induction by passes:

> Svengali told her to sit down on the divan, and sat opposite to her, and bade her look him well in the white of the eyes.
>
> "Recartez-moi pien tans le planc tes yeaux."
>
> Then he made little passes and counterpasses

---

[1] In reality, subjects cannot be so totally metamorphosed by hypnotic suggestions from talentless to skilled. It is not possible to make somebody who croaks like a frog into a concert-quality singer by means of hypnosis. Du Maurier wasn't all wrong, however. Any training is enhanced by adding a trance component. Trainers, from sports psychologists to motivational specialists, now use visualization-relaxation inductions to create trance and then give suggestions to their students.

> on her forehead and temples and down her cheek and neck. Soon her eyes closed and her face grew placid. (Du Maurier, p. 69)

In the novel, as with real-life subjects, Trilby did not understand how a seemingly harmless first submission to hypnosis can develop into a terrible longterm mind slavery. Svengali gradually transformed her from a proud, independent person into an obedient hypno-tool. Now she lived a cruel, secret life in addition to the "real" life that she consciously lived.

> Conceited, derisive, and malicious, he alternately bullies and fawns in a harsh, croaking voice...Though Trilby is repelled at first by his greasy, dirty appearance and regards him as a spidery demon or incubus, she becomes completely his creature under his hypnosis....Gecko...[is] a young fiddler, small, swarthy, shabby, brown-eyed, and pock-marked; a nail-biter. Though he loves Trilby he helps Svengali train her...so that Svengali may exploit her. (Magill, Masterplots, p. 1158)

At the story's end, foul Svengali dies. Trilby dies a few hours after. (DuMaurier's presumption that a mind-controlled victim cannot survive without the puppet master is false.) The novel concludes with Gecko, Svengali's assistant, trying to explain to Trilby's grieving former friends what happened to her—and how a hypnotic split personality functions:

> Gecko sat and smoked and pondered for a while, and looked from one to the other. Then he pulled himself together with an effort, so to speak, and said, "Monsieur, she never went mad—not for one moment!...She had forgotten—voila tout!"
> "But hang it all, my friend, one doesn't forget such a..."
> "...I will tell you a secret. There were two Trilbys. There was the Trilby you knew...But all at once—pr-r-r-out! presto! augenblick!...with one wave of his hand over her—with one look of his eye—with a word—Svengali could turn her into the other Trilby, his Trilby, and make her do whatever he liked...you might have run a red-hot needle into her and she would not have felt it...

> "He had but to say 'Dors!' and she suddenly became an unconscious Trilby of marble, who could...think his thoughts and wish his wishes—and love him at his bidding with a strange unreal factitious love...When Svengali's Trilby was singing—or seemed to you as if she were singing—our Trilby was fast asleep...in fact, our Trilby was dead...and then, suddenly, our Trilby woke up and wondered what it was all about..." (Du Maurier, pp. 456-459)

Trilby is now back in print (Everyman, 1994), an old fable that refuses to be forgotten. Svengali, the name that DuMaurier gave to Trilby's evil hypnotist, is the author's best known character. The mere word is resonant with sinister implications. A Svengali is "one who attempts, usually with evil intentions, to persuade or force another to do his bidding." (Webster's Ninth New Collegiate Dictionary)

Exploitation of Female Stage Mediums

The publication of DuMaurier's novel wound up a century of European hypno-abuse of genetically susceptible persons, especially young women. Trilby spotlighted the specific problem of hypnotic exploitation of women (and men) in the theater world.

The use of somnambulist (highly-conditioned) mediums on stage, or in seances serving smaller audiences, was common in that era. The medium tended to be young, female, and attractive. She was a highly susceptible hypnotic subject, of course—and not protected by strong and prosperous family connections.

The use of hypnotized women on stage for entertainment emerged from eighteenth century scientific demonstrations of trance and medical hypnosis. Scientific researchers regarded their subjects as means to an end, as useful objects whom they manipulated like laboratory rats to prove, or disprove, their competing hypotheses. Medical hypnotists who were followers of Charcot viewed their patients being treated by hypnosis as disgusting neurotics. Their mechanistic mind manipulations respected only the knowledge and will of the operator. Unethical hypnotists viewed subjects as possessions destined by inborn genetic susceptibility to be ruled by the power of any master who made the effort to acquire and manipulate them. Most hypnotists scorned their subjects for the very quality they worked hardest to develop in them: mindless obedience.

Du Maurier may also have read the autobiography of Charles Lafontaine before he wrote Trilby. Lafontaine failed as an actor, but then became wealthy as a stage hypnotist. The secret of his success on stage was not his own talent, but that of his female hypnotic subject. Lafontaine

> ...taught her a theatrical role that she then performed beautifully on the stage before a large audience and of which she could remember nothing in her waking state. (Ellenberger, The Discovery of the Unconscious, p. 157)

He might have read Auguste Lassaigne's autobiography. Lassaigne was French, born in 1819. He was just a touring solo juggler the day he watched an 18-year-old girl named Prudence receive treatment from a magnetizer. Observing her somnambulist behavior, he became fascinated with the possibilities of hypnosis. Perhaps, he also suddenly envisioned a more prosperous professional future for himself. He courted and married Prudence. Thereafter, she traveled with Auguste, and his act became a stage show in which he hypnotized her.

Offstage, Auguste used hypnotic suggestions to sexually arouse Prudence, which produced "heavenly voluptuousness." His control, however, was imperfect; an angry Prudence could resist induction! (Ibid.)

In 1894, the same year that Trilby was published, a legal case involving a disreputable psychic healer, Ceslav Lubicz-Czynski, was reported. He had a chronically abused medium:

> He made use above all of a method which nowadays is hardly ever applied and which was called "Psychic Transfer." He hypnotized a female employee who served him as a medium (and at the same time as a lover) and suggested to the patient sitting nearby that his pains and sufferings would be transferred to the medium. (Hammerschlag, p. 35)

In deep trance, the young woman was caused to experience other people's ailments, daily acquiring her mental version of their pains and suffering. How cruel! The sexual exploitation was also objectionable, for Czynski was at that time pursuing a rich aristocratic client, the Baroness Hedwig von Zedlitz, with the hope of marriage to her. He conducted his "courtship" during his hypnotic services to her. That is what caused the legal case (not his psychological and sexual abuse of the medium), for the Baroness said "Yes" under hypnosis—and her relatives reported the matter to the police.

"Voodoo Death" on Stage

In 1894, another hypnotist, Franz Neukomm, also made European news. Ella first was hypnotized by two doctors who were hired by a "relative" to treat her for a "nervous ailment." Their power of suggestion temporarily suppressed the symptoms, but then she got even worse. Neukomm happened to be passing through, and her relative took Ella to be mesmerized by him. He also achieved an effective cure of her problem. Neukomm then saw opportunity knocking. He convinced Ella's relative that the somnambulist girl might again relapse in the absence of his hypnotic influence and therefore should remain in his care. He would look after her without charge. Her relative then abandoned Ella to Neukomm. Thereafter, she traveled with the hypnotist as his medium. Neukomm was "effective," to say the least. One day, he suggested to Ella that a cold needle, which he placed on her hand, was red-hot. Its touch then produced a real burn on her hand (a known somnambulist phenomenon).

During each show, Neukomm invited an ailing volunteer from the audience up on stage. Then he would hypnotize Ella and give her a suggestion to place herself in the mind of the patient and provide information about his or her state of health. The night that Ella died, Neukomm, to increase the audience's sense of drama, had changed his hypnotic instructions in a small, but significant way. He told Ella, "Your soul will leave your body in order to enter that of the patient."

Ella showed an uncharacteristic, strong resistance to that hypnotic suggestion. She tried to deny it.

Imperious master Neukomm deepened her trance,and firmly repeated the "leave your body" command. Once more, she resisted. He further deepened the trance and repeated the command again.

Ella Salamon died. The postmortem stated that heart failure, caused by Neukomm's hypnotic suggestion, was the probable cause of her death. Neukomm was charged with manslaughter and found guilty. (Schrenck-Notzing, 1902) Ella's death was similar to what anthropologists call "voodoo" death, death by suggestion.[1]

Hypnotic Subject Killed on Stage

In another case of that era, a stage hypnotist named Flint was performing in Switzerland, when his program went terribly wrong:

> One of his acts was to lead on to the stage his wife, who was his partner in the show, and bring her to a state of rigidity. He would then place a heavy piece of rock on her stomach and invite volunteers from the audience to come and smash the rock with a hammer. One night a member of the audience misjudged his blow with the hammer and, instead of smashing the rock, he hit the performer's wife and caused internal injuries from which she died shortly afterwards. (Magonet, pp. 19-20)

[1] Numerous cases of death by suggestion are recorded in G. Frazer's classic, The Golden Bough (N.Y.: Macmillan, 1931, p. 204, etc.). More deaths caused by suggestion, "belief," are described in W. B. Cannon's article "'Voodoo' Death" (American Anthropologist XLIV (1942), 169-81. Reprinted, abridged, in Reader in Comparative Religion An Anthropological Approach, W.A. Lessa and E. Z. Vogt (eds.). N.Y.: Harper & Row, 1965.)

Abusive Hypnosis in Literature

When novelists write about unethical hypnosis, they deal with issues of dominance versus submission, the predator's technical expertise versus the subject's ignorance, and betrayal versus trustworthiness. In storyland, however, the mind-controlling villain never enjoys a final victory.

In the late 1800s, the subject of hypnosis dominated in French nonfiction publishing. Some years, every book published in France was about hypnosis. French fiction writers also wrote about it. Alexander Dumas, author of The Three Musketeers, wrote six novels which involved mesmerism, "The Marie Antoinette Series." De Maupassant's last short story, "Le Horla," featured a man who realizes he is a victim of predatory hypnosis. E.T.A. Hoffman was another European writer who was fascinated by hypnosis. His fiction is saturated with every aspect of it. He viewed deep trance as true penetration of the hypnotist's mind into the subject's mind. Hoffman said that hypnotism

> ...can be either good or evil. The evil magnetizer is a kind of moral vampire who destroys his subject...Therefore, the magnetic relationship can be either good (friendly, fatherly), or evil (demoniacal). (quoted in Ellenberger, p. 160)

Thomas Mann's 1931 story, "Mario and the Magician," sees hypnotism as an overthrowing of a person's normal duality and balance of surrender and control tendencies:

> ...the capacity for self-surrender,...for becoming a tool, for the most...utter self-abnegation, was but the reverse side of that other power to will and to command. Commanding and obeying formed together one single principle, one indissoluble unity.

Mann ended that story by letting the hypnotist's insulted subject hit back. Dr. George Estabrooks observed a similar incident in real life. He...

> ...attended a stage exhibition and arrived late. He was horrified to see a respectable acquaintance stripped to his underwear with a broom handle for a flute gamboling around the stage under the delusion that he was a Greek faun. Highly gratified also to see the faun knock the hypnotist flat the moment the trance was removed. (Young, in LeCron, p. 385)

Case History: “Z” Kantor

No controllable force for good ever existed that was not used, at times, for evil, simply because man has a free will.
- Melvin Powers’ Foreword to Hammerschlag’s Hypnotism and Crime, 1957 edition, p. 5)

“Zebediah” Kantor sat in jail, in shock, his life in tatters (his left elbow also in fragments), trying to comprehend why he had “confessed.”[1] A jail guard, killing time on the other side of the bars, was chatting with the depressed former school teacher. The guard was talking about Zebediah’s friend and next-door-neighbor, Adam. He said Adam had told police that he robbed Zebediah’s house and set it on fire because Zebediah had caused him to do so using hypnosis. Zebediah. puzzled., insisted to the guard that he had never hypnotized anybody in his life; He did not know how and never had any interest in learning. The officer left to tend to duties.

Zebediah sat and thought about hypnosis. He remembered that one night the hands of the big old clock in his living room had suddenly, inexplicably leaped forward several hours. He recalled the times he had met with Adam and let him empty his wallet—and afterwards he couldn’t understand why he had allowed it. He remembered other mysterious events. As Zebediah reviewed the past seven years of his life, inserting hypnosis as the missing piece, all those formerly inexplicable incidents made sense. Now

[1] Researchers don’t know “Z” Kantor’s real first name, nor do they know any name for the man who victimized him by hypnosis. They have called Mr. Kantor “Z,” and his hypnotist, “A”—as in “A” hypnotized “Z.” I choose to call them “Zebediah” Kantor and “Adam”—as in Adam hypnotized Zebediah.

Zebediah knew: Adam had victimized him using hypnosis!

Zebediah Kantor

At college, Zebediah had been a conscientious student. He enjoyed sports and was popular with the other students. After graduation, he took a teaching job in the German province of Thuringia. He looked forward to a secure, comfortable, respectable life as their village school teacher. As was the custom, he lived in the school house.

It was the best time of his life. He liked his job; his students liked their teacher; the community respected him. He gave piano lessons on the side and soon fell in love with one of his students, the station master’s young daughter. She cared for him also, and they became engaged. In the meantime, he had inherited a little house and a general-goods store, which provided additional income from house rental and sale of merchandise in the store. He handled his money well and invested spare income in stock.

Being sensible, practical, happy, friendly, and in love, Zebediah seemed to have a good life ahead. He made one big mistake, however, that destroyed his life. The mistake was his friendship with Adam.

Adam Begins the Hypnosis

Adam was Zebediah’s next-door neighbor. Adam was a 38-year-old groundskeeper for an adjacent estate. He had no formal education, no wealth, and no morals. He was “a primitive, vulgar criminal type from a low social level” (Reiter,

Missing Time

Two early European research hypnotists considered the missing time of amnesic hypnotic subjects and said:

> The subject is unable to measure the length of time she has slept, and if she attempts to do so she makes the gravest mistakes...The hypnotic subject has no land-marks by which to measure the void which this sleep produces... (Binet and Fere, Animal Magnetism, p. 365

Years later, an experimental subject in the U.S., like Zebediah, figured out he was missing time. He also reasoned from his discovered circumstances something of what had been done to him during that missing time:

> When I sat down for you to hypnotize me I pulled out my watch and it said 6 o’clock. I started to put it back, and then I took a second look at it and it said 10 o’clock. But before I could figure that out, I noticed that it was dark outside, my coat and tie were off, my sleeves rolled up, and I was just about exhausted, and it really was 10 o’clock...I could lose consciousness like that, and it’s happened lots of times... (In M.H. Erickson, 1938, “A Study of Clinical and Experimental Findings on Hypnotic Deafness: I,” p. 144)

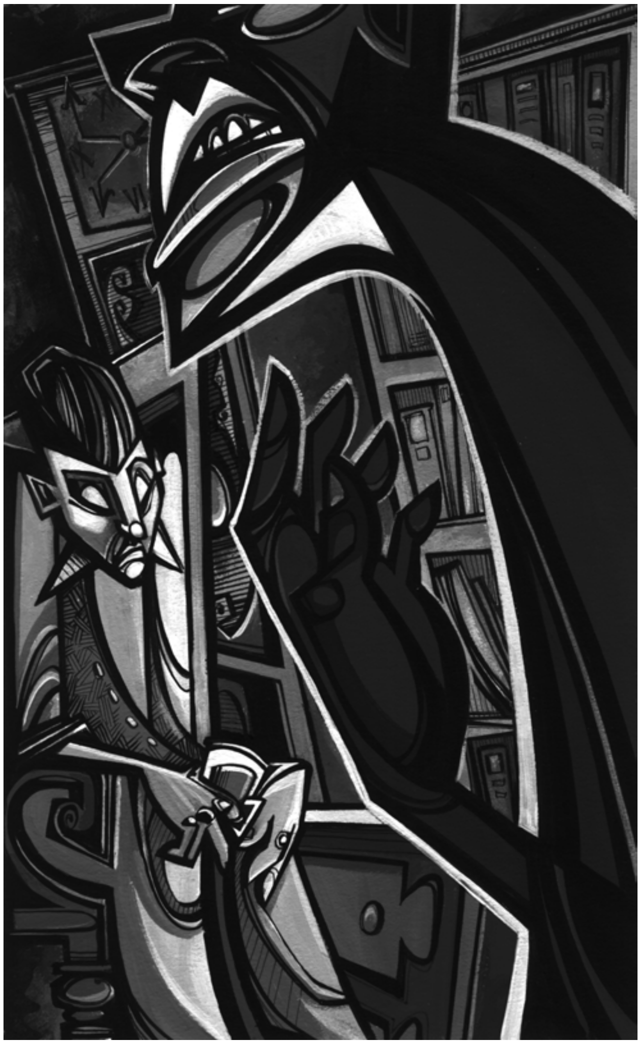
1958, p. 60). He had been in prison several times, and he was on his second marriage.[1] Unknown to Zebediah, one of Adam's areas of criminal expertise was hypnotism.

Adam started out with small acts of seeming kindness. He began to drop by Zebediah's house, on some pretext or other, almost every evening. The bachelor schoolteacher always welcomed him, treated him like a prince, and shared the best he had (wine, cigars, liqueurs). Zebediah lived alone, but he kept his home neat, and he enjoyed company. It helped to pass the time after work in that era before radio, television, and tapes. Zebediah was also a gentleman, and, as such, did his best to enjoy and to respond politely to the older man's conversation.



To Zebediah, Adam seemed only to be a rather long-winded and boring speaker who droned for hours on obscure and confusing subjects. The teacher, weary after his hard day's work, and sated with dinner and wine, tended to fall asleep during his guest's monotonous, meandering monologues.

Adam noted Zebediah's developing habit of falling asleep while he talked. Every time Zebediah fell asleep in his presence, he began to murmur specific suggestions designed to further transform the teacher's normal sleep into an operator-managed hypnotic trance. Adam had combined two methods of disguised induction. One was his typical boring, confusing monologue, a conversational induction, which would literally put Zebediah to sleep. The other technique took advantage of the natural light hypnotic state all people pass through when in transition from waking to sleeping, a sleep induction.

Zebediah happened to have inborn susceptibility to suggestion. His unconscious responded to Adam's persistence and coaxing and it became ever more trained and more vulnerable to further training. Adam suggested that Zebediah would have amnesia for all time under hypnosis. Each time that Adam hypnotized Zebediah, he reinforced the amnesia by repeating that suggestion.

When he tired of giving suggestions, Adam would go home, leaving Zebediah asleep, and/or hypnotized, in his chair. Zebediah would wake up later, alone in the house, with no idea that anything unusual had happened.

After the fourth successful sleep induction, Adam gave Zebediah a posthypnotic suggestion that he would wake up the next time his clock struck the hour. Zebediah did that. He did not remember falling "asleep." He had no awareness of missing time. It seemed to him as if the hands of the clock had simply leaped ahead several hours. He saw that Adam had gone home.

Zebediah now was Adam's unknowing hypnotic subject. He was a trained somnambulist. Adam no longer had to go to the trouble to bore him to sleep. Now Adam could instantly drop Zebediah into an amnesic trance, at any time, simply by presenting a predetermined cue.

Exploitation

Adam's hypnotic exploitation of Zebediah began in 1921. It continued for 12 years, until 1933. When Adam first exploited his secret power over Zebediah, he started with small things. If Zebediah noticed, it probably did not seem very strange to him to be giving, or "lending," money, wine, cigars, and so forth, to his neighbor. Adam never paid Zebediah back. The hypnotist demanded ever harder and crueler amounts of money from his subject. Once Adam got his hook into Zebediah's unconscious, he extracted every possible dollar from him.

[1] It astonished class-conscious Europeans when they later heard that such a common man had made an obedient hypnotic subject out of a gentleman. The European upper classes had eagerly experimented with hypnosis for over a century before this case happened. The upper class had hypnotized whoever was handy: mental patients, medical patients, hysterical young females, peasants on the estate, ignorant people from the village, troops in the brigade. Some entrepreneurs trained talented subjects to be "mediums" for profitable "medical" consultations, or to give parlor somnambulist performances, called "seances," or even public stage shows. After the same scenario of "low class" predator/higher-class victim repeated in the cases of Mrs. E. and Palle, the idea did not seem so preposterous.

Adam also made Zebediah shoot himself using posthypnotic suggestion. The hypnotic instruction was: if Zebediah heard Adam say "Herr Kantor: Machen Sie keine Dummheiten!" ("Mr. Kantor, don't do anything stupid!"), then Zebediah was to rush home, get his gun, and shoot himself in the left hand. Ten days later, Adam actually spoke that cue sentence to Zebediah.

It was a Sunday. Zebediah was happily strolling through the town streets, with his sweetheart on his arm, when he happened to encounter Adam. We all have cues we respond to. In Adam's case, perhaps it was the sight of Zebediah being respectable, successful in his occupation, and happily in love—despite all Adam's predations so far. The sight led to the thought, and the thought is parent of the deed. In a joking tone, Adam called out to Zebediah as they passed, "Herr Kantor: Machen Sie keine Dummheiten!"

When Zebediah heard the cue phrase, his response was automatic. The reflexive level of his mind began to carry out the sequence of tasks as specified (go home immediately, get the gun, and shoot himself in the left hand). Zebediah told his fiancee that he needed to change clothes (a rationalization). He then he rushed home, leaving her standing, bewildered and alone, in the middle of the road.

When he got home, however, Zebediah did not change clothes, because getting home cued the next step in his unconscious instructions. Instead, he searched for his revolver, found it, and took it out of the drawer. Then "the gun went off and he was hit in the left elbow joint." (Reiter, p. 61) The bullet shattered his elbow. From then on, Zebediah's left arm was crippled.[1]

After the incident, Zebediah again rationalized. He said that his hand cramped, and that the cramp had caused him to release the safety and pull the trigger. He believed it was just an accident.

Zebediah's unconscious, however, knew the whole story. It was becoming overburdened with painful experiences repressed by Adam's amnesia suggestions. As a result, Zebediah "became nervous and irritable and carried out his work absentmindedly and automatically." (Reiter, 1958, p. 62) All the teachers had to take—and pass—a standard examination given by school authorities every year in order to keep their job. In the spring of 1925, Zebediah, unable to concentrate, failed the test. He now had no teaching job. He could not do manual work because of his crippled left arm.

The next time Adam visited Zebediah, he suggested that Zebediah sell his home (Zebediah still owned the house and store) and share the money with him. Adam made that suggestion to Zebediah without first hypnotizing him.

Zebediah said "No." He was not consciously aware of his hypnotic victimization by Adam, but he sensed intuitively that there was a problem. He felt controlled by him, and had tried, unsuccessfully, to end their relationship.

Again without hypnotizing Zebediah, Adam next proposed that they should together set fire to his house and collect the insurance money. Despite his financial problems, Zebediah also indignantly rejected this proposal.

Adam then hypnotized Zebediah. He compelled him to draw a house plan to be used as proof to the insurance company of the house's interior design and its valuable contents. Later, Adam set Zebediah's house on fire. Zebediah did not know that Adam had done that. When Zebediah received his insurance payment, Adam used his hypnocontrol to acquire the larger part of the money from Zebediah. He let Zebediah have just enough cash to repair his scorched house.

It is the nature of things that greed is never satisfied. Adam hypnotized Zebediah and caused him to write a household inventory which included non-existant possessions and which greatly over-estimated the values of his real household goods. Then Adam gave Zebediah a posthypnotic suggestion to take a vacation trip.

When Zebediah returned, he discovered that his house had been burglarized and some belongings stolen. He reported the thefts to the police. He gave the false inventory to the insurance company. He had no conscious knowledge that the information was false. He did not know that Adam had committed the thefts. The insurance company paid and Adam ended up with the money.

[1] In a Norwegian case, the hypnotist suggested his subject's arm had no feeling, then instructed him to shoot himself in that arm. The subject did so. The goal was insurance money. (Polgar, The Story of a Hypnotist, 1951)

Adam decided to repeat the scam. He again hypnotized Zebediah, caused him to write an inflated, false inventory of his household possessions., and gave a posthypnotic suggestion for an out-of-town trip. While Zebediah was gone, Adam again broke into his house. Zebediah came back, saw what had happened, and again called the police and the insurance company. The insurance company again paid out a large sum. Again the money ended up in Adam's pocket.

Arrests and Jail

It came to the attention of the police that Adam had much unexplained prosperity—and goods stolen from Zebediah's house in his house. The police accused Adam of the two burglaries of Zebediah's house, arrested him, scheduled a court date, and then turned him loose until the trial. Adam then went to Zebediah's house, hypnotized him, and gave a very complex posthypnotic suggestion.

The cue for enactment would be Adam saying, "Herr Kantor! It's no use any longer—tell them everything!" Upon hearing that cue, Zebediah was to "confess" that he, himself, had thought up all the criminal schemes. He was instructed to declare that he was the guilty one. And he should be the one on trial. Zebediah was to explain that his criminal idea was caused by money problems and that he had persuaded Adam to help him carry out his plans.

Karl du Prel

Karl du Prel was a German hypnosis researcher. In an 1889 book (Das hypnotische Verbrechen und seine Entdeckung), he predicted that the developing technology of hypnosis might create a new and very dangerous type of criminal. He said it, in such a case, it might be very hard to find evidence because of hypnotically-suggested amnesia, suggested false memories, and/or hypnotic manipulation of the testimony of witnesses. He said that suggested amnesia for events under hypnosis would be the biggest problem for criminal investigators. Du Prel also worried about the possibility of sealing suggestions, which would prevent easy rehypnotization of the victim.

Du Prel felt that the growth of hypnotic technology required a parallel increase in knowledgeability on the part of lawyers and jurists. He suggested that police authorities should be prepared to use hypnotism to detect crimes involving hypnotism. He urged that the public be warned that anybody who allows himself to be hypnotized takes a chance. He wanted to prohibit hypnotism, except with clear safeguards.[1]

Adam figured that, after Zebediah confessed to setting up the whole thing, and to tempting and entangling his poor, ignorant neighbor with money to commit the burglary—the law would come down hard on Zebediah and lightly on him.

Mr. Kantor (amnesic, as usual, for the hypnosis), knowing nothing of the self-incriminating posthypnotic suggestions awaiting cue in his unconscious, went to visit his fiancee's parents. They told him of Adam's arrest and court date. Zebediah believed the police were mistaken. He told his hosts that he hoped the real thief would soon be identified and arrested.

While Zebediah was visiting with his in-laws-to-be, Adam returned to the police station. There he announced that he had decided to confess the whole story. He said they were right: he committed the burglary—but only because Herr Kantor had persuaded him to do it. The police then found and arrested Zebediah. They said that his accomplice, Adam, had fully confessed. Zebediah, now with a felony charge against him, was astonished. He indignantly protested to the police that he was innocent.

The police then brought Adam into the room to confront Zebediah, as Adam (having experience with the judicial system) knew they would. Adam then...

...confidently, almost triumphantly, brought out the cue. It caused a lightning change in Zebediah, as if he received a shock. He collapsed completely and confessed, exactly as he had been ordered to do under hypnosis. (Reiter, 1958, p. 62).

Zebediah was held in jail. Adam was allowed to return home. Before he left, Adam thought of a way to make Zebediah look even worse and himself look even better. He told police that Zebediah had been hypnotizing him and had used hypnosis to make him commit the crimes.

After the jail guard passed that information on to Zebediah, he finally recognized what his problem really was. From his jail cell, Zebediah then wrote letter after letter to both the authorities and to his defense attorney. He passionately begged for a careful investigation of his case in the light of his new understanding. He obtained an examination by a medical doctor with some training in hypnosis, hoping that the doctor would offer the court proof of his victimization by Adam, but the doctor refused to get involved.

[1] In "Hypnosis in Criminology" (Brit. J. Med. Hypn., Summer 1950, 1, 17), Alexander Cannon surveyed some European writings on unethical hypnosis and cited Karl du Prel at length.

Trial

Zebediah went bravely to his trial, secure in the knowledge that he was innocent. He now knew what had really happened and he felt that he could explain it. He trusted that the truth would be enough.

But the judge did not believe him. Even his own defense lawyer did not find Zebediah’s version of the facts credible.

> It was unthinkable that a primitive and uncultivated type of person such as Adam would be able to hypnotize an intelligent, educated man such as he and, what is more, turn him into a slave and automaton for his own criminal ends. (Reiter, 1958, p. 63).

Furthermore, even if it were true that Adam had hypnotized Zebediah, everybody in that courtroom believed in the “dogma of moral integrity.” According to that legal concept, it was the subject’s fault if he obeyed a self-injurious or criminal suggestion given by a hypnotisto because only an evil person obeys an evil suggestion. Not all hypnotists believed the dogma of moral integrity, but no disbelievers testified at Zebediah’s trial.

Losing on the dogma issue, Zebediah then pinned his hopes on his legal right to confront the accuser. He demanded a face-to-face confrontation with Adam in court. He was sure that he, now knowing the truth, could force Adam to tell the truth to the court.

He did not realize that conscious awareness of being a hypnotic subject and conscious profound determination to never again be hypnotized are easily overpowered by unconscious hypnotic conditioning. He did not know that a conditioned hypnotic subject—who has realized his situation—tends to respond to the hypnotist’s presence with fear, guilt, and confusion.

> ...though his existence was at stake, as soon as Adam was brought in, he was so influenced by his presence that his manner became uncertain and confused, and when he saw Adam’s mocking look and self-confident bearing he began to stammer. Nobody believed what he said. (Reiter, 1958, p. 63)

Adam whined to the judge during his testimony that he was just “an ordinary fellow.” He said that he had no idea what hypnotism was, but that he had been persuaded, by the cunning and deceit use of it by Zebediah, to assist in those criminal projects. The court rejected Zebediah’s statement and believed Adam’s.

Zebediah did not give up. He proved that the insurance money from both burglaries ended up in Adam’s pocket. The court, however, still refused to believe his statements about hypnosis. At the trial’s end, Zebediah was sentenced to thirteen months in jail. Adam got eight months, and everybody’s sympathy, for being the ignorant, honest man who was deceived and taken advantage of by Zebediah, using hypnosis.

While in jail, Adam pursued a new money-making scheme. He attempted to blackmail Zebediah’s family, threatening to tell police about Zebediah’s house being torched and the old insurance swindle based on that (which had not come up during the previous trial)—unless they paid him hush money.

Confident of their son’s innocence, however, Zebediah’s family refused to pay Adam. Instead, they found a better lawyer to defend Zebediah. His new lawyer took Zebediah’s version of the case history more seriously than the previous one had. He obtained a ruling from the judge that Zebediah and Adam should not again be in the courtroom at the same time. He asked the judge to have both imprisoned men “put under mental observation.”

Showing their prejudices, the police kept Adam in a regular facility, but sent Zebediah to a mental hospital for the evaluation. The hospital’s director had no experience with hypnotism, and he firmly believed that a hypnotic subject could not be made to do anything against his will. The psychiatrist stated that Zebediah was “weakwilled and vacillating, a psychopath and a neurotic who had no understandable motive for his criminal actions.”[1] He interviewed Adam in jail and described him as “purposeful, energetic, and resourceful, a typically brutal and callous blackmailer...” (Reiter, 1958, p. 63)

Dr. Kroener Learns the Truth

The lawyer could not get Zebediah out of jail. After his client served the time and was released, the attorney sent Zebediah to be evaluated by the skilled psychiatrist and experienced hypnotist, Dr. Kroener. In the beginning, the doctor assumed that Zebediah was lying. However, as he worked with Zebediah, session after session, under hypnosis, during two months of 1927, the doctor gradually changed his mind. He concluded that Zebediah’s crimes actually had been caused by Adam’s hypnotic suggestions.

Perhaps Kroener also implanted a suggestion that blocked Adam from ever hypnotizing Zebediah again. For, either by that blocking, or by total avoidance of Adam, Zebediah managed to never be victimized by his neighbor again. The doctor's belief in Zebediah's story must have been a precious comfort in this difficult era of that unfortunate man's life. For, his fiance had rejected him and the school district would not hire anybody with a criminal record, even if he could pass their test.

But Zebediah's lawyer and Dr. Kroener were working on a plan which they hoped would exonerate the school teacher. In 1929, Kroener hypnotized Zebediah again. This time, seven witnesses and a stenographer (who recorded 126 typed pages) were present. One of the witnesses was Professor Arthur Kronfeld, another noted German hypnosis expert. Both Kroener and Kronfeld wrote reports stating their professional opinion, that Zebediah had been victimized by Adam using hypnosis. The lawyer enclosed those reports when he applied to reopen the case.

The court of appeal agreed that new facts had come out, but refused to allow a full-process appeal. They based that verdict entirely on the dogma of moral integrity: if Adam could cause Zebediah, by means of hypnosis, to do immoral things, it proved that Zebediah was an immoral person.

Kroener's Book

Dr. Kroener wrote a book about Zebediah's case, seeking to present the case to the higher court of public opinion. His manuscript would have been the first modern psychiatric study of a victim of unethical hypnosis, and the first recorded memory recovery, by rehypnotization, of a survivor of unethical hypnosis. However, nobody read it because, immediately after its printing, the German government banned it. Whoever put up the substantial money for his publishing venture lost it all.

In 1936, another case of unethical hypnosis went on trial in Germany. That time, two hypnotists went to jail, not their victim. After the trial, Dr. Kroener contacted Dr. Ludwig Mayer, the psychiatrist who had managed to discover the truth and cause the hypnotists to be the losers in court. Dr. Kroener told Dr. Mayer about Zebediah's case. When Mayer wrote a book about his client (published in 1937), he included in it a summary of Zebediah's case history.

Post-War Events

When Germany sank into the dark maelstrom of Naziism. Dr. Kroener, a Jew, emigrated. When he returned, 17 years later in 1952, he searched for Zebediah and his lawyer. He learned that both still lived, and contacted them. Zebediah soon traveled to Berlin (it was the summer school holiday) to, once again, be hypnotized by Dr. Kroener. Zebediah was now age 56. He long since had been working again as a school teacher. His current job was in a large city school in the province of Franconia. His behavior record, since release from jail in 1928, was spotless.

Zebediah had 15 more sessions with Kroener—all tape-recorded, transcribed, and annotated. Although Zebediah's conscious memory of those old happenings was now fuzzy, but under hypnosis he remembered it all clearly. His story, remembered twenty years later, was unchanged.

During the Christmas holiday that year, Kroener visited Zebediah in Franconia. The psychiatrist asked Zebediah's permission to publish the book about him. Zebediah hesitated. He knew that publicity could compromise his job, yet he deeply yearned for the truth to be known and his innocence to be, at last, firmly established. He said, "Yes." A few days later, somebody circulated printed matter referring to the old charges against Zebediah. The old teacher immediately was fired from his job.

Then Dr. Kroener heard of another successful prosecution (in the Danish court system) of a hypnotist who had given a subject criminal suggestions. The court psychiatrist was an old friend of his, Dr. Reiter . Reiter told Kroener that he was working on a book about his case. It would be published in the United States as well as Europe. Aging and unwell, Dr. Kroener delivered his manuscript, tape recordings, and notes on Zebediah's case to Reiter.

Dr. Reiter added Zebediah's case to his book about Palle Hardwick. The detailed synopses of Zebediah's case history made by Dr. Mayer and Dr. Reiter provide the only remaining public record of Zebediah's sufferings and the struggle of good Dr. Kroener to make public the truth about his case.

Case History: Mrs. E.

> [There are]...five cases in which rape took place in hypnotic sleep and under the influence of suggestion [and]... *a theft on the large scale which was effected solely by the instrumentality of suggestion. A person who gave himself out as a doctor and hypnotised an ailing woman was able to suggest her handing over to him a fairly large sum of money on which he was able to keep his clutches.
> - Janet, Psychological Healing, p. 312

In the past, writers have always called her "Mrs. E." I call her "Anna Evan." (It isn't her real name; her real name is unknown.) When this all began, in the 1920s in Germany, Anna was not yet married to Mr. Evan. She had only just met that nice young man. Mr. Evan had a steady job as a minor government official, and had begun to court her. The criminal hypnotist's name was Franz Walter,[1] but she knew him as "Walter Bergen" and other aliases.

Later, under rehypnotization by a police psychiatrist, Dr. Mayer, Anna relived her years of hypnotic victimization. One day, she tried to explain to Dr. Mayer how life as a conditioned, chronic hypnotic subject had felt:

> "I'm no longer the same person as before. Something different controls me. I don't want to do something, but I do it. Or I want to do something, and yet I don't do it...in the end I thought of nothing more than doing what Walter wanted. If I obeyed I always felt more at ease. Within me I was never free—there was always something oppressing me....I can't struggle against these pressures...the pressure vanishes when I obey the commands of the inner voice." (Mrs. E., quoted in Hammerschlag, Hypnotism and Crime, pp. 120-121)

When it was all over, she had been the unknowing hypnotic subject of Bergen for seven years, the wife of Mr. Evan for four. During those seven years, Bergen extorted thousands of dollars from her, used her sexually, sold her services as a prostitute, compelled her to attempt murder on her husband six times, and caused her to attempt suicide several times.

1. The two German cases of Zebediah and Mrs. E. overlap in time. It is quite possible "A" and Bergen knew each other.

The Day It Began

Anna Evan, a naive farmer's daughter, age 17, was riding a train to the city on the day it all began. She intended to find a doctor there who would help her with a minor stomach problem. She traveled alone. Perhaps it was her first solo trip, granted because she was a sensible girl with good values. It can be assumed that she felt rather proud and adult to be traveling alone to find a doctor and get treatment.

Anna found an empty train compartment, entered, shut the door behind her, and seated herself on one of its pair of facing seats. Shortly after, a man opened the door and seated himself opposite her without so much as a "Do you mind?" He introduced himself, "Bergen." She nodded and turned away.

Nothing that I have read about her tells how she looked, so I must imagine that. I think she was almost beautiful, but her nose was a little too broad for perfect features. I think she had sky-blue eyes and thick brown hair, worn long and loose under her demure traveling hat.

Anna wanted to watch the lovely German countryside roll by outside the window, but Bergen pursued her with questions in a lively and friendly manner. She was reluctant to talk to a strange man, but felt obliged by her polite upbringing to answer all his direct questions.

Where are you going?" he asked. She told him. "What is your purpose?" he asked. She explained her intent to find a doctor and be treated for her stomach ailment. It might be assumed that she felt rather proud, and adult, to be traveling alone to seek a doctor and receive treatment.

"How fortunate we have met," the man said. "I noticed, the moment I came into your compartment, that you are ill. For, you see, I am a nature healer, a homeopath, Dr. Walter Bergen. My office is in Karlsruhe-Daxlanden. And yours is just the kind of illness that I can treat very well."

When the train stopped to take on coal and water at Graben, Dr. Bergen invited Anna to join him in the station for a cup of coffee. She demurred, for he frightened her somewhat. He insisted, however, jovially picking up her traveling bag and carrying it out the compartment door. She stood up and followed her suitcase.

He picked a table for them in the railway station restaurant and ordered coffee for Anna. He made small talk while they waited for the beverage. The waiter brought Anna's cup of coffee and walked away. Dr. Bergen suddenly seized her hand and stared into her eyes. He was channeling so much mental command through that gaze that, after a moment, Anna felt as if she no longer had a will of her own. She felt so strange and giddy.[1]

Bergen's shocking hand-grab, plus stare, technique may never before have elicited such a quick and profound induction response as Anna's. He probably was secretly delighted and amazed at his success. Actually, he had merely lucked onto a genetic somnambulist, 10 to 25% of the population.

Bergen had accomplished a first induction. He probably now considered the delicious long-term possibilities of controlling this young woman through trance and did not let this opportunity escape. It can be assumed that he next pushed her deeper into trance, deep as he could. Then he suggested posthypnotic amnesia, and a posthypnotic re-induction cue: "Whenever I say 'Loxitov,' you will immediately return to this deep trance state, and you will never remember what happens in this state." Perhaps he brought her back to a waking state, then re-inducted using his cue—several times. That training would have strengthened her conditioning, for each re-induction usually causes a subject to go deeper.

He gave further posthypnotic instructions, telling her to obey either verbal or written orders from him. He would use this means to cause her to come back to future meetings with him. He also gave hypnotic suggestions that her stomach would no longer trouble her. He collected the money that she had brought to pay a doctor.

Bergen was not a real doctor. "Bergen" was not his real name. He was a genuine con artist. He could have been reading books on hypnosis for years. Europe of that era had hypnosis texts aplenty. A scholar named Max Dessoir had published a Bibliography of Modern Hypnotism listing the numerous books on hypnosis that were published after Mesmer first focused public attention on this subject. Many books were in French, but some were in German. In 1888, Dessoir listed 801 titles. By 1890, there were 1183. Many authors discussed the possibility of abuse of hypnotic subjects, even crime caused by suggestions under hypnosis.[1]

Over the next seven years, Bergen often instructed his unknowing hypnotic subject to meet him at the train station of Karlsruhe, or Heidelberg. He would then hypnotize her, lead her where he chose, do with her as he wanted. He gave Anna suggestions to act in a way that would appear normal to other persons (waking hypnosis), although she was hypnotized and amnesic during those visits.

Suggested Sickness, Suggested Healing

The "doctor" angle was very profitable for Bergen. (It is possible to cause paralysis, muscle cramps, and every sort of pain by hypnotic suggestion.[2] Over and over, he gave Anna psychosomatic ailments. Some of them were very painful. If paid what he demanded, he then cured her by releasing the previous hypnotic suggestion that had made her "sick." One time, he instructed her, "All the fingers of your left hand, except the little finger, will become stiff. You cannot move them any more." (Hammerschlag, p. 107)

Bergen's suggestion was cloaked by amnesia from Anna's conscious mind. So, after he was done with her, Anna did not know why she could not unclench her left hand, except for its little finger. No matter how much effort she exerted, it remained shut tight. That painful, inconvenient condition continued for months—until her family gave her the money to pay Bergen's past bill and hire him to renew her "treatment."

When she, at last, was able to pay, Bergen pretended to massage her hand until she could open it. (And he counteracted his previous suggestion that had caused the clenching.) Once her hand could open again, she saw that the growing fingernails had bruised and inflamed her palm. Bergen then splinted and bandaged her hand. After removing the splint, her hand still felt so tired that she could hardly use it.

Mr. Evan remembered that incident too. He told Dr. Mayer, "For...about 8 to 10 weeks, my wife's hand had a cramp. It was impossible to bend her fingers. Another time, for 14 days, her hand was so firmly locked that the inner side was all bruised as a result." (Mayer, p. 182) Anna learned to bring Dr. Bergen every dollar she could get. If she did not bring money, he would subject her, by posthypnotic suggestion, to dreadful new pains.

In trance, by Dr. Ludwig Mayer, Anna later exclaimed, "Now I know where all those pains came from!...Sometimes I didn't bring money—because I couldn't get any from my parents or my husband. Then Walter would say, "You will get so ill that they will prefer to pay!" After that, I got the most awful pains, which only vanished when he took them away by magnetic stroking of me.” (Mayer, p. 131)

[1] Moll's 1889 German classic, Hypnotism, lists ways hypnosis might be used unethically. The list includes: assault on the hypnotized person, especially seduction; posthypnotic suggestion to create a physical problem such as paralysis; causing suicide attempts by posthypnotic suggestion; acquiring property illegally by posthypnotic suggestion to sign a will or other legal paper; causing false testimony in court by suggested hallucinations or suggested falsification of memory; causing subject by hypnotic or posthypnotic suggestion to harm someone else; causing subject to harm himself. That covers most of what Bergen did to Mrs. E.—and what Adam did to Zebediah.

[2] Of the possibility of causing physical problems by hypnotic suggestion, a hypnotist wrote:

> It is practicable to suggest any sort of hallucination of vision such as color perception, form or object perception, mist sight, double sight, or even absolute blindness...Complete deafness can be suggested, in which case it is necessary to take measures for an adequate signal to remove it, and one may then fire a pistol immediately behind the subject without his reacting. (Reiter, "The Influence of Hypnosis on Somatic Fields of Function," in LeCron (ed), Experimental Hypnosis, p. 243)

Bergen also used Anna sexually—free for himself, and in paid service to other men. He also shared his mental access to her with friends. If one of them spoke Bergen’s posthypnotically designated cue word to her, rapport temporarily shifted from Bergen to whoever had spoken that word. Bergen’s friend then could use all the powers over her that Bergen had developed. One of Bergen’s friends began frequently to participate in her hypnotic exploitation.

Murder Suggestions

It took a long time, but Mr. Evan finally began to voice suspicion of Anna’s “doctor.” The husband had acquired private evidence that her “treatment” included sexual encounters, of which his wife seemed completely unaware. When Walter Bergen realized that Mr. Evan was changing from a convenient supplier of cash to pay Anna’s doctor bills into an active threat, the “healer” began to give Anna hypnotic suggestions to murder her husband.

How Intense Can Hallucinated Pain Be?

Raymond Wells did an experiment on creating imaginary pain in a hypnotic subject. He pressed a fifty-cent piece onto a deeply entranced subject’s bare arm. Wells told his subject that the place where he was pressing the metal coin was going to feel first warm, then hot—hot as if the coin he was pressing there was a branding iron. He said the sensation of extreme heat in that place would then remain steady for the next 24 hours.

Wells then brought the student out of hypnosis. He told him to write down his experiences during the next 24 hours, and to report to him the next day. The subject wrote:

> 2:26—Red, slightly swollen center. (He was apparently having a visual hallucination or illusion of redness and swelling on his arm—Wells)...Center of circle so hot it will not bear touching. Cannot raise left arm above head without increased pain. Pain interferes with holding card to write...Blister more distinct now—at 2.35...Pain severe. Hot. Writhing. So hot, consciousness almost blank. Will not stand this longer than this evening. Can do nothing but try to relieve pain. Hot, sizzling...2.40—Am crying with pain. Can write no more. (Wells, “The Hypnotic Treatment of the Major Symptoms of Hysteria,” J. Psychol., 17:269, 1944.)

At that point, the suffering hypnotic subject stopped writing and started looking for the Professor. When he found him, Wells rehypnotized the student and removed the pain-causing mental instructions. The pain stopped immediately and completely. Wells later wrote:

> I am convinced that he would not have suffered more if there had been an actual hot iron pressed against his forearm all the time. (Ibid.)

Bergen tried six times; he failed six times. The failures were partly blind luck, or the grace of God, but also due partly to Anna’s unconscious resistance to this most heinous suggestion. She described all six murder attempts later, under Dr. Mayer’s rehypnotizations, in the presence of her astonished husband.

First, Bergen told her (under hypnosis as always), that she would go to a drug store and buy a poisonous chemical used for furniture cleaning. She would then add that poison to Mr. Evan’s food. When she got home, however, Anna was gripped by such a mysterious, extreme excitement that her concerned husband would not allow her to leave the house to go shopping. Since Bergen’s hypnotic instructions had been specifically cued for enactment that particular evening, putting them off until the next day disempowered the urge.

Bergen’s second murder scenario was a shooting. He instructed the hypnotized woman, “When you get home, you will take the Browning out of the desk and hide it in a more convenient place. When your husband is sleeping, get the gun, draw the safety catch, and pull the upper barrel back. Hold the pistol at his temple and press the trigger. Then place the weapon in his hand, so that it will seem that he had committed suicide.”

Bergen’s hypnotic command sequence had omitted an important detail. Anna did take the gun out of the desk. She did hide it in a handy place. While her husband slept, she did get the gun. She released the safety catch as instructed, and she pulled the upper barrel back. She held the pistol to husband’s temple and then pressed the trigger. But the gun was not loaded, so her husband was unharmed!

The next time Mrs. Evan was compelled to meet Bergen, she told him her husband was very upset and was seriously considering going to the police. Walter then came up with a third plan: “Give him mushrooms,” he ordered. “Cook harmless ones for yourself in one pan. Cook poisonous ones for him in a different pan—the type with a red skin.”

Consciously ignorant of the murder plan, Anna cooked the two kinds of mushrooms. She served herself the nonpoisonous ones. She gave her husband the poisonous ones. He swallowed two spoonfuls, then left the rest on his plate because of their disgusting taste. Two hours later, the poison took effect: stomach pains, diarrhea, and vomiting. Anna had no idea what why her husband was sick. She gave him some mint tea. After a while, he felt better.

The next murder “failure”definitely was caused by Anna’s unconscious fighting of Bergen commands. The hypnotist had given her a packet of white powder and instructions to slip the powder into her husband’s coffee. He warned her that the powder would cause a little bubbling in the coffee, and that she should take precautions so Mr. Evan would not notice the effervescing. As she was traveling home, Anna took the powder out to look at it. Then she “accidentally” spilled most of it. That evening, obeying the posthypnotic compulsion, she put the remainder in his coffee. Even that little caused him severe stomach pain. He went to the doctor for treatment.

When Mayer hypnotized Anna, Mr. Evan was present every session. He was so astonished, during her hypnotic regressions and recall of these murder attempts, that he could hardly stay calm. He confirmed the history of each incident (at last fully explained) for Dr. Mayer. He had, indeed, been sick after the two teaspoons of mushrooms, and after that cup of coffee.

Bergen tried again, switching to a different, even more deadly, method of hypnotic manipulation. He changed from direct murder instructions to an indirect, deceitful presentation of those instructions. He now gave Anna instructions under hypnosis which he claimed would keep her husband safe.

Mr. Evan rode a motorcycle. It had a hand brake and a foot brake. Under deep hypnosis, Bergen told Anna to cut the hand brake’s cable because that would force Mr. Evan to use the foot brake which was “less dangerous.” He then instructed her to “turn the screw of the foot brake several times to the left.” He explained that turning the screw in that direction would tighten it, and thus keep her husband safer. Anna objected. She knew how the mechanism worked.

Walter said, “Your analytical powers are disappearing. You must do exactly as I say!” Then, he repeated the full set of commands again, plus his reassurances that obedience would protect her husband.

Anna carried out the two acts.

Mr. Evan sat, amazed, listening to his hypnotized wife tell all this to Dr. Mayer. Now he understood the why and how of those strange brake failures on his motorcycle! He told Mayer what had happened next. “I was driving after dark, with a friend on my motorcycle. Just before coming to the railroad, which had its barricade down, the headlights of an approaching car blinded me. I didn’t realize how close I was to the barricade. When the oncoming car dimmed its lights, and I could see again, I was only 20 meters from the barricade! I jammed my foot down on the brake. It didn’t hold. It tore through. I pulled the hand brake. It didn’t hold either. I tried to get into first gear, but accidentally went into neutral instead. I hit the barricade, and crashed. Both my friend and I were hurt.”

Though his plan had failed again, Bergen was encouraged by having come so close to succeeding. After Mr. Evan was well enough to ride again, and his motorcycle was back from the mechanic’s shop, the hypnotist gave Mrs. Evan the same set of instructions, again.

Mr. Evan had another motorcycle accident. Both brakes tore through again. He was perplexed because both brakes had just been repaired. When his motorcycle crashed this time, he was riding alone. His arm and knee were injured, but he lived.

Suicide Suggestions

Frustrated by all those unsuccessful murder suggestions, frightened by Mr. E’s reported thoughts of going to the police, Bergen now began giving suicide commands to Anna. First, he told her to obtain a prescription from her doctor for sleeping pills and to swallow the whole bottleful the first night she possessed them. She asked her doctor for sleeping pills. However, he refused to give the visibly upset woman a prescription.

At their next meeting, she told Bergen she had not acquired the tablets. He then “made me feel dreadfully upset. He said I would die in terrible torment, that my whole blood was becoming pus. He said it would be better if I would kill myself rather than suffer through that death. He advised me to jump off the train when it was moving, but only when I was alone. He said such a death would be painless. I was convinced and firmly decided to carry this out on the way home, because I believed myself to be terminally ill. But, on the train, I got into conversation with an elderly lady to whom I confided my misery. She comforted me and drove away the thoughts of self-destruction." (quoted in Mayer, 1937, p. 106)

Anna had chosen to converse with the old lady. Almost anybody you discuss suicide with will attempt to comfort you and drive away those thoughts. Anna's unconscious let them be driven away. Another suicide set-up by Bergen was evaded.

The hypnotist did not give up. On Anna's next visit, he suggested that her husband loved another woman and wished to divorce her—or somehow get rid of her. In fact, Bergen said over and over to Anna in his hypnotic urgings, her husband was secretly trying to kill her because he was in love with that other woman. (In fact, Mr. Evan had not considered leaving her, nor did he have an affair.) Because of her husband's (imaginary) betrayals, Bergen said that she would drown herself in the Rhine river.

On the way home, Anna did feel utter despair. She made plans to drown herself in the nearby Rhine River. Her unconscious saved her, this time, by finding a way to alert the housekeeper to Anna's state of mind, and by picking a time to carry out the command when the housekeeper and several other persons were around. The housekeeper observed Anna's depression, followed her, and restrained her from drowning herself.

Anna obviously had a problem. Up to this time, however, only her unconscious and Bergen knew the real source of the terrible pressures on her. Mr. Evan demanded, again and again, that she tell him what was wrong. Anna could not tell. She did not know what the problem was. She did not know that Bergen reinforced his amnesia commands with threats to destroy her, if she betrayed him by revealing anything to her husband. If she had consciously known what was going on, she would have reacted immediately and correctly. But her conflict was all unconscious, hidden from conscious understanding, prevented from resolution by the amnesia.

Mr. Evan was married to Anna during the last four years of her hypnotic abuse. At first, he had no idea unethical hypnosis was involved in her situation. Fortunately, he never doubted her sanity. He gradually realized her true situation.

Mr. Evan Goes to the Police

Mr. Evan tried, but he could not track down Bergen on his own. Because of amnesia, Anna did not consciously know when she was scheduled to see Bergen, what his real name was, where she met him, or where he lived.

Walter Bergen was right to fear Mr. Evan, for he finally went to the Heidelberg Criminal Police office for help in solving the tragic mystery in his wife's life. He went in 1934, toward summer's end. He reported that his wife had been duped out of nearly 3,000 marks. He said the perpetrator was a man who had told Anna that he was a doctor and who had given her hypnotic treatments for various health problems. He said the doctor used several names, all false. Neither he nor Anna knew the hypnotist's real name. Every effort he had made to discover the true name and address of the hypnotist had failed. He told them that he also suspected that the hypnotist had sex with his wife while she was hypnotized, with neither her knowledge nor consent.

After hearing what Mr. Evan had to say, the police called in a psychiatrist, Dr. Ludwig Mayer, the most respected medical hypnotist in all Europe. Dr. Mayer did not believe that unethical hypnosis was possible. In his previous writings, he had always promoted the "dogma of moral integrity," that it is impossible to completely annihilate a subject's will by hypnosis.

When Dr. Mayer examined Anna, he found no sign of any underlying illness, mental or physical. Mr. Evan assured the doctor that his wife did not have sickly relatives, was not sickly in her childhood, and had never had mental problems. A series of other psychiatrists and neurologists—at the Clinic for Women, the University of Heidelberg's Nerve Clinic, and the University of Freiberg's Psychiatric Clinic—also examined Anna. All agreed she was not mentally ill.

On all topics, except events having to do with Bergen, her memory was normal. Her only mental abnormality was that she could remember nothing having to do with the hypnotist. She had "forgotten everything." She was, however, able to tell Dr. Mayer the induction cue which Bergen used on her! Bergen would put his hand on her forehead. She would feel dizzy for a moment, and "tired," and then came the amnesic abyss.

Mayer Cracks the Case

Dr. Mayer asked Anna's permission to hypnotize her. She gave it. The psychiatrist then used Bergen's induction cue: the hand on Anna's forehead. If a hypnotist who is attempting a rehypnotization uses the same induction or deepening routine as the former hypnotist (deliberately or accidentally), progress will be substantial. The first time Mayer put his hand on her forehead, Anna went into trance, but it was only a light state. (Perhaps Bergen had given her sealing and depth-limiting suggestions.)

However, Mayer kept repeating Bergen's induction cue. Gradually, Anna's trance deepened. After several sessions of just repeating Bergen's induction cue, Mayer had this natural somnambulist deep enough for hypnotic regressions. But she still couldn't remember.

Bergen had threatened her unconscious with the worst he could think of if she broke his amnesia rule. If she remembered forbidden information and betrayed his secret, he had warned that she would fall dead, her father would die, and she would endure everlasting damnation in this life—and hell in the next. Dr. Mayer found it slow, tough going to fight those fear-based unconscious amnesia commands and recover Anna's memories. Bit by bit, however, the memories did emerge.

Mayer's first priority was to identify the predatory hypnotist. He suggested that Anna would hallucinate the hypnotist's face. She did! Bergen's rules, which had made her unable to "remember" his face, did not cover a request to "hallucinate" it! She described that hallucinated face to Dr. Mayer.

The psychiatrist carefully recorded her description, then turned it over to police experts. They noticed that Anna's description matched the face of a man called Franz

Walter who had just been arrested in a nearby town for pretending to be a doctor! They put Walter in a lineup and brought Anna in. She identified him as the man she had met on the train, the man who had siezed her hand and stared into her eyes.

Walter, of course, denied everything. They locked him up anyway.

Dr. Mayer continued searching Anna's memory. One day, she visualized for him a letter from Bergen containing instructions to come and meet him. At Mayer's suggestion, she "saw" the exact words of the letter as a positive hallucination superimposed over the blank whiteness of a piece of real paper he had handed her. Anna held the blank page up before her, peered at it, and "read":

> I order you herewith to be in the station at Heidelberg on the 18th of this month where I shall expect you at the exit at 4 o'clock. Dr. Bergen. (Destroy this note.) (Hammerschlag, p. 106)

Another day, she relived him taking her through the streets to an unknown place. She had walked with her eyes open, but unable to see anything because of his suggestions that she was blind. He took her to a room, continuing to make those suggestions that she was "blind." He told her to lie down. He said, "You are receiving treatment! Sleep quietly! You know nothing of what has happened here, and you will not know later either!"

At this point, Mayer's hypnotic subject began to shake her head in a physical gesture of "No, no" as she relived this event. She made pushing-away movements with her hands. She began to cry softly. After she awoke from the trance, Anna explained to the doctor, "...now I know!...Through the hypnosis I suddenly know." She sobbed on and on. For a long time, she could not stop crying.

Word Associations

Dr. Mayer made good use of the memory-recovery technique of association, following the verbal, or imagery, linkages in Anna's unconscious memory. The result often was the uncovering of some new fact about the criminal hypnoses that Anna had not consciously remembered.

Mayer chose the cue words from what Anna already had remembered. Fox example, after Anna recalled being with Bergen in a swimming pool, Mayer asked her to think of "swimming pool" and then describe the next image that came into her mind. Anna said, "I clearly remember a white Turkish towel. It has light blue stripes at the top and bottom. I also saw a towel with lilac stripes at Walter's." The police searched Bergen's room. They found both towels.

Dr. Mayer also obtained cue words by hypnotizing Anna, then telling her to say every word or thought which came into her mind—not regarding whether it made sense to her or not. Her unconscious grabbed this opportunity to provide evidence on Bergen, without breaking his not-know, not-remember rules. It produced a string of incriminating clues: "Shoe—Schuhmacher—5 Mark;. Auto—6071; Combarus," and so on. When Anna looked at the list of the words which she had said, after waking up from hypnosis, none of those words and phrases made any sense to her. Under later hypnosis, however, when Dr. Mayer asked her about those cue words, one by one, Anna was able to associate to them.

When Dr. Mayer said "Shoe—Schuhmacher—5 Mark," Anna associated: "Walter bought the yellow shoes in Speyer at the shoe shop. He left his old shoes there and besides that paid another 5 Marks." Police checked it out and confirmed the accuracy of her memory. To "Auto—6071," she associated Bergen once coming to get her in a car with that license number. Police established that Bergen had once borrowed a car with that number.

The day that Dr. Mayer said "Combarus" to her, and then asked what she remembered, was a bad one for Anna. She had instantly plunged into the midst of an intense experience of hypnotic reliving:

She is sitting with Bergen in a hotel lobby. Another man walks up to them. He is a bank branch manager named "Mr. B." Bergen talks to Mr. B. and tells him that Anna will satisfy him. Mr. B. hands Walter twenty Marks (which Walter pockets). Mr. B. leaves. Bergen keeps Anna sitting there a while.

They are alone now. He puts his hand on her forehead. It is his usual cue, used both for induction and deepening of a trance. He presses and says, "Now, with no will of your own, you will do anything the man asks you to do. You will remember nothing of what happens. You will think of the word Combarus, and then go into such a deep trance that you can no longer remember what happens to you or where you have been."

A female servant with strange, brightly-colored hair comes and leads Anna away from pimp Bergen, saying that she must go to Mr. B.

After awakening from that chain of memories, an agonized Anna discovered that she could now remember more. She told Mayer, "Walter did this often. Every time he said the word 'Combarus,' I lost my will power. Until today I knew nothing at all about this. You must think I'm a terrible person. But I'm not a slut and not a bad person. Right now I just want to go straight into the river and drown myself. I'm so ashamed."

Mayer learned that Bergen often used cue words such as “Combarus” as a first step in activating a complex sequence of posthypnotic suggestions in Anna’s unconscious. Bergen would tell the hypnotized woman that, under certain circumstances, she would think of the cue word. She was further instructed that thinking of the cue would then cause her to carry out some further command, or commands.

Bergen’s Assistant

After six months of daily sessions, questioning Anna under deep hypnosis, Mayer discovered that more than one hypnotist was involved in her abuse. Hovever that information didn’t come out under hypnosis. In January of 1935, Mrs. Evan mentioned to him in a normal conversation that she had encountered one of the “criminal police.” Anna said the policeman had insisted that she give him extensive information about her case. She had done that.

The incident sounded improbable to Dr. Mayer, so he double-checked. He learned that, whoever he was, Anna’s questioner was not a legitimate policeman. Logic suggested it was Bergen, but her description did not fit Bergen. Dr. Mayer then questioned Anna, under hypnosis, about the mysterious event. She identified the imposter as one of Bergen’s friends, Alfred. She remembered that Bergen had told her under hypnosis to “comply unconditionally, and without any will of your own, with Alfred’s wishes, if you hear Alfred say ‘Filofi.’”[1]

Mayer’s Book

In his post-verdict German-language book about Mrs. E.’s case, Mayer detailed twenty-one previous European court cases which dealt with crimes caused by posthypnotic suggestion (including Zebediah’s case). He warned the public of the risks of being hypnotized:

...a person in somnambulic hypnosis is not able to take up a critical attitude on his own behalf...subordination to the hypnotizer, and dulling of his consciousness takes place, regardless of whether he is the subject of a legitimate experiment or is being hypnotized for other purposes...Just as suggestions can be employed therapeutically...they can equally well be used for criminal purposes. (Mayer, 1937, p. 53)

His book was enthusiastically reviewed in the German press. It was much discussed by criminologists all over Europe, and became a best seller in the European nonfiction market. It was never translated into English, but an English researcher who read it in German called it “without doubt the most authentic and carefully documented example of the use of hypnosis for criminal purposes...” (Edmunds, p. 145)

Dr. Mayer learned that, after Mr. Evan began talking to his wife about going to the police, Walter and Alfred had planned ahead for that possibility. Their plan was for Alfred to manage a private encounter with Mrs. Evan, drop her into trance with the cue word, “Filofi,” and then give her instructions. She would, as usual, have complete amnesia for both the encounter and the suggestions. By this means, Walter and Alfred intended to cause great confusion and difficulties for the prosecution during its questioning of her.

The Trial

It required nineteen months of daily hypnosis sessions, each hours long, for Mayer to recover the complete details of all Bergen had done to her from Anna’s unconscious. The police had obtained physical evidence which corroborated her recovered memories. There would be a trial.

Before the trial, Dr. Mayer demonstrated to court personnel how it was possible for Bergen to share with Alfred his hypnotic control of Anna. Dr. Mayer hypnotized her. She went into deep trance. Mayer did not give a suggestion that she would obey only his voice. Mayer’s assistant then said to the hypnotized woman, “You will immediately become hypnotized if I say ‘ten’.” Mayer brought Anna out of hypnosis. His assistant began to count aloud the pages of a manuscript which he held. When he said the number “ten,” Anna’s eyes closed. She was again in a deep trance.

The case went to trial in June, 1936. Like Adam at Zebediah’s earlier trial, and like Nielsen at Palle Hardwick’s later trial, Walter Bergen insisted that he was innocent, totally ignorant about hypnosis, and had never hypnotized the alleged victim. Like Adam and Nielsen, Bergen secretly tried to manipulate his subject’s court testimony using hypnosis. Unlike those cases, however, he failed. One reason he failed was because Dr. Mayer stayed with the case and continued hypnotizing Mrs. Evan.

In trance, she remembered another of Bergen’s cue words: “Leichtbino.” Bergen had said, “If you start to reveal anything in court that could harm me, the word ‘Leichtbino’ will come to mind. Then you will feel sick and will not say anything against me. You will only speak in my favor.”

The trial lasted three weeks. Bergen was sentenced to ten years in prison for larceny and for practicing medicine without a license. Alfred was sentenced to four years.

Mayer and the German police did everything right in this case. They even kept Mrs. E’s true identity private. I hope that she and Mr. E were able to live out the rest of their lives in peace and security. However, in 1937. Nazis controlled Germany and World War II was beginning.

> ...the faith-curer of the grotto has this advantage over the endormeur of the platform or the hospital. He does not intrude his own personality and train his patient to subject his mental ego to that of his "operator." The Predator: Nielsen

In January, 1947, Bjorn Schouw Nielsen was sentenced to Horsens State Prison (the facility for Denmark's worst criminals) in Denmark for crimes committed during the Nazi occupation. Nielsen, a self-educated, street smart, talkative, and imaginative con man, was always looking for an easy profit. He had a previous conviction and commitment to the State Institution for Psychopathic Delinquents. His recent crimes were informing on a previous employer to the Germans and blackmailing Resistance Movement businessmen for large sums of money.

He had been occupying his mind while in Horsens by planning his next, "perfect" crime. He defined a perfect crime as one which would be impossible to trace back to him, a crime for which another person would inevitably serve the jail time, and he—even if accused—would inevitably be let off. He bragged, again and again, to other prisoners about his plan.

Nielsen may have heard of the 1936 case of criminal hypnosis in nearby Sweden. The press called it the "Sala affair." A criminal hypnotist, called only "Th." in newspaper reports, had developed a gang of young men and women who raised money by cocaine trade, prostitution, robbery, and murder. Every gang member was Th.'s hypnotic subject. He had conditioned each with an eclectic mix of occultism, yoga, and hypnosis.

Nielsen studied hypnosis. He learned which traits mark a susceptible person. He practiced his hypnotic techniques on other persons whenever he had an opportunity.

The Prey: Palle Hardwick

A few months after arriving at Horsens, Nielsen met Palle Hardwick in the prison workroom. He noticed the younger man's spiritual interests (often characteristic of hypnotically susceptible persons). He saw how depressed Palle was, and how inclined he was to turn to religion for answers. Nielsen targeted Palle for remaking into an agent of his perfect crimes.

Palle's Childhood and Youth—Palle Hardwick and his identical twin brother were their parents only children. They were raised in a middle-class Danish family before, and during, World War II. His father was good-natured, hard-working, and reliable. His mother was witty and ambitious. What Nielsen did to Palle broke their hearts.

In childhood, Palle was intelligent, sensitive, reliable, dutiful, good with his hands, ambitious, and goal-oriented. He later called his youth "a series of little five-year plans." He planned to have a bright future. He was also introspective, quiet, and interested in religion. Palle never smoked or drank. With a few heterosexual exceptions, he was chaste.

From HIPOCORPS to Capture—In 1940, at age 16, Palle joined a volunteer rifle group organized by the Nazis who then occupied his homeland. (They appeared to be there to stay.) The party's conveyer-belt system then carried him through the Youth Section of the Danish Nazi Party to the volunteer German Army Corps, and finally to the German Auxiliary Police (also known as Hipokorps).

Palle was in the Hipokorps only during the last three months of the war, but it ruined his life. He never participated in interrogations or mistreatment of detainees. In fact, he actively avoided assignments that would cause him to mistreat other persons. When assigned to be an interpreter for the Germans, he shot himself in the leg. When he became ambulatory again, they gave him a different assignment. Thus, he managed to avoid participation in the persecution of Danish Jews or of Danish Resistance members. Years later, Palle recalled his three months in the Hipokorps as one of the most unhappy periods of his life.

As the Allied army approached, he became disillusioned, despairing, disgusted. He was sure the Germans would lose the war, but he felt enough loyalty to his Hipocorps unit that he did not walk away from them. A force of combined Allies and Danish resistance fighters arrested Palle on May 8, 1945, together with German troops trying to retreat from Denmark. His captors took him to Horsens State Prison to be held for trial. The route ran by his parents' home, which Palle had not seen for a year and a half.

He stared apathetically out the window of the train, grieving, until he arrived at prison. At Horsens, they placed him in solitary confinement in the cellar for a few days, then moved him to a tiny cell, shared with another "collaborator." Miserable, hopeless, monotonous prison days followed, one after another. Faceless cellmates came and went.

Trial and Imprisonment—After sixteen months in prison, on September 9, 1946, Palle was finally tried. Postwar Denmark hated collaborators, especially Hipokorps members. Being caught in the company of Germans went hard with Palle also. He was sentenced to fourteen more years in Horsens. He was only 22.

Palle's twin brother also was sentenced for collaboration, but he received a far lighter sentence. He soon got out of jail, found a job in the wholesale business, and did well from then on. Palle remained confined, believing he had many years left to serve.

Palle did not fit in at Horsens. A prison report dated December 27, 1946, said he was "Polite and well behaved. Young idealist. Works well." Palle, himself, later wrote of this period:

> For me there was no way back to my earliest youth, before the whole thing began. I did not think that there would be any future for me even on that distant day many years in the future when I might possibly be released....I tried to find a meaning in things from a religious point of view, by thinking that they were ordained by God. I wondered whether He even existed and how He could have created such a world as ours. But that only made matters worse. I began to doubt whether there was a God who directed the universe, or whether it was not merely one long string of fortuitous circumstances. I felt quite alone...as if I were in a diving-bell at the bottom of the sea which was never going to come up again. (Palle quoted in Reiter, 1958, p. 73)

Those depressed feelings all changed, however, the day that Palle experienced a spontaneous mystical encounter with a "guardian spirit." The spirit declared that Palle's long sentence to imprisonment was not an accidental misfortune, but was, indeed, part of God's plan for him, intended to develop and strengthen him for fulfillment of a later task. From the moment he received it, that message became very dear to Palle, a source of hope and strength.

Nielsen the "Guru"

Soon after he met Palle, Nielsen began to tell the gullible young man a series of grandiose lies. Nielsen claimed to know all about religion, to have read lots on it, to have been a member of a society for psychical research. In fact, he said, he was a master yogi—a guru! He promised to get Palle books to study on religion, to initiate him into the mysteries he had learned. He would give Palle an apprenticeship in the arts of yoga mastery. The charming, smooth-talking sociopath promised Palle that his lessons in Indian "philosophy" and yoga training would reveal life's true meaning, grant escape from his present misery, make him independent of this world, and guarantee a better one in an afterlife.

Palle resisted Nielsen's aggressive overtures of friendship.

Nielsen did not give up. He pressured Palle, every day, in the workshop. Nielsen expounded on the reincarnation of souls. He said hypnosis was the way to learn about one's past lives. He promised that, through "mind expansion," Palle could become one with the "divine cosmic principle" and have direct communion with God. He chattered about levitation, channeling spirits, telepathy, and yogis who walked through walls or who could cure a broken leg in five minutes. He gave Palle books to read about yoga.

Palle read the books. He redefined his beliefs and his spiritual goal in terms of what he read and of what Nielsen was saying. He was challenged by the "great and difficult labor" of mind expansion. The books promoted the Eastern concept of learning psychic mind skills from a teacher. Nielsen purred that Palle obviously had talent and even he, the guru, could learn much from him—if Palle would let him become his teacher. Palle believed everything that Nielsen said.

Palle Learns "Yoga"—Reassured by Nielsen's play-acting, the lonely young man finally accepted his proffered friendship. Palle and Nielsen were both accused of collaboration. Both were in prison, both assigned to the workroom. The friendship seemed natural to Palle. Soon, he accepted Nielsen's offer to teach meditation skills.

After that, in the workroom, every day, often in a corner by themselves, Nielsen did "spiritual" exercises with Palle. Like most covert hypnotists, Nielsen carefully avoided the word "hypnosis." He always substituted occult terminology for the "H" word. He called hypnotic episodes, "concentrations." He gave Palle "relaxation exercises," or "magnetic strokings," or "yogic training in how to cease thinking."

Nielsen always began new induction routines by requiring Palle to try it on him first. Con artist Nielsen would then pretend to be completely, helplessly under Palle's mental influence. Nielsen's play acting banished any fear Palle might have that Nielsen could get power over him. Only then, did Nielsen let Palle, who was now very interested and confident, have a turn at being the subject of the "experiment."

Thus, when Nielsen introduced a hand locking induction routine to Palle, Palle first did it to the guru. Nielsen only pretended to be unable to pull his hands apart when Palle said, "Try it. You cannot pull your hands apart." Nielsen knew the routine was just a trick played on ignorant people who don't realize that everybody's knuckle size prevents them from pulling apart clasped hands—unless they spread their fingers to allow the larger knuckles to pass through. This is a test of hypnotic susceptibility. It's also a hypnosis induction, because if a subject believes they have been compelled to obey by mental power, they may continue to obey suggestions.

When it was Nielsen's turn to give the suggestion to Palle, Palle really "locked" his hands. He really believed that he could not pull his clasped hands apart when challenged to try it. Then Nielsen knew, for sure: Palle was a susceptible hypnotic subject, a proper candidate to be the agent of the guru's perfect crimes.

After the hand-locking exercise, Nielsen led Palle in breathing exercises combined with various yoga postures and concentrations on various mental ideas. To Palle it was all just an amusing game, a toy, a prison pastime. He had no idea that Nielsen was covertly conditioning him for a mind-controlled life

Nielsen asked Palle, whose prison behavior record was better than his, to request to share a cell with him. Palle received permission. (That began a long series: Nielsen tells Palle what to say, or do; Palle obeys.) From the spring of 1947, to the fall of 1949, Palle and Bjorn Nielsen were always together in their cell or in the workroom.

From Trance to Hypnosis—Nielsen told Palle that he knew a short cut to the meditative high (trance depth) which Palle now yearned to reach. He led Palle through more hand lockings, and relaxation exercises. He made Palle's arms or legs stiff (catatonic). He did magnetic strokings of a prone and resting Palle. All those were deepening exercises, training for automatism. Through that series of disguised inductions, Nielsen was carefully shaping Palle into a highly trained hypnotic subject. In the meantime, Nielsen kept Palle calm and confident, without suspicion.

Nielsen finally proposed hypnosis to Palle—actually using the H word. The guru made it seem nonthreatening by, as usual, having Palle first hypnotize him. Nielsen again pretended to be deeply affected. Palle again believed that Nielsen was easy to hypnotize and that he was difficult to hypnotize. The truth was the opposite: Palle was far more susceptible than Nielsen. Believing himself to be the more difficult person to hypnotize, Palle accepted being, most often, the subject of inductions. Nielsen explained that he was just trying to bring Palle up to his own yoga skill level.

Nielsen's fertile imagination kept generating new mind-expansion exercises. Jail-weary Palle welcomed them all. They were easy entertainment, a mental escape. Soon, Nielsen was keeping Palle busy doing "yoga" almost around the clock—excepting when he was eating or sleeping. The ceaseless training made Palle's hypnotic suggestibility constantly increase.

Nielsen, next, captured and redirected Palle's sex drive for the purpose of powering his hypnotic control. Kundalini yoga requires celibacy outside of trance and channels sexual energy into intense, orgiastic trance experience.

Palle's kundalini concentrations did, one day, result in an intense climax enveloped in hallucination. Palle believed that he had, in that moment, experienced fusion of his body and spirit and had found unity with a divine essence. Now, joyfully, utterly in love with the trance trip (and perhaps somewhat so also with the guru who worked so hard to deliver these trance highs to him), Palle eagerly anticipated more such orgasmic fusions. He believed he was moving away from the mundane terrestrial world toward contact with a lofty spiritual force.

Again and again, day after day, many times in one day, Nielsen pushed Palle to go into trance as deep as possible and to stay there as long as possible. He also taught Palle self-hypnotic techniques to make his state of lowered consciousness last longer. Nielsen never once dehypnotized Palle, never told him the trance was now over, and he could again be "awake." Palle was now walking around in a state of constant trance, of varying depth, instead of his normal mental condition.

Nielsen explained away Palle's awareness of being in a constant deep trance by saying it was evidence that he was in the presence of the divine. Palle believed him. He wanted to hang on to that divine connection—even if it meant losing contact with reality. In July, 1947, a psychiatrist (who happened to be studying war criminals at Horsens Prison) examined Palle. The doctor wrote in his report that Palle was an idealist with no psychotic traits, no abnormal characteristics at all—except "a tendency to parry questions with obscure oracular answers." (Quoted in Reiter, 1958, p. 205) Obscure "oracular answers" can be evidence of a trance state.

Palle's constant effort, now, was focused on soaring higher and higher (lower and lower trance depths) in each new "concentration" that Nielsen assigned to him. Palle hoped to attain the highest yoga condition and achieve his dream of ecstatic and mystical union with divinity, with the universe's "vital principle." Nielsen's goal, on the other hand, was complete control of Palle's mind by repeated inductions, increased trance depth, and obedience drills. It usually takes much trance training for a subject to reach the deepest levels of trance. A large number of hypnotic sessions "increases the possibility of criminally exploiting the depth of hypnosis." (Hammerschlag, p. 30)

Palle Accepts "X" As God—The guru then began a new "spiritual exercise." As usual, first Palle hypnotized Nielsen, who pretended to be deeply affected. In his sham state of hypnosis, Nielsen "channeled" the voice of a spirit. He made clear which spirit it was. He was supposedly speaking with the voice of the angel who had appeared to Palle and reassured him. Nielsen said,

"I am your guardian spirit. You believe that what has happened to you is a great misfortune for you. But that is not the case. It has all been to strengthen you and test you, in order that you may carry out the mission which it is your destiny to fulfil." (Reiter, 1958, p. 108)

To Palle, Nielsen's bogus channeling was a true and precious revelation, and he hoped for more. Palle never doubted that he should

Social Isolation

Palle was now completely isolated, not only because he had become a space case, but also because Nielsen had used threats, flattery, and visual and auditory negative hallucinations to further isolate him. Under deep hypnosis, Nielsen had instructed:

> "From this moment you will no longer speak to nor address your previous comrades...You will feel that all former ties have been broken. Day and night your entire consciousness will be directed towards the divine. If they approach you, you will not see them, and if they talk to you, you will not hear. They belong to a lower world, which you have nothing whatever to do with." (Reiter, p. 110)

Palle's former friends in prison thought his new condition of perpetual walking trance, and total ignoring of them, was very odd. Although they were upset by the change in Palle, none of them spoke to the prison authorities about it. Nielsen also programmed Palle against his parents and other relatives. Palle obeyed the secret regimen and, thus, became totally dependent upon Nielsen, now his only permitted associate.

Nielsen , however, was not isolated, and he couldn't resist bragging about his control over Palle to some of the other prisoners.

obey the "divine power" who had bestowed those words upon him. Nielsen told Palle that his guardian spirit was named "X."

It was, then, Palle's turn to be hypnotized. When Palle was in deep trance, Nielsen told him that X was the same person as God. He designated X as Palle's induction cue to a deep, amnesic trance. From that moment on, Palle had complete amnesia for all his time spent in X-related trance. Under the cover of that amnesia, Nielsen hammered into Palle's unconscious the belief that Palle's guardian spirit—who was supposedly God and was named X—would hereafter deliver all his orders to Palle via Nielsen.

At first, X's orders, via Nielsen, came in phony seances during which Nielsen pretended he was hypnotized and channeling the spirit's voice. Soon, however, Nielsen developed a wider variety of X communication systems. Palle soon gave the same obedient response to words that Nielsen said while making an X with his body—such as having his legs or arms crossed in the sign of an X—or to the words written following the symbol X in a letter.

Eventually, all Nielsen had to do was say, "X says..." It was a convenient setup, informal and unrecognizable to any random persons who might overhear the guru in the process of implanting new hypnotic commands in Palle. It worked in any social situation. It worked even when Palle seemed to be in a normal waking state. Nielsen would say, "The guardian spirit wants..." or "X wants you to..." Palle would obey, as a hypnotic compulsion, whatever followed those cue phrases.

Sometimes, Nielsen completely concealed his role in X's messages by causing Palle to have posthypnotic hallucinations in which X materialized before him and spoke the predator's instructions. In the first of these posthypnotically hallucinated scenes, Nielsen instructed Palle's unconscious that the spirit would act the same as Palle's spontaneous experience of a guardian spirit had. So it comforted him, and seemed protective and loving. Over time, however, Nielsen weaned Palle from comfort and protection. X was more and more likely to simply show up and give orders. Being completely amnesic for the trance sessions during which Nielsen programmed him to experience these posthypnotic visions, Palle accepted the apparitions with complete faith.

Nielsen made Palle deeply terrified of the slightest failure to give unconditional, absolute obedience to any command from X. He did that by threatening banishment to spiritual darkness in this life and to hell in the next—and then concealing the threat under amnesia. The number one rule to which X demanded obedience was the rule of Secret, Don't Tell. Nielsen indelibly impressed on Palle's unconscious several corollary admonitions that supported the basic rule of secrecy. X told Palle never to speak of X, or of his "revelations" from X, or of Nielsen, who was X's "instrument." In fact, Palle was never to speak to any other prisoners at all.

The threats, if Palle should weaken and tell, were as bad as those for imperfect obedience. He would be judged as having failed in his mission in this life, as having failed all his guardian spirit's tests. He would have no chance whatsoever of salvation and would be damned forever.

Preparation for a "Mission"—X (Nielsen) now told Palle's unconscious more about his "mission." He made it sound lofty and righteous. X said that God was personally ordering Palle to end all wars and to develop and lead a world government in which God and Mankind would be spiritually one. He said that Palle had been designated by God to be the savior of humanity who would "help, cure, and redeem" them, and lead them from suffering into happiness.

Nielsen spent the next year eroding all the moral values that Palle had internalized up to that point in his life, his original superego. Palle's belief in X was made the basis of a new superego system which displaced the old values. Nielsen did that by training Palle to unconsciously judge his behavior as good or bad based only on his X programming—what would cause X pleasure or displeasure. In a condition of obedience to X, Palle would feel happy and peaceful. Resisting X's commands resulted in feelings of misery, fear, and guilt.

Nielsen waited until Palle was conditioned to shift instantly to deep trance on cue and to have total amnesia for time spent in trance before he began giving him really noxious suggestions. That conditioning, combined with the comforting fantasy of world omnipotence and a savior's mission, unconsciously counterbalanced Palle's amnestic reality of humiliating submission to ever more cruel and humiliating demands by Nielsen.

The guru told Palle that his spiritual exercises were now going to teach independence from all physical and material ties. They all involved self denial because X said that Palle must now practice indifference to whatever was dear to him. The training exercises in "independence," however, always involved Palle giving Nielsen his worldly goods. Thus, Palle yielded up his daily meat ration to Nielsen, then his watch, then his accordion. If Palle resisted any concept or command, Nielsen explained that the student's inner resistance was caused by "matter" fighting "spirit." And he would urge Palle to overcome that rebellious "body resistance to the spirit."

Nielsen prepared Palle to commit robbery and murder for him by means of a classic series of desensitization exercises. He said Palle was "above" the usual moral principles such as right of property, or respect for life. X ordered Palle to free himself from all those "middle class morals." In deep trance visualizations, Nielsen gave Palle systematic training in criminal acts. At first, he induced Palle to hallucinate only minor crimes. The guru acted as if it were all a joke—just a little thievery. However, the acts which Nielsen made the hypnotized Palle visualize gradually worsened: robbery, safe cracking, murders, then murdering Palle's own mother. That last item was agonizing for Palle, so Nielsen made him experience it, in hallucination, over and over.

X also instructed Palle to never reveal Nielsen's involvement in any crime that Palle might commit. And he told him to never be hypnotized by anybody but Nielsen.

Palle now walked around in a near-constant trance. He believed that he had direct, daily instructions from God (via X). He was forbidden to tell what was really going on in his life to his conscious mind or to anybody else. He was sealed against induction by any other hypnotist. He believed he had been designated the messiah who would unite the Scandinavian peoples and found an ideal society, because X had told him so. He believed he was founding a new patriotic underground. (Having been long and severely punished for joining the occupier, Palle now was the "resistance.") His mixture of religious and political delusions was an artificial psychosis, created by means of hypnosis. To the casual onlooker, however, Palle would seem merely insane.

Nielsen was finished hypnoprogramming Palle. It was early in 1949. He gave Palle instructions, via X, to escape from Horsens prison—and then to return and free his guru. Palle carried out the escape exactly as ordered, but he was recaptured before he could return and attempt to free the guru. Nobody knew that Nielsen was behind it. Palle was sentenced to serve extra prison time because of his escape.

Palle Out of Prison

Horsens Prison was now shortening the sentences of all prisoners accused of collaboration. Nielsen got out a few months before Palle. After the guru was gone, Palle was not walking around in a trance any more. As Palle's release date neared, however, Nielsen began sending letters to him. They always closed: "Greetings from X." Seeing those words thrilled Palle. They meant that X had not forgotten him. For a moment, he felt the old rush of contact with the divine.

Palle walked out of Horsens, a free man, on October 29, 1949. That day might have been the beginning of a new, better life for him, but his freedom was a cue that Nielsen had pounded in for years. Old hypnotic suggestions activated by that cue now poured into Palle's consciousness. He later wrote:

> The moment I heard I was to be released...I felt at last God had given me my marching orders...I felt exactly like a soldier ready to leave for the front...everything which had happened up to now was only testing which had been designed to bring me up to the peak of my powers and ability...My earthly incarnation was now practically at an end > and only the final short step remained to be taken...

> (Reiter, 1958, p. 124)

As soon as Palle arrived at his parent's home in Copenhagen, he called Nielsen (obeying a posthypnotic suggestion) to hear X's next instructions. Nielsen told Palle to relax, talk to his family, and call in the morning to arrange a meeting time. At six o'clock the next morning, Palle called. Nielsen said to come at three in the afternoon.

When Palle arrived, Nielsen introduced him to his wife, Titte. She soon left them alone. Nielsen hypnotized Palle. From then on, Palle went to visit Nielsen three, or more, times a week. Each visit Nielsen hypnotized him. On the days they did not meet in person, X instructed Palle to phone Nielsen. During their meetings, Nielsen reran all the old deep trance routines from prison, the "religion," the desensitizations—especially the detailed robbery visualizations—and the terrible warnings never to reveal these secrets (particularly not to his parents).

Nielsen told Palle to live with his parents. That would save money. When his parents gave Palle money to hunt for a job, X told him to give it to Nielsen. X told Palle he was freed from any concerns about material property. The money was all X's and Nielsen would manage it for the sake of X. When Nielsen used up that money, X caused Palle to borrow an equal amount from his brother. Palle soon found a job, and it paid well. He always turned his paycheck over to X who returned only what his parents expected as rent, plus a little pocket money. As a result, shortly after his payday, Palle would have to borrow money from some family member for bus fare to get to and from work.

While riding the bus home from Nielsen's apartment, or at night, lying in bed thinking about the mission, Palle often talked to X. Sometimes he saw X, and X talked back to him, for Palle's suggestible brain was now so saturated with X content and X worship that he was having spontaneous X hallucinations.

Nielsen liked company. Palle's natural inclination was toward puritanical habits. He hated beer, could hardly force it down. But X had ordered "social studies," which meant going out to drink and carouse with Nielsen, and so Palle went. And Palle paid. Palle always was commanded by X to pay.

Nielsen wanted to enlarge his stable of hypnotic subjects. He took lessons from a hypnotist to learn better techniques. He established a "Psychophysical Institute." Palle, directed by X, provided the money and did all the work of creating brochures and placing ads to recruit students for the "Institute." Nielsen held training sessions in his home for people thus enticed.

At this time, both Palle and Nielsen were fired by their employers. Nielsen did not get another job, but Palle did. Now, X was even greedier for money. Palle often had to borrow tram fare the day after payday.

His father became suspicious. One evening, he took Palle aside and asked if Nielsen had some sort of hold over him. Palle denied the idea in the usual brusk way with which he dealt with his parents. He said his money matters were his own business and the idea of Nielsen controlling him was obvious nonsense.

An Arranged Marriage—Palle had a standing posthypnotic suggestion to tell Nielsen anything of significance that happened in his life. He reported the conversation with his father. Nielsen started worrying that his income from Palle might stop flowing. The predator decided to end the influence of Palle's family on him by maneuvering Palle out of their home. (Years later, after his memory recovery, Palle felt the deepest grief and anger over the ruined relationship with his parents.)

Nielsen chose a girl named Bente to marry Palle. Bente had been recently engaged to his brother-in-law, but was currently free. Nielsen, himself, then had a brief affair with Bente. Then he arranged a movie date for Bente and Palle. Thus it came about that, on February 11, 1950, a few weeks after Palle's talk with his father, Bente and Palle went to a movie together.

Two days later, Nielsen hypnotized Palle and suggested a feeling of deep, divine peace. Then X told Palle that he and Bente were destined mates because X willed their marriage. X said that Palle truly loved Bente, would realize this, and would think of her constantly. Amnesic for those suggestions, as usual, Palle had two more dates with Bente. He became convinced that he loved her. He introduced her to his family, and proposed marriage. She accepted.

Cupid Nielsen had no interest in promoting genuine love. To him, this marriage was just a better way to control Palle. So, when Nielsen heard that Palle and Bente were buying gold rings for each other, X was displeased at the "unnecessary" expense.

Before the marriage could even begin, X drove a wedge between the lovers by ordering Palle to force his fiancee to have intercourse with Nielsen. Later, regressed under rehypnotization, a grieving, traumatized Palle remembered being in Nielsen's apartment that night. He could hear Bente and Titte talking about housekeeping in the background. Nielsen led Palle to the adjacent room and closed the door behind them. Palle recalled...

> It's there my guardian spirit usually comes and talks to me...He tells me to relax. He puts his hand on my forehead. He gives me magnetic strokings. Then he says that X has told him to see to it that he has intercourse with Bente. I feel completely para- > lyzed over my whole body. My whole body trembles. He tells me to keep quite calm. It does not concern me at all. I have a mission which I must fulfil. It is absolutely necessary that I learn how to control others...He says it is my body which resists. I must learn to control my body. He will help me, and he brings me into a state where I no longer belong to this world... (Reiter, 1958, p. 131)

After Nielsen roused his subject from trance, Palle obeyed the suggestions. He told Bente, "Go and help Nielsen with what he wants." She knew what Nielsen wanted. She refused. Palle insisted. She resisted. Palle said, "I won't marry you unless you do it." Then she agreed. Afterwards, she said, "Now you know I love you."

Deep down, however, Palle felt the opposite. Something he had found and treasured was irrevocably soiled. Ten days later, on their agreed date, Palle married Bente, but he never felt close to her or good about their relationship again.

Nielsen widened the emotional distance between Palle and Bente with more hypnotic suggestions. X told Palle to "govern" his wife, to live with her, but as the master in his house. X said Palle's relationship with Bente had just been an emotional feeling. which he was now completely free of: "...it is completely impossible that she should have any influence whatsoever upon your will...she has nothing whatsoever to do with your financial affairs." (Reiter, 1958, p. 133)

Nielsen now collected, via X, most of the wages of both Palle and Bente. When X again commanded Palle to go out drinking and picking up girls, he went, night after night. (Nielsen called that "karmayoga," action yoga.) As usual, Palle paid the bills. In addition, Palle made his usual solo visits to Nielsen's place. He told Bente he went there because their guerilla organization was training to fight in case the Russians invaded. He said all the money they gave Nielsen was also for that purpose.

By order of X, Palle never trusted his wife, regularly lied to her, and treated her callously. To Nielsen, on the other hand, Palle's behavior was candid, sacrificing, and trustworthy. That's how Nielsen had programmed him to act. Nielsen separated Palle from his parents by marriage. He separated him from his wife, even before their marriage, by infidelity. The story of Palle and Bente (their relationship ever dominated and managed by Nielsen) was a tragic subplot to Palle's hypnotic history. Palle's marriage could have helped to free him. Instead, it further enmeshed him in Nielsen's web.

Training for Robbery- The flow of money from both Bente and Palle still was not enough to satisfy Nielsen. Palle's wages were not as good at the new job, and there was little overtime. X told him to buy a gun (in case of a Russian invasion).

In June, 1950, Nielsen began training Palle to do a bank robbery. He repeated all the old deep trance visualizations of generic robbery and random murder, plus the hallucinations of killing mother (the ultimate obedience exercise and moral desensitization). Then X told Palle to go to a pharmacy and purchase a container of ether, because X "wished to show him some pictures of a 'spiritual nature.'" (Reiter, 1958, p. 135)

When Palle returned with the ether, they went into the private room of Nielsen's apartment. Palle stretched out and relaxed; his guru performed the usual magnetic strokings and intoned relaxation suggestions. Then, Nielsen told Palle to breathe in the ether fumes while he suggested deep, deep sleep. Nielsen had added narcohypnosis to his induction process in order to reinforce Palle's trance depth, automatism, and amnesia.

The "spiritual pictures" turned out to be detailed visualizations of robbing a specific bank. Palle was to imagine himself entering the bank with a briefcase in his left hand, the gun in his right, his mind focused only on his connection with the "divine." Nielsen continued to guide narcohypnotized Palle's deep trance visualization:

> "You go up to the cashier. You study your feelings very closely. You see how ridiculously easy it all is. You know that nothing can stop you. You know that a yogi can do everything. You know that feelings are only something belonging to the material world. You throw your brief case down on the counter and order him to fill it...You are clearly aware of X's presence. You point your pistol at the cashier. You know that you must get that money for X. You see that he is going to refuse. You experience this very concentratedly. You know that if one man will not do it another will. You shoot. You see him fall. You point the pistol at the next man. You repeat your order." (Reiter, 1958, p. 135)

Nielsen repeated the narcohypnotic induction and visualization conditioning, again and again. X appealed to Palle's unconscious vanity and ambition. He declared over and over that Palle alone could save the Fatherland. Then came more visualizations of robbery and murder:

> "You shoot him through the head. You know that this is a necessary step on the way to Samadhi...You are completely unaffected. You know that it is God's will." (Reiter, 1958, p. 135)

Guru Failures—Palle had planned a vacation with Bente in the country that summer. X told him to stay in town. X also said that Palle must again make the sacrifice of giving his wife to Nielsen for sex. He told Palle to see to it that Bente had plenty to drink that evening, and then to stay out of the way. Accordingly, Palle primed Bente with alcohol, then went to another room, where he meditated in a yogi position, focused on the thought that nothing in this world meant anything to him except the will of X.

The evening with Bente did not work out as Nielsen had planned. She fiercely defended herself. Although Nielsen inflicted a black eye and concussion on her, she escaped from him without being raped.

In robbery training sessions, X next pointed out to Palle the exact bank which was to be robbed. He showed Palle where to hide the money afterwards. X said that robbing a bank was easy, something that anybody could do. If Palle felt a resistance to obeying, he said, it only meant his body was stronger than his mind, and that, of course, must be overcome.

But Palle resisted X's command to commit a real robbery. X pressed the demand harder, asking for blind faith. He promised that, if Palle would only trust and obey, it would work out all right. Palle's resistance weakened. Years of programming, all the old hypnoconditioning arguments, had long prepared him to obey whatever X ordered.

Nielsen scheduled the bank robbery for August 21, 1950. The morning unfolded, as X had preinstructed Palle's unconscious. Palle told Bente (who was now pregnant) that his back hurt, and he would stay home from work. She brought him breakfast in bed, then went to her job. As soon as she was out of sight, he went to buy a bicycle.

While walking toward town, he passed the Church of Jesus. At that moment, Palle began to feel terribly upset. He said to himself, "There's something wrong here...There's something which tells me that all this is wrong." (Reiter, 1958, p. 141) As Nielsen had programmed him to do, Palle interpreted his upset feeling to be his body resisting X's orders. But he could not argue the resistance away. He could not help thinking about the people in the bank who might get hurt if he robbed it. His feeling of upset got worse and worse. He just could not do the robbery. He called Nielsen and said, "Everything is wrong."

Nielsen said, "I was only testing your will. Just relax. I'm busy right now, but I'll speak to your guardian spirit. Come see me at seven tomorrow evening."

First Bank Robbery—After that tremendous moral victory of resisting evil programming, Palle himself did not know what had happened. He did not consciously remember having been about to rob a bank. He did not remember being unable to carry out the plan. He went home and went to bed.

The next evening, after Palle arrived at his apartment, Nielsen concentrated on extinguishing that spark of unconscious Christian morality in his subject. He hypnotized Palle. He then deepened his trance with the ether. He then threatened, instructed, repeated, and repeated, the will of X for Palle to perform that bank robbery. The hypnotic session continued until well past midnight.

X rescheduled the bank robbery for the next day, August 23, 1950. The next morning, Palle again told Bente that his back hurt. Again, he lay in bed while she went to work. An hour later, Nielsen arrived at Palle's apartment. He began another prolonged induction of deep hypnosis in Palle. His suggestions again assailed Palle's unconscious: "You know that it is right. The guardian spirit has said so. Nielsen is only the instrument of your divine spirit." Nielsen finished and left.

Precisely ten minutes after his departure, the posthypnotic suggestions began to kick in. Palle began the robbery sequence. He rode a bike to the bank, parked it outside, and started walking in. Just as he was going through the doorway, he felt his "body" beginning to resist. This time he was able to conquer that resistance.

He continued into the bank, slung his briefcase over the teller's counter, and told him to fill it with money. The teller filled the briefcase and handed it back to Palle. As programmed, Palle then told everybody in the bank to get down on the floor.

If any person had refused to get down on the floor, Palle was programmed to shoot him. They all got down on the floor. Palle left with the briefcase full of money, mounted his bike, and rode home. There, he put the bike away, caught a taxi, rode to his designated meeting place with Nielsen, and handed over the briefcase and its contents to him.

Nielsen asked, “Have you shot anyone?”

Robot Palle reported, “No, it was not necessary.”

Palle wanted to give Nielsen the pistol too. Nielsen told him to hide it in the woods. Then, Palle went home. Bente was already there. Unexpectedly seeing her triggered another panic attack. This was a situation which his hypno-instructions didn’t cover. As by the church, he suddenly felt desperately confused and upset, unable to think, and unable to understand why he felt this way. His sense of confusion suddenly coalesced into an urgent need to call Nielsen and ask what to do.

He called. Nielsen’s voice, his calming words, instantly soothed Palle. With that familiar, trusted voice in his ear, he knew everything would be all right. However, Palle’s confused behavior had aroused Bente’s suspicions. She had already heard about the bank robbery. She told him that she suspected he was the person who had robbed the bank.

Palle called Nielsen again, reporting Bente’s remark. Nielsen gave Palle a posthypnotic suggestion to act miserable and guilty and to confess to Bente that he was upset because he had been unfaithful to her that day.

When Palle carried out that suggestion, however, Bente just laughed. She didn’t believe a word of it. From the characteristic cigarette butts she had found in the apartment, she was sure that it was Nielsen who had been there with Palle. Palle again called Nielsen. X told him to move to a slum because he was spending too much money on rent.

The next day, Nielsen called Bente. He scolded her for accusing Palle of doing the robbery. He also said that, if she would not agree to the move, he would make Palle divorce her and marry a different woman. He then took Palle to visit a series of prostitutes.

Bente later told police that Nielsen terrified her. But, this time, she did not give in. She needed a decent place for their baby to live. She left Palle and moved in with his parents. Both she and his parents then urged Palle over and over to sever the relationship with Nielsen. Palle finally agreed not to see Nielsen until after the baby was born (six months away), and Bente came back to live with him.

Nielsen, prosperous with all the bank loot, adjusted gracefully to the setback. X told Palle to phone the guru daily. He did so, and X gave his orders over the phone. Soon Palle was visiting Nielsen again.

But Nielsen was still concerned about the possibility that Bente might talk too much. To deny credibility to her suspicions, Nielsen gave Palle a posthypnotic suggestion to take a few hours off work, visit his doctor, and tell him about Bente’s bad nerves and paranoid delusions. He was to act very worried about her and ask the doctor what to do. Palle obeyed, unaware of the real cause of his statements. Bente’s supposed “bad nerves” and “paranoid delusions” went into her medical record.

Second Robbery and Murders—The money from Palle’s first bank robbery was running out. January 10, 1951, Nielsen renewed Palle’s narcohypnotic robbery training. In deep trance, Palle heard a lot of “God’s will,” “your mission,” and “you must sacrifice yourself completely.” Over and over, he visualized robberies and murders, especially of stubborn bank clerks. X also told Palle to write a detailed plan of his political party, including badges and organizational chart. After each training session, Palle woke up feeling a wonderful inner peace (as suggested).

X scheduled Palle’s next bank heist for March 29, 1951. Palle retrieved the gun from the woods. He again took a briefcase. He rode Nielsen’s bike this time. As he arrived at the bank, he again felt tremendous inner resistance surge up inside him. In a later rehypnotization, Palle relived his struggle to overcome that resistance at the moment when he arrived outside of the targeted bank:

> “Well this is it...get it over quickly...then it’s all right...(moaning slightly)...Oh! It’s the usual thing. Why the devil have I got a body that has to put up resistance every time I’m going to do anything? Now (signs of violent affect)—(groans)...I can’t do it...body resisting the will...it is only something to be conquered. It can be conquered...it must be conquered...I lean the bicycle up outside—that’s right—Now it’s just a matter of three brisk steps.” (Reiter, 1958, pp. 154-5)

Palle went up those three steps, walked into the bank, pulled the gun out of his briefcase, and shot a bullet into the ceiling. He threw the container onto the counter. He told the teller to fill it up with money. The teller hesitated. Palle, in posthypnotic trance, imagining himself to be the instrument of divine power, feeling the power of X with him in that moment, and obeying his extensive conditioning preparatory to that moment, shot the man dead.

Palle then turned to the bank manager and told him to fill the briefcase with money. Instead, the manager reached for the alarm switch. Before he could touch it, Palle also shot him fatally.[1] A bank worker on the periphery sounded the alarm. Hearing it, Palle turned and rushed out of the bank.

As he ran out of the bank, Palle also ran out of posthypnotic suggestions. This scenario was not covered in his programming. So, the posthypnotic trance suddenly ended. He was wide awake. He interpreted that as X having abandoned him. As before, when he encountered something unexpected which his posthypnotic instructions did not cover, Palle became panic-stricken. He jumped onto the bike and pedaled away. He managed to escape everyone who was chasing him—except for one fourteen-year-old boy.

Capture, Interrogation, Psychiatric Evaluation

The youngster saw Palle go into an apartment house. He then turned back, flagged down a policeman, and told him where the bank robber had gone. The Copenhagen police searched the house. They found Palle just entering an apartment. He admitted that he was the object of their search. They went with him into the apartment.

Inside sat a drunk, dirty old woman. She told the officer that Palle was a friend of her nephew, Nielsen. She said Nielsen was vacationing in the country with a nightclub dancer who rented a room from her. She gave police a photo of Nielsen.

Interrogation—Palle Hardrup insisted, despite intense interrogation, that he had planned and carried out the crime alone. "Did you have an accomplice?" they asked, over and over. "No, none whatsoever," he always said. Doctors at the Institute of Forensic Medicine reported that Palle was icy calm. He spoke casually of his robbery, apparently unremorseful. He said he had never discussed the idea with anybody else, that it was entirely his own.[2]

He parroted for authorities, word for word, all that Nielsen had told him under hypnosis to say if he was arrested. He would explain to them, as long as they cared to listen, that his robbery was only to get money to finance his political party. He told them about the organization chart and badges. The doctors assumed he was psychotic.

Police checked their files and discovered that Nielsen had a serious criminal record. But he was verified to have been out of town at the time of the crime. The investigation of Nielsen was dropped. Palle was processed for trial. Nielsen's plan to pull off the perfect crime was successful. Even under those terrible circumstances, and despite careful interrogation by doctors and police, Palle's hypnotic conditioning did not break.

Informers—Most victims of unethical hypnosis have no witnesses to their conditioning. Or the witnesses are unable, or afraid, to come forward and testify. But Nielsen had bragged to other prisoners about his power over Palle, and many persons had seen him hypnotizing Palle. After Palle's robbery and murders were reported in the newspaper and on radio, witnesses began to come forward.

The first break in the case was an anonymous letter claiming important evidence, and asking to meet a detective in a Copenhagen bar at a certain time. A detective went. The informant said that he had been in the same prison as Nielsen and Palle for several years. He said Nielsen and Palle were both serving time for collaboration and had shared a cell. He said that Nielsen had hypnotized Palle and caused him to become

> ...virtually his slave, giving up all his personal possessions and even much of his prison food to him. The code, or trigger sign which always sent Hardrup into a deep trance was the sign of an X, and Nielsen had so conditioned his subject that whenever this sign was made he went straight into a state of somnambulance. The informer insisted that although Hardrup had carried out the raid, Nielsen's was certainly the mind controlling him at the time. (Edmunds, p. 148)

Other released prisoners from Horsens also contacted the police and provided information. Men still in Horsens spoke to prison authorities, who contacted the police and passed on their statements. All said the same thing: Palle was Nielsen's hypno-puppet.

When police confronted him with this new evidence, however, Palle was unmoved. He still insisted he alone was guilty and that his intent was only to raise money for political purposes, not to give to Nielsen. The psychiatrists now, however, were looking for a new type of evidence. They noted that Palle's denials were "unreasoned, mechanical reiterations of the same simple statements." (Edmunds, p. 148)[1]

1. Alexander Cannon, an English medical hypnotist, warned of the possibility of crime by posthypnotic suggestion, and predicted an event such as this in a 1950 article: "...when an hypnotic suggestion of a criminal character is carried out, it is done with the greatest coolness." He quoted an earlier analysis by Du Prel: "Hurried on by irresistible force, the subject feels none of the doubts of the criminal who acts spontaneously. He behaves with a tranquillity and security..." (Cannon, p. 19)

2. In 1887, Bjornstorm described an experiment in which a subject was told to steal a bracelet while hypnotized, which she did. Later, she was given a posthypnotic suggestion to accuse a man of having done the crime, which she also did. An early 1950's Rand report to the Air Force and the CIA agreed that "a hypnotized subject will often accept and confess to an implanted memory as a real event in his own past life." (Bowart, p. 69)

Psychiatric Evaluations—The police reopened their investigation of the case. They called in Dr. Max Schmidt, Chief Police Psychiatrist, to consult. He had never heard of Palle before, but he knew Nielsen from past criminal adjudications. When Schmidt asked Palle if he had ever been hypnotized and what he knew about hypnosis, Palle became agitated and upset. He said that his "good angel" would not allow him to answer that question. He then repeated all the elements of his canned confession. Then he begged them to just "get it over." (Edmunds, p. 149) When Schmidt told Palle that an identification of Nielsen and his guardian spirit would explain a lot, Palle absolutely and emotionally rejected the idea.

Dr. Schmidt gave Palle a battery of psychological tests. His IQ was 129. His claim to have robbed and killed because it was his destiny to rule and save Denmark was classified as "an atypical paranoid psychosis with a system of delusions, though without other distinct schizophrenic features." (Reiter, 1958, p. 205) The doctor told police that Palle's "psychosis-like condition" had been caused by subjection to prolonged, intensive hypnotraining. He told interrogators to just substitute "Nielsen" wherever Palle said "X" and they would get the real picture.

Palle still would not agree that he had been hypnotized.

The police talked to Nielsen again. He denied loaning his bicycle to Palle. They decided to question Palle with Nielsen in the room. The usual questions were asked. Palle gave the usual declarations of his own guilt and denials that Nielsen had anything to do with it. Police noticed that Nielsen sat

> ...forward with elbows on knees, arms crossed and hands on shoulders, thus making a clear X sign. When told to sit properly he changed his position for a more upright one, but immediately crossed his legs. For the duration of the interrogation, a matter of some three hours, he stared intently into Hardrup's eyes. It was observed that whenever Nielsen made an X sign Hardrup renewed his own confessions and protestations of Nielsen's innocence . . . (Edmunds, p. 149)

That was an interesting observation, but it was not enough evidence on which to arrest Nielsen. The attempt to build a case against him seemed impossible. Then, somebody remembered a bank robbery in another Danish town, seven months earlier, which had the same modus operandi. The robber had escaped. Witnesses identified Palle as the holdup man in that one, too.

When police questioned Palle about that robbery, however, he could not remember a thing. He explained that his good angel "told him when to remember and when to forget." (Edmunds, p. 149)

The police talked to Bente. She told them that she had seen Nielsen hypnotize Palle many times using the X sign. She said she had long suspected that Palle was involved in the first robbery. Police noticed that Palle received a letter from Nielsen every day, content innocuous, but always marked with an X. Another prisoner told them that Nielsen had paid him to draw X marks on walls where Palle was sure to see them.

Palle still insisted he had committed the crime entirely on his own.

[1] A subject with amnesia-cloaked hypnoprogramming tends to repeat verbatim the content of that programming, in response to questions that stimulate it.

Dr. Reiter Enters the Case

Nielsen was defended by a team of the best lawyers money could buy. They based their client's defense on his claim that Palle could not be hypnotized. It looked strong. Neither Dr. Schmidt, nor the police department's expert hypnotist on staff (a detective who was in charge of Palle's case for the first year) could hypnotize him. To prove a case of victimization by hypnosis, Palle had to be demonstrably capable of amnesic somnambulism: quickly and deeply hypnotizable, capable of positive and negative hallucinations, and of unknowingly obeying posthypnotic suggestions because of complete suggested amnesia—a state of mind in which "critical powers and free will were abolished." (Reiter, 1958, p. 87)

At this point, the police called in Dr. Reiter. He was one of Denmark's foremost hypnosis experts, a faculty member lecturing on psychotherapy and psychosomatic medicine at the University of Copenhagen, and an expert on criminal psychiatry. Like Schmidt, Reiter already knew Nielsen well. Dr. Reiter had been Director of the State Institution for Psychopathic Delinquents when Nielsen was incarcerated there and was also his parole officer after discharge. In addition, Nielsen had later attended the psychiatric clinic of a hospital which Dr. Reiter directed.

Reiter believed that unethical hypnosis was not possible. He had recently testified, for the defense, in the case of a 44-year-old hypnotist accused of using hypnosis to have sex with a female client. Reiter testified, in court, that he doubted that the alleged abuse could have taken place. (The Court sentenced the hypnotist to prison for eighteen months anyway.)

Reiter first visited Palle in April, 1952. The accused looked pale and harassed. He acted tense, stiff, and unnatural. For the first five weeks of their daily meetings, they just talked. Palle told Reiter what he could remember. He seemed genuinely interested in getting to the bottom of it all. But he did not remember anything about hypnosis. He did not remember anything about the first robbery.

Futile Attempts to Hypnotize Palle—From May 27 to July 4, 1952, Dr. Reiter tried to hypnotize Palle. Each time, Palle descended to a light trance level—and stopped there. Reiter's attempts did stir up in Palle painful, chaotic thoughts of times spent with Nielsen, but there was no recovery of amnesic memories, either in or out of trance.

One day, Nielsen encountered Palle in court. After that meeting, Dr. Reiter noticed that Palle's beliefs in his guardian angel and his mission, and his amnesia, had been reinforced. He began to have spontaneous hallucinations again in which X talked to him about his mission. Palle also began to feel upset all the time. He did not know why he felt so anxious. He told Dr. Reiter that he was having chronic insomnia. Time after time, he would be just on the verge of falling asleep, and then he would suddenly feel tense and frightened, afraid of losing control, afraid of becoming unconscious. He had frightening dreams when he did sleep, but, when he awoke, he could never remember exactly what he had been dreaming.

The first fifteen times that Reiter tried to hypnotize Palle, what happened was a very atypical pattern. Palle went into a light trance, but no deeper Anybody, who can be hypnotized, even a little, will normally go into trance more easily, and deeper, with each subsequent induction. Palle responded exactly the opposite. Any induction method which worked once on him took longer to work, and worked less well, each successive time that Reiter used it.

For example, the first time that Reiter told Palle to stare at a bright light, he entered a light trance in just five minutes. But each repeated attempt to induct using the light took longer—and Palle never went deeper. The first time that Dr. Reiter tried a levitation technique, after twenty minutes Palle was in a light trance. When Reiter suggested the deeper state of catalepsy, and touched Palle's hand to deepen by "anchoring," Palle jerked awake. The next time Reiter tried the levitation induction, it took 47 minutes to get Palle into a trance, and this one was less deep than before. Again and again, Reiter changed his induction technique. Palle's reacted the same.

Reiter knew that Nielsen's defense team was claiming that Palle was not capable of deep hypnosis. The police psychiatrist, however, suspected that Nielsen had given Palle sealing suggestions against induction of deep trance. If every other hypnotist was limited to light trance, all Nielsen's commands to Palle would remain dominant; a command given at a deeper level of hypnosis automatically prevails over one given in lighter trance.

If the problem was depth sealing, how could he break through?

Day after day, Reiter attempted to hypnotize Palle—and continued to fail. Then, one day, the doctor tried an new, much more powerful induction method—barbiturate narcohypnosis.

Evipan Breaks the Seal—On July 4, 1952, Reiter asked Palle to stare at the light for three minutes. Then he injected Evipan (a European brand of Sodium Amytal) to chemically force him into trance. As the drug took hold, Palle cried out in sudden, terrible distress, "No! No! Let me go! I won't do it! I can't do it!"—on and on like that for the next two minutes. Reiter described Palle's condition in those few minutes as "the most high-pitched and obviously painful affect." (1958, p. 89) The anguished yelling was Nielsen's hypnoprogramming resisting the chemical induction.

Then the doctor told Palle to open his eyes and look again at the bright lamp. This time, within 30 seconds of staring at the blinding light and hearing Reiter's soothing "Sleep, sleep" suggestions, a narcohypnotized Palle fell into a truly deep trance.

Now—after the staring, plus drug, plus second staring—Palle's body relaxed. His facial expression became calm and peaceful. All the anxiety and tension that had characterized his behavior up to now was suddenly gone. Reiter let him rest like that a half hour, then gave suggestions that he would awake feeling fine and acting calm.

Palle awoke and said he felt fine. He was acting calm too—which was completely unlike his reaction to previous hypnotic induction attempts by Reiter. So the doctor knew that his suggestions had finally taken hold!

Dr. Reiter asked Palle what he remembered and how he had felt during the procedure. Palle said he remembered staring at the lamp before the injection. He remembered the shot. He said it had made him feel as if he were split into two persons. "He was terribly afraid...There was something which seemed to prevent him going to sleep, although he felt very sleepy and influenced." (Reiter, 1958, p. 90) Palle also remembered staring at the light the second time. From then, until after Reiter's suggestion to return to consciousness, he remembered nothing. His spontaneous amnesia proved that Palle could reach a somnambulistic depth, for he had just done so!

Nielsen had a back-up hypnoprogram implanted against the possibility someone might succeed in breaking through his control. A new series of posthypnotic suggestions now kicked into action in Palle's brain. Although, in all their previous meetings Palle had been friendly and fully cooperative, now his facial expression turned hard. He acted tense, suspicious, apprehensive, and started an argument with Dr. Reiter. Next day, his newly suspicious and defiant attitude remained in place. He told Reiter that he was no longer willing to be hypnotized unless Reiter would allow Nielsen to come and see if Nielsen could also hypnotize him.

Palle had a legal right to reject hypnosis by Reiter. So, on that day Reiter did not try to hypnotize him. Instead, he spent the whole session reasoning with Palle, trying to persuade him to let Dr. Reiter continue to hypnotize him. The doctor said that he would be very interested to see what took place if Palle and Nielsen were together (though he actually thought Palle's idea was ridiculous, against Palle's best interests, and undoubtedly was Nielsen's hypnoprogramming). He added that such a meeting should happen much later. He ended by telling Palle to let prison officials know what he decided.

That night, Palle tossed and turned, again unable to sleep as he wrestled in his mind with the undefined force in him which did not want him to see Reiter again. Before that restless night was over, he had defeated the unknown enemy in his lonely night combat. He had decided to continue with Reiter.

So, the next day, Palle came to see Reiter again and told the doctor his decision. The prisoner still was upset, nervous, talking fast, agitated. Reiter wasted not a moment. He again used lamp staring, followed by injection, followed by a second lamp staring to induct Palle. Again Palle went into a deep, amnesic trance. For the rest of July, Reiter repeated the same induction routine: staring, shot, staring. Every time, Palle went into deep, deep trance. Over the next ten sessions, Reiter decreased the amount of injected Evipan a little bit more each time, until finally the shot was just distilled water. It still triggered deep trance in Palle (classic Pavlovian conditioning). Later on, Reiter omitted the injection, using only the two eye fixations. Palle still went into deep trance. He was again a conditioned hypnotic subject.

Palle, the Somnambulist

Training—First, Dr. Reiter trained Palle to be an obedient hypnotic subject.

> ...the "training-in-hypnosis" period should not be abandoned until it has been established that posthypnotic suggestions are carried through in a fashion that leaves no doubt of the mastery of the situation by the operator...a patient or subject should possess a number of accomplishments...He should be able to enter a deep trance almost as soon as he is instructed to do so; he should be able to revert memorially [regress] to earlier periods of his life; he should be able to verbalize while in the trance state; he should be able to carry out suggestions for posthypnotic behavior especially as these apply to recall or amnesia. (Lindner, Rebel Without a Cause, 1944)

Palle soon entered deep and amnesic trance, in less than a second, to whatever induction cue Reiter had specified. He settled Palle onto the letter "P" as a regular cue, imitating Nielsen's use of the letter "X." Reiter gave supplementary suggestions to prevent Palle from going into a trance if he saw a random P—such as in a sign. The doctor also gave sealing suggestions to protect Palle against more hypnosis by Nielsen: "If you ever receive an induction cue from any person but me, it will have no effect at all." (But earlier and more repeated programming tends to be dominant over later and less often repeated programming.)

Transference—Nielsen had got Palle to unconsciously accept the guru's hypnotic instructions as coming from Palle's guardian spirit/X/God. Reiter decided to mimic that system, except that he made Palle's unconscious receive the doctor's hypnotic instructions as coming from Mama and Daddy. Reiter wanted an unconscious transfer-

Classical Conditioning

Any biological function that is normally unconscious (reflexive) can be classically conditioned. Your level of consciousness can be conditioned because it normally adjusts unconsciously, just like your retina diameter and heart rate. Salivation at the sight of food is another normally unconscious (reflexive) function.

An assistant to Pavlov did the original classical conditioning experiment, using a dog. The dog would begin to drool as soon as he saw food, a natural response. The assistant began to ring a bell right before he brought food in where the dog could see it. Soon, when the bell rang, the dog drooled in anticipation of food. After that, the food might or might not arrive, but the dog still drooled when he heard the bell. A salivation response that was naturally associated with the sight of food now appeared at the artificial sound of the bell. That's classical conditioning. Classical conditioning is an unconscious association wherein an arbitrary outside signal is made to cause an event inside the subject's body.

In classical conditioning, the subject is passive. A dog with its salivary gland outlet in the mouth hooked up to an externally visible measuring tube, or a human subject willing to get a needleful of barbiturate in his arm is "passive." The subject's response to the biological cue is involuntary and reflexive. Pavlov placed meat powder on the dog's tongue; and it began to salivate heavily. Dr. Reiter injected Palle with barbiturate; and Palle's state of consciousness lowered to deep trance.

In classical conditioning, the desired association, or reinforcement, occurs before the elicited response: salivation or trance. The conditioned (unnatural) stimuli of bell or needle are timed together with the unconditioned (natural) stimuli: meat powder or barbiturate drug. Our natural learning system is associative. It does not work if the bell rings after the food comes, or if the fluid injection happened after consciousness lowers. Sequence is all-important in classical conditioning. The bell has to ring either at the same time, or slightly before, for the conditioned response to develop.

Classical conditioning is the unconscious creation of a mental reflex. It is automatic learning. An association between the two stimuli (bell/meat; needle/drug) is made so strong that, eventually, the artificial one (bell, needle) can replace the natural one (meat, drug). Thus it happened that the sound of the bell that Pavlov's assistant rang before placing the meat powder on the dog's tongue soon caused the dog to salivate, even when the assistant did not give the dog any meat powder. The dog was conditioned.

A famous experiment with human conditioning was reported, in 1933, by Hudgins, "Conditioning and the Voluntary Control of the Pupillary Light Reflex." Ordinarily, you cannot control the expansion or contraction of the pupil of your eye because that is an involuntary reflex. Your pupil automatically contracts at the stimulus of a bright light, expands in the dark. Hudgins conditioned human subjects, as Pavlov had with dogs. Hudgins would say, "Contract," and the bell would sound, and the light would flash in the subject's eye. After only a few hours of training, Hudgins could simply say the word "contract," and the subject's pupil would contract—no light, no bell, just the word!

In the 40s, Gregory Razran conditioned human subjects to salivate when he said "style" or "urn." Then he got them to generalize the response and therefore to salivate to synonyms such as "fashion" and "vase." (The generalized responses were weaker.) Okake Naruse, University of Kyoto, caused conditioned hallucinations. He made hypnotized subjects stare at a screen. Naruse flashed a light (or sounded a bell), then projected an image on the screen...

> ...at low illumination. He gives the subject a pad of paper, has him draw the image several times, then suggests amnesia for the whole experience and brings him out of hypnosis. Later he tells the awakened subject to watch the screen; he sounds the bell, projecting nothing, and asks the subject to draw what he "sees." People do, quite dependably. (London, Behavior Control, 1969, p. 290)

They drew the image projected during the past hypnosis. Conditioning, plus amnesia, made that work.

Dr. Reiter's needle, even though filled with pure water, because of the phenomenon of classical conditioning, soon resulted in an equally deep trance as if the drug had been used.

ence, of Palle's strong original bondings with his parents, to himself. Reiter succeeded: "More and more he identified me with persons belonging to his early infancy..." (Reiter, 1958, p. 92)

Reliving many emotional, painful episodes from his childhood and school years for Reiter increased Palle's hypnotic susceptibility to him yet more.

Testing—After training came a testing phase. Reiter tested Palle's trance depth by all possible standards. He suggested a visual hallucination. Animals played around Palle. The doctor suggested that Palle open his eyes. With eyes open, Palle still "saw" the romping animals. (That is waking hypnosis, a proof of somnambulism.) On Reiter's suggestion, Palle petted and played with the animals. Reiter next tested his ability to have hallucinations in color, negative hallucinations, and to talk to old friends resurrected in imagination. Palle performed all that with no trouble.

Only then, did Reiter begin to regress Palle. After Reiter began regressing Palle to the Nielsen period of his life, he still began each session with testing, including a regression to something "neutral"—a childhood scene, or something to do with his current life and relationship with the doctor. Before and after the neutral regression, Reiter daily tested Palle for evidence of deep, authentic somnambulism: total amnesia, "massive catalepsy," anesthesia for a painful pinprick, complex multisensory hallucinations, and "bridge phenomenon." Palle always demonstrated complete somnambulism.

"Bridge phenomenon" meant that Palle's neck rested on the back of one chair, his ankles over the top of another. He lay there, in catatonic trance, stiff as a board. Reiter further tested Palle's bridge by loading forty kilograms on his outstretched body. His body remained rigid, supporting the weight.

Somnambulist Palle Is Demonstrated

Reiter gave several demonstrations of Palle's somnambulist abilities to persons involved in his case.

Induction Cue, Phone—Dr. Reiter showed how Nielsen could have given Palle hypnotic suggestions over the telephone. A policeman brought Palle into a room where several official observers, Reiter's assistant, and a telephone awaited. Reiter phoned from a nearby room. The officer who answered told Palle that he had a call and Palle took the phone.

Reiter asked, "How are you?"

"Fine," Palle said.

Hypnotist: An "Artificially Induced Superego"

R.W. White was a psychoanalytically-oriented psychiatrist and research hypnotist. He saw in hypnosis a "transference of the loving, hating and fearing attitudes which were first aroused by the parents" to the operator. ("An Analysis of Motivation in Hypnosis, " p. 154) Kubie and Margolin were also Freudian-oriented research hypnotists. They said that hypnosis is essentially the displacement of the conscious mind's (ego) control by

> ...a complex image of the hypnotist which becomes part of the subject. This image functions in the subject as does the residue of parental images in adults. It delimits memories and contacts, dictates purposes, distributes inner rewards and inner punishments, and engenders strong affects. In some measure, therefore, it temporarily dispossesses the earlier authorities (i.e., the superego), or merges with them...The incorporated image of the hypnotist plays the same role in the hypnotic subject as does the incorporated and unconscious image of the parental figure in the child or adult. Hypnosis thus is seen to be an experimental reproduction of a natural developmental process. (Kubie and Margolin, "The Process of Hypnotism and the Nature of the Hypnotic State")

A hypnotic subject accepts the hypnotist as an unconscious displacement for his or her own ego the way a child unconsciously incorporates parental points of view.

> In the induction stage the hypnotist becomes for a time the sole representative of the external world and, once hypnosis has been achieved, while the subject reinstates his normal boundaries in both time and place, the hypnotist remains incorporated within his conscience as "an experimentally induced superego figure. (Ibid.)

Reiter then said, “Now listen carefully! P!” Palle’s head instantly collapsed onto the desktop. His eyes closed. The phone receiver fell from his ear.[1]

Reiter’s assistant yelled Palle’s name and shook him. Palle could not be awakened; he remained in deep trance. Then the assistant held the phone by Palle’s ear. Reiter gave Palle instructions over the phone to wake up. Then, Palle awoke. He remembered nothing of what had happened while he was in trance.

Induction Cue, in Writing— Reiter’s assistant then handed Palle a letter from Reiter. Palle opened the envelope and read the message inside:

Greetings from P. Reiter

Seeing the initial P in a letter from Dr. Reiter cued another trance. Again, Palle’s eyes closed and his head collapsed onto the desktop. Again, the observers shouted and shook him, but were unable to bring him out of it.[2] Again, Reiter’s assistant placed the phone by Palle’s ear while Reiter told his subject to wake. Again, Palle woke with no memory of the trance.

Amnesia and Posthypnotic Suggestions- Palle later wrote about a similar demonstration:

> Now I am awake, and now I am asleep. One moment Dr. Reiter is giving an explanation and the next time I wake up (I don’t remember falling asleep in the meantime), all those present are sitting looking in their notebooks. They are all confusing fragments which it is completely impossible to write at all sensibly about. (Reiter, p. 187)

The doctor next demonstrated his subject’s obedience to posthypnotic suggestions. He hypnotized Palle and told him that, exactly three minutes after he was awakened from trance, he would stand up and walk over to the Assistant Commissioner. He was to then ask that gentleman his age, what year he left school, and what caused him to choose the career he did.

Reiter then awakened Palle and chatted with him. Palle had no memory of being hypnotized, nor of the posthypnotic suggestions which Reiter had given him. Three minutes later, Palle suddenly looked at the Commissioner. He then walked over to him and, in the most polite and apologetic manner, asked the exact questions he had been told to ask.

Reiter said, “Palle, why did you do that?”

Palle explained (rationalized) that he had suddenly thought how interesting the career of an important police official must be. He said he wondered how a person got into that important work.

Reiter then dropped Palle back into trance and gave him another posthypnotic suggestion. He said, “In precisely three hours, you will hear my voice, just like you used to hear the voice of X talking to you. You will not be surprised by that. You will call the jail guard, and ask to see the police solicitor.”

The police called Reiter at home that evening to report. They said his posthypnotic suggestion to Palle had been carried out in every detail. Exactly three hours after Reiter gave the suggestion, Palle (now back in his cell) had acted upset. He had called the warder and told him that he had now begun to hear Dr. Reiter’s voice. He said “he thought it was too bad that not only did he have to hear X now and then but that I, too, had to interfere in his affairs when he was on his own.” (Reiter, 1958, p. 94) Palle then asked for paper and wrote on it a request to see the police solicitor.

During their next appointment, Palle told Dr. Reiter about hearing his voice in the cell. Reiter’s “voice” had told him to be calm and have faith, because one future day the truth would emerge—if Palle himself would tell it. (Reiter had not specified exactly what words Palle would hear him say. Palle’s unconscious had itself composed that reassuring wisdom, which might conceivably have come from Reiter.) Palle couldn’t imagine why he had heard the psychiatrist’s voice in his cell.

Reiter then suggested a series of multisensory posthypnotic hallucinations, including an apparition of himself. Palle obediently hallucinated the suggested visits from Dr. Reiter. The doctor appeared in his white coat as Palle lay on his cell cot, gave the signal P to Palle, and Palle’s cell transformed into a beautiful beach surrounded by bright flowers, blue sea, and shining sun. The prisoner heard a church bell sounding in the distance and felt full of peace.

A Criminal Suggestion—Reiter’s final posthypnotic experiment with Palle was a “criminal” suggestion to break prison rules. Up to this time, Palle had always followed prison rules and had never once complained about anything. Reiter suggested to a hypnotized Palle that, in the afternoon, he would feel overwhelmed, tired, and irritable, with no appetite for his supper, followed by words to the effect that: “Your food will look unappetizing. It smells rotten. You tell the prison guard that. He will probably insist that there is nothing wrong with your food. Then you start to get angry. You will speak rudely to the guard and quickly become even more angry. You say the most insulting words you can think of to him and become absolutely enraged. You would like to punch him, but you don’t dare do that. Instead you grab up the plate of disgusting food and throw it on the floor. After doing that, you become more calm. You start to feel sorry for what you have done.”

[1] A modern hypnotist giving posthypnotic instructions for a later phone induction usually tells the subject to remain upright and continue holding the phone to his ear after entering trance on cue. Reiter had not done that.

[2] In 1890, a British medical journal, The Lancet, reported that the Scottish hypnotist, Dr. Bramwell, had prepared a client for difficult dental work by giving certain posthypnotic suggestions. He gave the client’s dentist, Mr. Turner, a handwritten note. On the day of his appointment, the patient arrived at the office of his dentist, Dr.Turner. Turner showed him Bramwell’s note. It read, “Go to sleep by order of Dr. Bramwell, and obey Mr. Turner’s commands.” The pre-set cue worked. The patient fell into a deep trance and felt no pain during the ensuing surgery.

Later that day, back inside his cell, all went just as Reiter had suggested. Palle thought about his situation, and about his parents. He had been locked up in prison three years, so far, this time. He thought about how badly he had treated his parents, how alienated from them he had become. When dinner came, the bread and sausage tasted moldy to him. The milk tasted sour. Palle called the warder and told him that. The warder denied that the bread and sausage were moldy and insisted that milk was not sour. Palle got very angry, called him an idiot, and threw his plate onto the floor, where it smashed. Then he felt calmer and began to feel sorry for what he had done.

Regressions

Reiter was now daily regressing Palle to his life with Nielsen. First, however, each day, he returned him to scenes from his school years, then to early childhood (as young as two). After being confident that he was getting accurate regressions of verifiable events, the doctor would regress Palle to the Nielsen years. Reiter recovered Palle’s memory of experiences with Nielsen in chronological order. Palle’s daily sessions, each hours long, with Dr. Reiter continued for fifteen months. He did over a hundred regressive dramatizations of his experiences with Nielsen.

Reiter wanted to know every hypnotic method that Nielsen had used, everything he had told Palle under hypnosis which had helped to shape him into a hypnorobot. He wanted to know Palle’s state of mind at each stage in the planning of each robbery.

During the regressions, Palle usually lay motionless with the characteristic masklike, expressionless face of deep trance. A dramatic exception to that was when Palle remembered emotional events. Then, his expression displayed intense emotion, such as panic-stricken fear. The doctor noted that reliving deep feelings also made Palle’s respiration and pulse rate increase. Sometimes he trembled. Sometimes his face and hands broke into a cold sweat.

Palle’s waking voice was alert and fluent. But, when hypnotized and regressed, it sounded “weak, monotonous, almost ghostly...strangely passive...[except when] a frightened shout or scream.” (Reiter, 1958, p. 159) Palle relived old conversations as if a videotape of that event were playing in his brain. He remained silent during moments when another person was speaking. At such times, Reiter felt as if he were listening to somebody talking on the phone.

When Reiter instructed Palle to say what the other person said, Palle imitated their manner of speaking as well as reproducing their words, speaking the part of each person in authentic tone and cadence. Reiter soon could recognize Palle’s representation of Nielsen’s deep voice and endless hammering in of programming suggestions.

Guarantee Truthful Regression—Dr. Reiter made sure that Palle’s regressions were the most authentic sort: “I am there,” rather than “I was there.” He would hypnotize him, specify the day and time of day he was to regress to, then say:

> You will experience all you went through on that day, in every detail. You do not only dream it, nor remember it, you really experience it, you are in the middle of it. You will tell me exactly what you do. (Reiter, 1958, p. 101)

He told Palle not to add or leave out anything. He gave strong suggestions, at the start of each trance, designed to punish the slightest deviation from truth:

> ...if he was guilty of giving a false account or if he diverged a hairsbreadth from the truth he would be seized by a feeling of terror...He would be panic -stricken with fear, his heart would thump violently and he would begin to sweat and tremble. He would also feel pain at the root of his tongue. His tongue and his voice would fail him and he would be incapable of saying anything coherently. He would feel as if his neck were being twisted and he was being strangled. (Reiter, 1958, p. 101)

One day, Reiter tested his truth-guaranteeing mechanism by suggesting to a hypnotized Palle that he had just told a lie. Palle's pulse began to race. Groaning and sweating, Palle managed to say, "I can't get any air. I can't speak. My tongue's all stiff."

When the day came that Palle was to relive the first bank robbery, Reiter gave an additional suggestion. If Palle did not tell the exact truth, he would feel the panic of his guardian spirit leaving him. [It probably was not smart to echo and reinforce any of Nielsen's conditioning.]

The police checked all verifiable details in the memories which Palle recovered under rehypnotization. All were confirmed.

Suggested Autobiography - Every time he hypnotized Palle, Dr. Reiter gave the prisoner a posthypnotic suggestion to write down everything he remembered of his visit to the doctor after he was returned back to his cell. Therefore, Palle recorded a series of puzzling encounters beginning with "Hello, how are you?" and maybe a short preliminary conversation—followed by the saying of good-bys. He never remembered being hypnotized. He never remembered anything that happened while he was hypnotized.

Dr. Reiter also suggested, every day, that his subject would write a chronological history of his life with Nielsen. He told Palle that memories would pour into his mind, that he would relive it all again, seeing everything clearly. Reiter encouraged Nielsen's victim to write these memories down. He said that the writing would relieve the pressure of them. So Palle wrote every day for months, every detail of his experiences as Nielsen's hypnotic subject. He always believed that the writing was his own idea—just a means to relieve the pressure and unburden himself of that troublesome history.

As with the regressions, Reiter gave Palle posthypnotic suggestions designed to prevent his subject from deviating in the least from the truth, or embroidering his experience the tiniest bit, while writing his autobiography. Reiter threatened that, if Palle strayed from the true facts of his case, his hand would cramp. It would refuse to write any more, and its writing would become illegible. Reiter also said that, if Palle's memory was unclear on some point, he would state that fact plainly.

Palle now consciously recognized that Nielsen's "spiritual exercises" were really hypnotic conditioning. He now knew that Nielsen had regularly hypnotized him for four years before the robberies, that he had deliberately trained him to commit crimes by means of desensitizing visualizations under hypnosis, and that Nielsen had given specific suggestions under hypnosis which caused him to commit the robberies and murders for which he would soon be on trial.

Palle now made statements regarding that history which were very different from those made when he was first arrested. Then, he had claimed he committed the crimes all by himself and for the sake of his "mission." Now, he said that Nielsen was identical with X; and the crimes had happened because of Nielsen's orders; and that being freed from Nielsen's influence made him able to know and say that truth.

Palle's autobiography, written because of Dr. Reiter's suggestions, gave a completely different version of events than what Palle had first told police. Reiter called it Palle's "exercise book confession." The psychiatrist planned to enter it as new evidence in the case. Reiter had heard and seen Palle's relivings during hypnotic regressions, and read the autobiography. The doctor now clearly understood exactly how Nielsen had captured and enslaved his cellmate's mind. He hoped to make those events equally clear to court personnel.

Palle, however, did not yet know all that the doctor knew about those past events in his life. Dr. Reiter had routinely hypno-instructed Palle that, while writing, those past events would seem very far away, vague, foggy, and emotionally unconnected to him. Accordingly, although Palle had now regurgitated all the facts which his unconscious knew onto paper, for Reiter and for the record, and he consciously understood some essential facts about that history, Nielsen's victim had not yet intellectually integrated all the intellectual and emotional reality contained in those pages.

When the trial began, Reiter still had not allowed Palle to consciously remember the specific details of what had happened in his years with Nielsen.

Trial Preliminaries

Nielsen always hoped for, and looked for, opportunities to renew his hypnotic control of Palle, reinforce the old hypnotic conditioning of his subject, and to add new conditioning designed to get the guru off the hook. October 9, 1952, Dr. Reiter, again, demonstrated Palle's hypnoskills

Palle's Dreams

Reiter also used posthypnotic suggestion to make Palle remember dreams and write them down when he woke up. (He recorded several hundred.) Sometimes the doctor suggested he dream on a particular theme, or of certain persons. Palle always obeyed, always believed it was all his own idea.

When Reiter said to dream about Nielsen. Palle dreamed he was in his childhood room at home. A big plane flew over very low, then > ...with a frightful crash came down on top of a low garage just outside our window...I was quite paralyzed...the plane and the garage were completely wrecked...I heard another machine droning overhead. The next moment it was down on top of the first, if anything with a worse crash than before. I found the situation quite terrible. I was completely knocked out by it...I was shaken to the core...Some time after the third plane droned over. I knew that it would crash just like the two before it, but there was nothing I could do. I was paralyzed with horror while I waited for the crash. It was like a nightmare.

> The crash came as I had expected. I was completely beside myself. Shortly afterwards a fourth plane appeared and the same thing happened again...our house was on the direct route of all planes approaching the airport...
>
> Suddenly they [the police] arrested me for being the cause of the whole series of accidents...they found in a cupboard a tiny instrument which I had once constructed and later put away and thought no more about...It was quite a small innocent looking instrument which I had once made as an experiment...It was really nothing more than a toy made to amuse myself.
>
> As they produced it from the cupboard everything suddenly became clear to me. I realized, all of a sudden, that it was my instrument which had caused the planes to crash. It has since been found out by experiments that, besides the function that the instrument was constructed for, it had another function. Under certain circumstances it caused airplanes to crash if they came within a certain radius. I knew nothing about this, and only recently has science found out about this secondary function. It was, in fact, not my invention at all.
> At this point I woke up, and I had to sit up and get my breath before I could go to sleep again."

Nielsen does not openly appear in the dream, but, as in real life, he is the unseen, powerful agent behind all the destruction. The "toy" symbolizes the original hypnotic training that Palle allowed Nielsen to do to him. Palle was so deceived. He thought the trances were no more than a toy, made to amuse himself. The "other function," which Reiter's "experiments" had shown the instrument had, was exploitative mind control.

Dr. Reiter asked Palle what he thought the dream meant.

Palle said, "Bjorn and all that he has done to me."

Reiter asked, "How did you feel during the dream?"

Palle said, "Wretched and panic-stricken over all the people who were killed."

to legal representatives. Neilsen, his defense lawyers, and their psychiatrist, Dr. Geert-Jorgensen, attended. (Reiter had recommended Geert-Jorgensen to Nielsen's lawyers because that psychiatrist firmly believed in the dogma of moral integrity—that no one can be caused to act against their morals by means of hypnosis.)

The show began with Reiter giving Palle his induction cue. Then the doctor pointed out to the observers the subject's instant shift into a state of profound trance as a result of perceiving the cue. Then he brought Palle out of trance to display the prisoner's total amnesia for having been hypnotized and for all events occurring while he was hypnotized. Then he cued Palle back into trance again. During that immersion, he made Palle regress and relive various criminal episodes. Here is the court transcriber's record of Palle's relived thoughts as he bicycled toward the bank where he would, in a few moments, attempt robbery and commit murder:

> Subject: "I've got the pistol in my bag. It's loaded...Well this is it...get it over quickly...then it's all right...(moaning slightly)...Oh! It's the usual thing. Why the devil have I got a body that has to put up resistance every time I'm going to do anything? Now (signs of violent affect)—(groans)... I can't do it....I lean the bicycle up outside—that's right—Now it's just a matter of three brisk steps."
> Dr. Reiter: "How do you feel?"
>
> Subject: "I'm rather nervous..."
>
> Dr. Reiter: "Why don't you like it?"
>
> Subject: "...It is the physical resistance."
> Dr. Reiter: "Physical resistance?"
> Subject: "The body resisting the will...it is only something to be conquered. It can be conquered...it must be conquered." (Reiter, 1958, p. 154)

Nielsen exuded an attitude of arrogant self-confidence while he sat and watched Palle's reliving. The criminal hypnotist acted as if he were one of the lawyers, instead of a man about to be tried for causing robbery and murder by means of a mind-control technology. Nielsen denied that Palle could be deeply hypnotized. He denied that the subject was deeply hypnotized in that moment.

Dr. Reiter said to Nielsen, "You may use any depth test."

Nielsen sharpened one end of a match stick. He cruelly shoved it far up under one of Palle's fingernails. Blood spurted. But Palle revealed no awareness of his injury, no sign of pain. Nielsen's lawyer, Geert-Jorgensen, and the guru himself had to agree it looked as if Palle really was in deep trance.

Throughout Palle's interrogations and trial, Nielsen (like Adam) cold-bloodedly exploited every opportunity to make himself look good, and to get Palle convicted. Smugly enacting his role of the falsely accused man, Nielsen energetically defended himself. His behavior was

> ...typical of the professional, criminal hypnotizer...It corresponded closely to the attitude displayed by the criminal protagonist in the famous Heidelberg case as described by Ludwig Meyer. (Reiter, 1958, p. 184)

Reiter believed that his sealing suggestions, blocking Palle against hypnosis by Nielsen, were effective. He now invited both Nielsen and Dr. Geert-Jorgensen to try to hypnotize Palle. Neither of them could. (Nielsen did not want to succeed.) But even Nielsen's presence and his feeble attempt to hypnotize Palle aroused old conditioning in Palle. He had trouble sleeping that night. He lay awake, feeling afraid and worried. When he slept, he dreamed of Nielsen and X. And the next day he felt very nervous in the presence of Dr. Reiter. Reiter easily restored Palle's calm with a hypnotic suggestion.

November 1, 1952, at a court hearing which Dr. Reiter did not attend, the police, ignorant of the dynamics of hypnosis, seated Palle and Nielsen beside each other. While a witness was being questioned, Nielsen talked to Palle about his duty to X. (We know Nielsen did that because he was overheard.)

After Nielsen reinforced all his old conditioning again, Palle was even more torn by conflict between the opposing sets of programming from the two hypnotists. The next time that Dr. Reiter met with Palle, he was in such an obvious state of wretchedness, more nervous and tense than ever before, that Reiter asked him what the problem was. Palle was amnesic for his encounter with Neilsen, but he did know that, after his court appearance, he had begun to hear X's voice again. He said he could not sleep. When he did sleep, he had agonizing dreams in which X appeared, the world ended, and he was damned forever.

Reiter gave his induction cue, "P." It almost did not work. Finally, he got Palle hypnotized. It took Reiter ten days to return Palle to his normal calm and to get their hypnotic rapport back to normal. Reiter repeated suggestions, over and over, meant to weaken all ideas associated with X in Palle's mind and to prevent Nielsen from ever again influencing him.

Palle's defense lawyer and Nielsen's defense team were adversaries.[1] For two years, Palle's lawyer—although he was merely the court-appointed defense for an indigent criminal—had carefully researched unethical hypnosis. He frequently consulted with Dr. Reiter about the facts of Palle's history as they emerged in the regressions. He attended all three demonstrations of somnambulist Palle which Reiter gave.

Nielsen's defense team now managed to divest Palle of this excellent lawyer. Nielsen whined to the judge that he had confided too much in Palle's lawyer. He claimed to now realize that it would threaten his own case if that lawyer continued to represent Palle. The court accepted Nielsen's argument. Just before the trial, they stripped Palle of his well-informed lawyer and assigned a new one to him. The newcomer had only a couple weeks in which to prepare to argue one of the most technically unfamiliar and complex legal cases to ever enter the Danish court system.

Psychological Reports and Grief —April 30, 1953, Dr. Hojer-Pedersen (Reiter's assistant), retested Palle with the TAT. He reported that Palle now felt guilt for what he had done—and anger about what Nielsen had done:

> He is passive, considers himself unfairly treated, primarily by N, through no real fault of his own. He has been hit by others and has himself killed by accident. He has been living in a world which was artificially made up for him, he has been chained up in his own imagination and now is 'tied to the gravestones.'...he has been made a tool of. (Reiter, 1958, p. 82)

Of the 12 M card (the hypnosis picture in the TAT series), Palle said, "This is hypnosis." He attributed evil, profit-making intentions to the hypnotist. Looking at the picture made him feel anger. He said he wanted to give the old scoundrel pictured on the card a good shaking. His general responses showed optimism about the future despite dark shadows remaining from past events. He felt like Dr. Reiter had opened a window to the real world, to which the doctor belonged, through which fresh air now blew on him. He visualized Reiter as light which entered, and passed through, him.

Palle pictured his unconscious conflict between Reiter's present hypnotic control of him and Nielsen's former hypnoprogramming in imagery. He was standing on the edge of a mountain gorge. It was an endless abyss which plunged down and down. Dr. Reiter was struggling, using all the abilities he had, to influence Palle to come away from that edge. Although the doctor's approach was calm and scientific, emotionless, Palle said that he expected Dr. Reiter to win the battle.[2]

Dr. Hojer-Pederson reported that he found no signs of insanity in Palle and dwindling interest in religion and politics. He credited Palle's "ambivalent, but momentarily strongly positive dependence upon Dr. Reiter..." (Reiter, 1958, p. 86) as the cause of the changes. He noted Palle's keen sense of justice.

Just before the trial commenced, Reiter combined his observations of Palle's regressions, dreams, and other behavior, and Palle's autobiography, into a final, thorough report, consisting of 366 typed pages. He delivered this book-length tome to the court on June 15, 1953 (two years and three months after Palle's arrest). The gist of his report was that the true cause of Palle's criminal acts, the true perpetrator of them, was Nielsen.

The court took three weeks to read it. On July 6, they held another hearing. At this one, both Palle and Nielsen were present—again seated side by side. Nielsen murmured to Palle about what X wanted. The court declared that Nielsen and Palle would each be allowed to read Reiter's report, for one week.

Reiter planned and carried out his clinical strategies with icy detachment from Palle, the victim. He fought like a cool, but determined, chess master, again and again, before the court on Palle's behalf. Reiter's efforts were tightly focused on winning the case. He was a police psychiatrist, not a therapist. His job was to discover, demonstrate, and prove the truth about what Nielsen had done to Palle.

Now, however, Dr. Reiter recognized that Palle's state of mind must be part of his strategy. Reiter, who knew Palle better than anybody else (except perhaps Nielsen), therefore, asked the court for an opportunity to prepare Palle psychologically, before the prisoner saw the psychological report. He warned them that, without supportive preparation, Palle's mental condition could be damaged and his hypnotic cooperation affected by the shock of what it contained. Reiter explained that he had maintained the hypnotic repression of Palle's memory for details of his abuse by Nielsen. Despite the fact Palle had written them all down, Palle did not yet know them.

Nielsen, on the other hand, was pressuring the judge to turn over Reiter's report immediately. Reiter's appeal for delay was denied. Nielsen's request for immediate release of the report was accepted.

Reiter then asked that the release of Palle's copy be delayed, until he could psychologically prepare him. But the judge reasoned that justice required that Palle be treated exactly the same as Nielsen. That request was also denied.

[1] Nielsen's defense "team" may have been supported, in whole or in part, by persons who were interested in protecting the legal position of hypnotists.

[2] Research has shown that emotion is a component which tips associated programming toward a dominant status.

Reiter tried yet again. He asked the court to allow him to continue seeing Palle for therapy. He argued that maintaining their hypnotic relationship would prevent "relapse into the psychosis" (he meant a recovery of control over Palle by Nielsen and reinforcement of all the tragic X programming). Reiter said that his hypnotic relationship with Palle was not stable. He feared that, if it was not maintained, it could fade, or be eroded by Nielsen's influence. Reiter argued that therapy would maintain their hypnotic rapport, which might be needed if new problems came up which needed to be dealt with by hypnosis.

Nielsen's lawyers slammed back, asking the court to prevent Palle from having any more contact with Dr. Reiter—except for the two demonstrations already scheduled (to show Palle's new lawyer how hypnosis works). The court again ruled for Nielsen. It barred Reiter from talking to Palle until two days before the next demonstration (scheduled to be held in one month).

As a result of all those rulings, one day a police official handed Dr. Reiter's very long, icily clinical, and excruciatingly detailed report to Palle Hardrup. Palle was told that he had only one week to read the report. He had been given no advance preparation. He had no option of talking over its contents and how they made him feel with Reiter. In order to get through that thick stack of pages in one week's time, Palle had to read Reiter's chilly, convoluted prose every waking hour, plus far into the night hours he normally would have used for sleep. (After reading it, Palle discovered that he could not sleep, even when he tried.)

Before Palle saw the report, all he remembered of his hypnotic sessions with Reiter were the hellos and good-bys. Before he saw the report, he thought that writing the autobiography was his own idea. He thought the dreams he had were spontaneous productions. Before he read the report, Palle did not know he had fallen in love with Bente because of hypnotic suggestion. He did not know that he had given his fiancee for sex to Nielsen for the same reason. He did not know that he had visualized robbing and killing—even murdering his own mother. He did not know that Reiter would call him a repressed homosexual who was unconsciously in love with Nielsen.

As Palle read Reiter's report, page after page, he writhed with shameful, painful realizations. Not once in the report did Reiter give any impression that he might actually like Palle. Palle now knew the process by which Reiter had manipulated Palle into unconsciously relating to the doctor as if he were Palle's parent.

Was it possible that all Reiter had really wanted was just mind-control over him, so that the police psychiatrist could prove that he could manipulate Palle just like Nielsen had done? Palle was enduring a simultaneous harsh stripping away of all the illusions about the supposed friendship and respect Dr. Reiter felt for him. Reality, as Palle had imagined it, again, was revealed to have been grossly distorted. Again, the distorting had been done by a hypnotist. This time, the hypnotist was Dr. Reiter.

At the same time that harsh facts were eroding his attachment to Dr. Reiter, the report was stimulating Nielsen's latent conditioning in him. Reiter had wanted to prepare Palle with a blocking suggestion to the effect that reading those inductive words would not affect him. He was reading Nielsen's verbatim hypnotic suggestions from the very beginning of the guru's predations until their recent encounters, just as he had regurgitated those words from his unconscious memory under rehypnosis by Dr. Reiter.

Reading page after page of his transcribed relivings of Nielsen seances drenched Palle's mind once again with Nielsen words, Nielsen inductions—all the old X patter, X threats, and X promises. This flood of Nielsen words, Nielsen memories, Nielsen events, and X, X, X, stirred up elements of his former intense relationship with the guru. Nielsen had terribly abused Palle. He had been cruel and exploitative, but he had never ignored or abandoned him. Dr. Reiter (due to Nielsen and the court) had now disappeared from Palle's life.

Forced first by the barbiturate, then by conditioning, Palle had shifted the bizarre, deep love and loyalty, called hypnotic rapport, from Nielsen to Reiter. Despite those tormenting realizations, Palle now remained loyal to Dr. Reiter. He kept the X threat at bay, fought to stay out of the abyss.

After reading the report, Palle could not sleep. He desperately needed sleep, but sleep would not come. He thought about Bente. She had faithfully and regularly visited him in prison ever since his incarceration and, once, the thought of her had comforted him. In his weary mental ramblings, her image now blurred and transformed into a leering Nielsen face. He couldn't make it turn back into Bente.

When he did sleep, it was worse than the insomniac imagery. Terrifying, dramatic dreams of X frightened him. One night X, in a dream, ordered Palle to follow him again, back to that long ago day when he had first showed himself to Palle in a precious, strengthening vision. Then X was forcing him to obey: OBEY X. Palle tried to fight. He was trying to move his legs in bed, but the more he tried, the heavier they got. Then suddenly, half-dazed, he turned and looked into X's very face, and then he trampled it! His limbs had finally moved to accomplish that. He stomped and stomped upon the face of his god.

When Palle awoke from that dream, he desperately wanted to talk to Dr. Reiter. He asked to see him. The warder informed him it was forbidden. Palle held on, knowing he was scheduled to see the doctor again in a few days to prepare for their next demonstration.

When Reiter finally saw Palle again, he was shocked at the changes in him. Palle explained that, ever since reading the report, he had become more and more unhappy, anxious, scared, depressed, and confused. Reiter gave the induction cue, "P." It took him ten seconds to get Palle into deep trance instead of the usual less-than-a-second. Once Palle was in trance, Reiter suggested that he would have no more frightening dreams.

Then the doctor shifted to preparing Palle for the coming demonstration. It would be attended by Nielsen's lawyer and other court personages. Reiter repeated previous threatening suggestions meant to prevent any deviation from the truth. Right then, Dr. Reiter believed the most important thing he could accomplish for Palle was to win the legal case by displaying the utter totality of Palle's somnambulist obedience.

Reiter Loses Hypno-Control—Two days later, July 23, 1953, Palle was brought into a room where Reiter, Palle's new lawyer, Nielsen's old ones, and other legal personnel awaited him. Palle looked even more nervous this day than the last time Dr. Reiter had seen him. The prisoner was pale, sweating, tense, and ill at ease. Reiter asked if his suggestions under hypnosis had helped. Palle said they had helped at first, but then he had gone back to feeling upset. Palle handed Reiter a note he had written to him in his cell. Reiter read:

> I simply shall not be able to stand it much longer. I feel as if my soul is hanging in shreds. My thoughts continually revolve round X-N, myself, the report and everything that has happened... (Reiter, 1958, p. 178)

Reiter shoved the paper into his pocket. The observers were restlessly awaiting action. He had no time or legal option to give therapy—or even friendship. It was time for the demonstration to begin. Reiter spoke the cue, "P." Once again, it was a long ten seconds before Palle entered deep trance.

Reiter began the show. He suggested paralysis of various parts of Palle's body (catalepsy), then urged him to try to move that part. Palle could not. He stretched him out between two chairs stiff as a board. He suggested numbness, then inflicted pain on various parts of Palle's body to demonstrate the successful anesthesia.

Reiter then told his hypnotic robot that, when he was next awakened, he would be completely blind and deaf. Palle awoke unable to see or hear. He was obviously terrified, unable to comprehend why his dominant senses were not working (because of the amnesia). Reiter reinducted. He suggested a vivid positive hallucination, then a series of negative ones. Then Reiter snapped Palle in and out of trance, over and over, to settle an objection made by one of Nielsen's lawyers, and to demonstrate the subject's complete and spontaneous amnesia for all trance events. Then he put Palle through another series of obedience tests under hypnosis. Reiter suggested to Palle that, after he awakened him the next time, Palle would remember what had happened. He did.

Reiter snapped Palle back into trance. He told the observers he would next demonstrate posthypnotic suggestions. He said to Palle, "After I wake you up, you will see Nielsen seated in a chair beside you, talking to you." He woke up Palle. Palle was distressed to "see" Nielsen. "You didn't tell me he was coming today!" he protested to Reiter.

Still carrying out Reiter's posthypnotic suggestions, Palle conversed with the imaginary Nielsen, who was behaving absolutely in character. The hallucinated image of Nielsen made the X sign at Palle. It said, "X wants you to follow him again."

As Palle tried to fight against the invisible image's power over him, the audience stared. They heard Palle insist to thin air, "It's no use. We're finished. Go! I won't do it. I won't have anything to do with it. Stop!" (Reiter, 1958, p. 179) The image did not stop pressuring Palle to follow X again. Emotion contorted Palle's face as he struggled against the repeated X signs. The fascinated onlookers watched Palle's agony as he resisted the phantom Nielsen.

Seeing that he was scoring impact on the observers by means of the emotion generated in Palle, Reiter decided to give them even more emotion. He rehypnotized Palle and ended the Nielsen hallucination. He said, "At the bottom of your mind there is, at this moment, a particular feeling." He took Palle through a series of intensification steps: realizing the feeling, becoming clear about what it was, slowly feeling it become stronger and stronger, on up to feeling it "completely overwhelmingly."

Reiter gave this series of suggestions with secret confidence about what the outcome would be. He had put Palle through exactly the same hypnotic routine several times before. Every time, Palle had responded by saying how much he hated Nielsen because of all the suffering and damage his cellmate's hypnosis had caused him. Reiter wanted the assembled legal representatives to hear Palle make that impassioned declaration once again.

As Reiter had expected, the watchers now saw Palle, as a result of the doctor's suggestions, undergo a dramatic change of aspect. Violent emotion surged up in him. His face grimaced with pain and fear, then turned ghastly pale. His body broke into a cold sweat. His breathing became fast and shallow.

Reiter did not understand that Palle was off the script. In deep trance, his subject was experiencing a powerful, spontaneous hallucination. This time, the intensifying emotion he was feeling was not hatred for Nielsen. It was the powerful attraction of the X hypnoprogramming in his mind which Reiter's suggestions were intensifying.

Palle was now in the grip of a spontaneous visualization. At the edge of the fathomless abyss which he had first seen in his nightmare, he was struggling, wrestling with the dark angel, trying desperately not to be pulled over the edge into that bottomless, lightless chasm.

"Now, tell me what you feel!" Reiter said.

Palle, who was feeling the most extreme emotion neurologically possible, said nothing.

Reiter prompted, for the edification of the audience, "Is it Nielsen?"

Palle finally groaned hoarsely in response, "No, it's X!" (Reiter, 1958, p. 179) As Reiter had suggested, the terrible emotions in Palle were still steadily increasing in intensity. Suddenly, Palle screamed, "No!"

"What is it?" Reiter asked.

In a state of extreme terror, Palle yelled out, "I MUSTN'T DO IT!"

In the vividly hallucinated drama, he still struggled at the edge of that abyss. He now understood that the dark cavity was not only a concrete reality of terrible danger if he fell in; it was also a metaphor for an equally real state of eternal damnation. Over that edge lay an everlasting hell. He was on the edge, fighting with X, and X was trying with his every wile and strength to pull Palle over that edge, down into the abyss.

Reiter calmly asked, "What mustn't you do?"

Palle did not answer. Reiter made more ineffectual tries to participate in this hypno-scenario gone awry. Palle remained occupied by terrifying images of his struggle with X (who was now trying to push him over the edge of the cliff). Palle shrieked to X, "LET ME GO!"

Reiter asked, "Who is it that must let you go?"

All the doctor heard for the next several minutes was Palle's heavy breathing, as he remained in the grip of the deep trance visualization. Reiter was becoming concerned. He hastily said, in as confident a tone as he could muster, "You know that my influence is stronger than anyone else's." He gave calming suggestions, trying to undo his previous suggestions that Palle would experience maximal emotion.

Now, however, Dr. Reiter's words had no effect on Palle. The subject continued sunk in trance and totally distraught. He was still engaged in that terrible life and death struggle against the power of X. In the background, Palle now sensed that a friend, rushing to help him in that deadly combat, was near at hand. But now the doctor's effort was no use, too late. Palle suddenly struggling up ward from the hypnotic couch on which he lay, crying out, "Let me go. No!"

And then X caught Palle in one last horrible embrace and the god flung him over the edge of the abyss into the deep darkness.

As he fell, Palle yelled out, "Help! Help! HELP!" But he still fell, and fell, down and down, deeper and deeper. As Palle fell, he saw the figure of Reiter again. Now the Reiter image was near the image of X. Palle fell on, down into hell. As he fell, he watched the two figures, X and Reiter, come closer and closer until they touched, melted into one another, and merged into one image! Then he knew! X and Reiter were the same!

In that moment, Palle had realized that he was fighting Dr. Reiter as well as X! What had come together and became identified as one in his unconscious was Nielsen-as-hypnotist and Reiter-as-hypnotist.

Both hypnotists had forced their way into his susceptible mind. Both had gouged a groove of conditioning there by returning again and again to demand absolute obedience from his automatistic sector of mind. Both had made him do things he was not consciously aware of. Both had made him endure things to which he would never have consciously submitted. At that moment, Palle's unconscious mind saw no fundamental difference between Nielsen, the lowlife criminal exploiter who had used it to rob banks and get money, and Reiter, the high-class psychiatrist who had just used it to demonstrate his slick and powerful hypnotic techniques.

Then Palle woke up from the trance. He woke up on his own initiative, not because he had been ordered to wake up. He woke up because he wanted to wake up! He awoke, and then he burst into violent sobs.

Dr. Reiter sat beside Palle a while, murmuring reassuring things, but really he did not understand at all what had just happened inside Palle. After a bit, Palle did calm down some.

The legal observers had waited patiently through all this. Now that Palle was calmer, Reiter wanted to finish his demonstration. He gave the cue again, "P."

IT DID NOT WORK! Instead of instantly dropping into an unconscious trance state as Reiter had expected, Palle did just the opposite (conversion reaction). He jumped up from the couch, and stood trembling in front of Reiter in a hyperalert state of tremendous agitation. His expression was furious and threatening. His eyes flashed with rage. He appeared so near to attacking the doctor that the two police officers who were close rushed forward, seized him, and tried to force him to lie back down on the couch—to again become the passive hypnotic subject everybody was accustomed to viewing.

Palle successfully resisted all their attempts to make him lie down on that couch, fighting with superhuman energy and skill. More police surged in and joined the fray. Even eight of them could not hold Palle down on the leather cushions. Suddenly, he pulled loose from all their grasping hands. He rushed out of the demonstration room into an adjacent hallway. There, he stopped and stood, trembling and breathing hard.

Dr. Reiter signaled the police to stay back. He walked up to Palle and said calming things. Palle gradually relaxed. After a while, he agreed to return to the demonstration room.[1]

Dr. Reiter asked Palle to lie down on the couch again. Palle now obeyed. Dr. Reiter did not try saying "P" again. Instead, he pulled a hypodermic needle out of his medical bag, filled it with Evipan, and shoved the needleful into Palle. Reiter had not used barbiturate on Palle since he had first used it to break through Nielsen's sealing suggestions two years earlier. The barbiturate went into Palle's bloodstream and he became narcotized. But all the old hypnotic conditioning was now broken, gone. Palle was narcotized, but not narcohypnotized. Even the drug could not get Palle into an amnesic trance.

The Evipan did, however, calm Palle enough that he could explain to Reiter what had happened to him: the visualization at the edge of the abyss of damnation, the struggle with X on its edge, the falling, and the merging of the X and Reiter images.

At first, Reiter just could not believe it. He asked, "But you don't now think I'm still merged together with X, do you? You can tell me apart from X, can't you?"

"No," Palle said. "I can't."

Reiter argued with him.

Palle stuck with his new conviction. "You are the same," he insisted.

"That's not logical," Reiter said.

Palle agreed, "It's not logical." Then he explained, "It's not logic but my soul that's speaking, my soul which is in shreds. It is my unconscious part...and that has nothing to do with logic." (Reiter, 1958, p. 181) (It was not Palle's logical left brain, but his imaging right brain which had, quite literally, drawn that conclusion.)

Dr. Reiter never again could hypnotize Palle. He assumed that Nielsen, also, would never again be able to hypnotize Palle.

Trial and Appeals

Palle's new lawyer had been doing his best to understand the case elements and win Palle's friendship. Like his predecessor, he sincerely cared about his client, even though it was just a public defender job. He stayed on the case for the next two years.

The trial preliminaries were now over. Nielsen was charged with robbery, attempted robbery, manslaughter, and having received stolen money. In Copenhagen Central Criminal Court, a jury would listen to the evidence and decide if Nielsen (married, unskilled worker, age 39) was guilty of having planned the crimes of robbery, attempted robbery, and manslaughter (which were committed by Palle), and of having instigated the commission of those crimes by means of hypnosis. The prosecutors wanted life sentences for both Nielsen and Palle.

Dr. Reiter told the jury how he had overcome Nielsen's sealing suggestions on Palle by using Evipan. He explained the threats he had used to guarantee authentic regressions. He told them the history of how Nielsen had parasitized Palle's mind which he had learned from Palle's relivings under hypnosis.

Nielsen's defense team then set out to prove that Palle was insane, and/or a liar. It continued to deprive Palle, insofar as possible, of legal and psychiatric aid. Nielsen, who had lots of experience in court, only admitted something when irrefutable evidence appeared. He admitted, for example, that Palle had used his bicycle to commit the second robbery. He denied, over and over, having any role in either of the crimes. He insisted that he never had any hypnotic influence over Palle. His testimony was recklessly and impudently untruthful: false alibis, lies, changed statements. He refused to answer unwelcome questions.

[1] Reiter later described the incident as "strikingly in keeping with the collisions between systems of conditioned reflexes described by Pavlov." (Reiter, 1958, p. 29)

> When anyone seemed particularly dangerous to him...he endeavored by all possible means to outmaneuver him and not infrequently with success. (Reiter, 1958, p. 184)

Throughout the trial, Nielsen and Palle were in the courtroom at the same time, but they were not seated together. When not testifying, Nielsen was trying to catch Palle's attention. But Palle would not look in his direction, so Nielsen's body-language Xs were all in vain. Palle stayed calm and self-controlled throughout the trial, even when cross-examined by Nielsen's lawyers—even when his sanity, his truthfulness, and his morals were insulted in the most extreme way by Nielsen's defense lawyers and his defense psychiatrist, Dr. Geert-Jorgensen.

Geert-Jorgensen, the court-paid medical advisor to Neilsen's defense team, was Reiter's psychiatric adversary in the trial. In court, there is no absolute scientific truth in psychology and psychiatry. There is no one true analysis until the judge rules. Geert-Jorgensen insisted that Palle was lying, trying to excuse his bank robberies and murders. He testified that Palle had systematically, deliberately, and consciously invented the story of Nielsen hypnotizing him. He stated that opinion despite the fact that Dr. Reiter had entered the case because of eyewitness accounts of Nielsen hypnotizing Palle. (Palle was insisting at the time that he had done the crime alone). He ignored testimony that Reiter had forced hypnosis on Palle using a drug and then had dragged details of his hypno-abuse by Nielsen out in a hundred painstaking amnesic hypnotic regressions with threat of strangulation if he lied. It said it was only because of Dr. Reiter's suggestions that Palle had written his second confession.

Jorgensen's bottom line was not facts. It was the old dogma of moral integrity—that it is impossible to cause a person to commit a crime by means of hypnosis, unless that person already has a criminal nature. He admitted that Dr. Reiter had induced deep and amnesic hypnosis in Palle hundreds of times. He insisted that fact was irrelevant. He said that Palle was psychotic before he met Nielsen. He said there was no "medical proof" that Palle had ever been hypnotized by anyone before Dr. Reiter. Although he admitted that Reiter had hypnotized Palle, he called Reiter's demonstrations of Palle's somnambulist obedience "doubtful." Similarly, other members of Nielsen's defense team tried every way they could to reject hypnosis in favor of any other possible hypothesis.

Dr. Reiter, if given an opportunity to rebut all those claims by Geert-Jorgensen, undoubtedly would have shredded the claim that Palle had made everything up to shift blame to Nielsen. But Reiter was not permitted to testify again: "Unfortunately the time at the disposal of the court did not allow me to make any rejoinder to Dr. Geert-Jorgensen." (Reiter, 1958, p. 183)

That left Palle's defense up to his lawyer. The attorney explained that hypnosis was Nielsen's chief means of influencing Palle. He pointed out that Nielsen had subjected Palle to hundreds of hypnosis sessions, closely spaced in time. He said that Nielsen's amnesia suggestions had concealed all that conditioning from Palle's conscious awareness, preventing him from defending himself. WhenPalle had carried out posthypnotic suggestions, amnesia had concealed the true source of his ideas and behavior from his conscious knowing. Palle was made unable to know what was true in his thinking, and what was imaginary, what was his own idea and what was an idea covertly implanted in his brain by Nielsen.

Geert-Jorgensen's unrebutted claims strongly affected persons in the courtroom who naively believed that "experts" always know what they're talking about and always tell the truth in a courtroom. His "expert testimony" influenced the judge's charge to the jury and also the prosecutor's final speech to them. Both judge and prosecutor stressed that the jury should not regard the case as being about hypnotism. The prosecutor argued that although, in reality, hypnosis was the center of this case, it was not so in legality.[1]

July 17, 1954, the jurors delivered their verdict. They found Nielsen guilty of all charges—robbery, attempted robbery, and manslaughter. They found him guilty of planning the crimes, and of causing Palle to enact the crimes by several means of influence, one of which was hypnosis. Nielsen was sentenced to life imprisonment for robbery and murder even though he was not present at the scene! The jury had determined that serious criminal acts could be caused by a criminal hypnotist's manipulations of a somnambulist subject.

Dr. Reiter was pleased with the verdict. He had felt that the odds were completely against his side. Right up to the end of the trial, Nielsen had racked all the visible wins. Dr. Reiter's hard work had paid off. There was a jury decision based on his evidence—and he had a contract for a book, which would be published both in Denmark and America.

Palle found it harder to see any victory in the trial's outcome. He had been accused of attempted robbery and two murders. Like Nielsen, he had been judged guilty by the jury. They sentenced Palle to life in an institution for the criminally insane.

The case seemed over. Reiter's professional duties were complete.

Palle Teeters on the Brink—Bente had long since given birth to Palle's baby. Palle felt both responsibility and strong love for his little girl. His feelings for Bente, on the other hand, were ambivalent. He felt he owed her a lot. She had faithfully stood by him despite his bad treatment of her. But she was the type of woman that Nielsen was attracted to, not the sort that he himself would have chosen. And he now knew that he had not chosen Bente. He had courted her only because of feeling hypnotically suggested love. He had been fooled into marrying her. He still felt wounded by the premarital adultery which Nielsen had forced on them. He felt like he and Bente were strangers. He did not expect to ever feel love for her again, but he wanted to do the decent thing by her and the baby.

Palle was no longer under Dr. Reiter's observation, and his mail was now unscreened. In November, 1954, Nielsen began to write to him (with many X's). Palle answered each letter. Nielsen asked Palle to change his statement to the court. Palle refused. Nielsen kept writing, kept X-ing, kept trying to reverse Palle's abandonment of X.

Palle wrote back in defense of himself. He vented his rage on Nielsen with savage, passionate fury—and vulgar epithets. (Persons who are in an emotional state—even a mood of rejecting—are far more easily hypnotized than persons who are indifferent to the inductive agent. Palle's intensely emotional, angry responses to Nielsen were evidence that Nielsen still had potential for hypnotic power over him.) Palle's resistance to Nielsen's induction efforts, held firm. He was his own person again.

In January, 1955, Palle began writing an autobiography on his own. He found it far more difficult than before, now that he did not have the motivation of daily hypnotic commands from Dr. Reiter. Nevertheless, he managed to crank out about seventy pages. Both his parents were elderly and in poor health now. The manuscript, many times, expressed concern about them and sorrow for the close, sincere relationship with them which had been destroyed by Nielsen. Palle mourned, "...what a blight it must have cast over their life...to see how I slowly drifted away from them in a strange way that they could neither understand nor do anything about..." (Reiter, 1958, p. 189)

Palle remembered his childhood dream of growing up, making money, and buying them good things. He longed to be out of prison and able to restore their confidence in him, to help them in their old age. But his mother died in the spring of 1955. His father was also ill. He died early in 1956. Palle's human ties, outside his prison unit, were now limited to his bizarre correspondence with Nielsen, his strained relationship with his wife, thoughts of the daughter he scarcely knew, and the remnant of his bonding with Dr. Reiter.

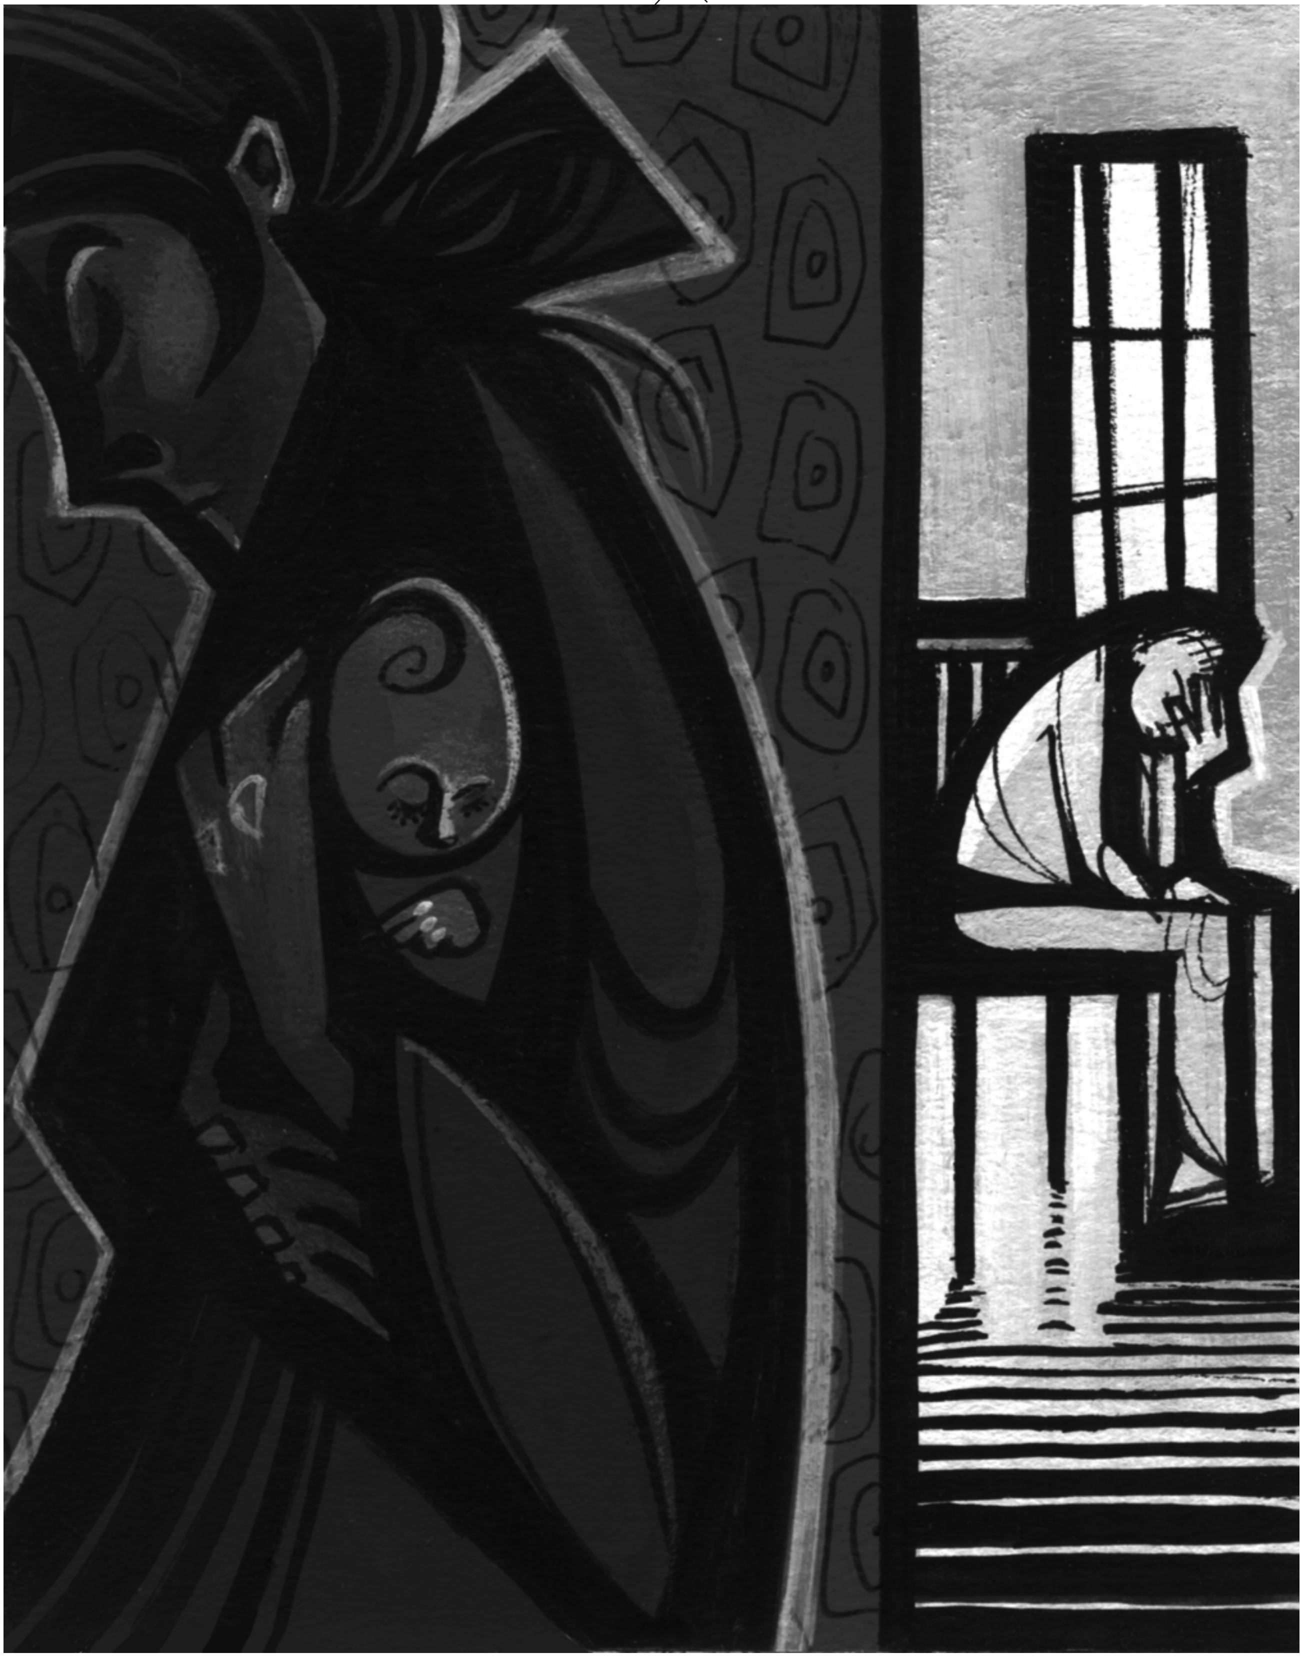
October 12, 1955, Dr. Reiter visited Palle in prison. He was shocked by Palle's state. The prisoner was very tense, very depressed, clearly torn by violently conflicting emotions within himself. On the one hand, he felt that he should accept his life sentence and all its consequences. On the other, he burned with thoughts of its injustice, its failure to reflect the true facts of what Nielsen had done to him. Palle had not yet been moved into the prison for the criminally insane, but he knew that soon he would be sent there. He dreaded the coming shame of that permanent move. He considered it worse than being in regular prison. He told Reiter that he no longer had a future. He also said that he no longer had any religious faith, no hope of any sort.

Palle talked the most about his young daughter. He told Reiter that he had decided it would be best for her if he got out of her life forever. Although the thought of doing so hurt him worse than anything, he was planning to ask Bente to divorce him, change her name, marry again, and raise their child so that no one in the child's life would know that her father was a convicted robber and murderer incarcerated in an asylum for the criminally insane. He added that, for his daughter's protection, he must never see her again. He said that he was truly innocent of the crimes, but that the people in his child's life would never understand that. As he talked to Reiter, Palle trembled with suppressed sobs, and tears flowed from his eyes.

Dr. Reiter could see that Palle was at a breaking point. The doctor knew that the prisoner's future was not as bleak as he thought. Dr. Max Schmidt, Chief Police Psychiatrist, and the Medico-Legal Council were planning to officially advise (soon) that Palle should be transferred from the institution for the criminally insane to a regular mental hospital. From there, they planned a discharge for him (to be followed by several years of psychological supervision).

Reiter longed to comfort Palle with that good news, but since none of it was official yet, the rules did not allow Reiter to tell it to Palle. (Dr. Reiter was a man who always followed the rules.) First, Palle had to go to the institution for the criminally insane and go through their evaluation procedure. The recommendation had to be made official. Then Palle could hear the good news.

In the meantime, Palle broke.



“New Evidence”—Ever since the jury’s decision, perpetual appeals by Nielsen’s legal team (based on his “not guilty” claim) had kept the case in the courts. On November 18, 1955, the Danish Supreme Court unanimously upheld the lower court’s ruling and rejected an appeal for retrial.

To trial watchers, it looked like the end of Nielsen's defense efforts. A few days after the Supreme Court's denial, however, Nielsen's lawyers asked that the case be reopened by the Special Court of Appeal which Danish law allowed when new information appeared after a verdict. Nielsen's lawyers said they had important new information which, if known before, could have resulted in a different decision.

The Medico-Legal Council's opinion on releasing Palle was officially released a few days later, on November 24, 1955, but nobody informed Palle that he was scheduled to soon become a free man.

In the meantime, Nielsen's "new evidence" appeared. December 18, one month after their appeal to reopen the case began, Palle sent a letter to Nielsen's lawyers. Palle did not show that letter to his own lawyer before he sent it. The letter sounded as if it were dictated by Nielsen—or his lawyers. The content can be summed up as follows:

- Palle admitted committing both the robberies and the murders.
- Palle denied that anybody had ever hypnotized him—not Reiter and not Nielsen.
- Palle said that spontaneous hallucinations about being destined to establish a party, unite Scandinavia, and reform society had caused him to commit the crimes. He said those delusions resulted from a mental problem that had since cleared up on its own.
- Palle said he gave Nielsen the position of party treasurer and, therefore, handed over all the money to him, later discovering that Nielsen had succumbed to temptation and spent it on himself.
- Palle said that Nielsen had received stolen goods, but had not in any way instigated his crimes.

On December 21, Palle sent an associated letter to his own lawyer. It asked that the word "hypnosis" be removed entirely from the case.[1]

Palle's lawyer was horrified at this series of letters. He knew they could ruin his client's chance for freedom and rehabilitation. Convinced that Palle's mind had been recaptured by Nielsen, his attorney asked the court to once again provide a psychiatric hypnosis specialist, such as Reiter, to uncover the truth of the matter, and to free Palle's mind again.

When Palle heard what his lawyer had done, he reacted with such fury that his attorney quit. The court appointed a new lawyer for Palle. The new attorney meekly accepted all of Palle's latest declarations about the case. In May, 1956, Palle's new lawyer also filed a request to reopen the case.

Now, both Nielsen and Palle had appealed to reopen the case based on Palle's third version of events, his third on-the-record version of confession. The first "confession" was his post-arrest declaration that Nielsen had nothing to do with the robbery and murders. The second version was his autobiography (written under suggestion), and associated statements—recorded after Reiter helped him recover his memory. The third was in that recent series of letters.

The appeals court now had to decide which of Palle's three confessions was the real one.

Nielsen was writing letters too. He wrote letters to the court saying that all of Palle's old statements about being hypnotized were just ravings. He referred again and again to Palle with exaggerated pity as the "poor psychotic fellow."

Psychological Assessments—Dr. Reiter unhappily observed all these developments from a distance. He was not allowed to talk to Palle now. He followed the developments as best he could. He attended the public court hearings when the case finally came before the Court of Appeal. He noticed that Nielsen's lawyers got Palle's disturbed, angry letters to Nielsen admitted as evidence that Palle was mentally ill. Nielsen's letters to Palle were not admitted. Reiter wondered why not.

In this new trial, Palle testified at length. Dr. Reiter was amazed at how much his former subject's behavior had changed. In previous court appearances, and in his many private sessions with Reiter, Palle had always behaved correctly, like a somewhat nervous, nice, and well brought up young man.

As Dr. Reiter watched the prisoner testify before the appeals court now, however, what he observed most resembled the way Palle was recorded by police observers as having acted when fresh from the murder scene—back when he was full of Nielsen programming. Like then, Palle now was...

> ...aggressive, cynical, impudent, reticent, dishonest, gave explanations which were obviously incorrect and often badly constructed, accused the police of corruption and bribery and refused to

---

[1] If the hypnosis lobby was supporting Nielsen's defense effort, that is the outcome they would want: no hypnotist is culpable, and hypnosis cases are never to be tried as such.] On September 11, 1956, Palle sent his lawyer a second letter. It claimed that he had only pretended to be hypnotized by Reiter.

> make a statement when during the cross examination by the prosecution he found certain questions awkward to answer. (Reiter, 1958, p. 194)

Dr. Reiter no longer had any doubt. He knew that Palle was back under Nielsen's hypnocontrol. Reiter wrote in the notes he was now privately keeping on the case, "His artificially created secondary personality was now plainly dominant." (Ibid.)

The Court of Appeal asked Dr. Sturup, head doctor of the Institution for Psychopaths, where Palle was currently confined, to report on Palle's mental state. Palle refused any examination, even a purely physical one. So Sturup informally observed Palle. He reported that Palle was well behaved, always quiet and appropriate. He pointed out that the prisoner's behavior in the hospital differed curiously from his attitude in the courtroom.

He said that Palle seldom said anything about the legal case but, when he did, what he said contradicted his statements in court! For example, in one personal conversation with Sturup, Palle had said "Of course hypnosis played a part" in what was going on. Another time, Dr. Sturup said to him, "You must have a really atypical personality if you were able to fool Dr. Reiter into thinking you were hypnotized for years when you really weren't." Palle repled, "Anyone ought to be able to see all that is in Reiter's report can't be wrong." Sturup said, "I personally saw you under hypnosis with Reiter and it sure looked to me like you were telling the truth." Palle gave a quick nod of agreement.

Sturup then reminisced to Palle about his letter to Nielsen's defense team, and his testimony before the court. As the doctor talked about those things, he noticed tears had appeared in Palle's eyes. Palle brought his hands up before his face, as if to hide those tears. Then he began to pace up and down the room, in an obvious effort to calm himself. He said, "If Nielsen hadn't been there, it would have gone entirely different."

Dr. Sturup whole-heartedly agreed. He, and many other observers, had noted the influence which Nielsen's presence (with his perpetual making of X signs with his legs or arms) invariably had on Palle.

Sturup transcribed these conversations and concluded his report to the court with a statement that he had observed no symptoms of insanity in Palle.

Although, Dr. Reiter had not been involved with the case for some time, the Court of Appeal now asked him to also assess Palle. Reiter was told to do that based only on the case documents—without meeting Palle in person again. Reiter did as requested. He then reported to the court that Palle's second testimony, the autobiography, was the only true one. With an emotional intensity surprising in that normally stern and restrained professional, Reiter informed the court that Palle's third version of confession was the consequence of:

- The court order instigated by Nielsen's lawyer which prohibited further contact between Palle and Reiter and which denied therapy for Palle, and

- The letters from Nielsen to Palle "which the prison authorities with incredible thoughtlessness allowed." (Reiter, 1958, pp. 197-8) Reiter said those letters had put Nielsen's longtime hypnotic subject at extreme risk of recapture, a risk which soon became fact.

Nielsen Hits Again—After reading Reiter's report, Dr. Sturup immediately halted Nielsen's letters to Palle. Unknown to Sturup, however, a prisoner had just arrived into Palle's unit who had been previously housed in the cell next to Nielsen. Nielsen knew that this man would soon be transferred to Palle's unit. The guru had given him detailed instructions to pass on to Palle: "X says...." The old X programming was long since reinstated in all its tragic automaticity in Palle's mind. So, when Palle heard that X wanted him to give the cash inheritance which he had received from his father's estate to this new resident (who had outing privileges), he did so.

X's plan was for the privileged one to escape from his attendant on the next outing. He was to then use Palle's cash to purchase weapons and a car, and then help Palle himself escape. X had ordered that, after Palle escaped, he was to shoot the hospital's director and the Minister of Justice. (Maybe Nielsen, or his lawyers, had heard that Palle was scheduled to be released.) After Palle handed over his money to Nielsen's newest subject, the new resident did temporarily escape with it. But he was soon recaptured and confessed all. He could clearly remember the plans he had made with Palle. He was fuzzy about Nielsen's role in it all. If Nielsen, or his lawyers, had been unhappy because of hearing that Palle was scheduled to soon be released, they no longer were. Palle's record now looked worse than ever. The Medico-Legal Council's plan to release him was shelved for the time being.

The matter reminded Reiter of Palle's 1949 escape from Horsens prison, on orders of X—and then he had to serve extra prison time which kept him in longer than Nielsen. But Nielsen denied everything, portraying his usual role of abused innocence.

Appeal Denied—The Court of Appeal issued a preliminary report in May, 1957. The Court's evaluation of the situation was that Palle's mental state was "an artificially established, induced psychosis, created and developed through the influence of another person...making use of all the ways and means at his disposal...including hypnosis." (Reiter, 1958, p. 201). It concluded that "induced impulses" (posthypnotic suggestions) had been used by Nielsen to exploit his control over Palle with criminal intent.

A month later, the Court of Appeal held a final three-day hearing. The prosecution studied Palle's three different statements and finally concluded the "most fantastic and unlikely" one, his second, was the only one which definitely matched the evidence. On that basis, the Court rejected both Nielsen and Palle's requests to retry the case.

Nielsen's lawyers later got the case appealed to the European Court of Human Rights, which decided in Nielsen's favor.[1]

Reiter's Book

Reiter's book about the case history of Palle Hardrup and Bjorn Nielsen, Antisocial or Criminal Acts of Hypnosis: A Case Study, was first published in Danish, then translated into English.[2] In addition to reporting Palle's case history, Reiter also reviewed expert research and opinion on unethical hypnosis, from 8th and 19th century European hypnotists who had speculated and experimented with "antisocial hypnosis" up to his own time. He included synopses of Dr. Kroener's case of "Z" and the Swedish Sala case.

American writers who mention this case usually misrepresent it. Aaron Moss (an expert on disguised induction?) repeated the crazy stuff that Palle said at his arrest as being evidence of Palle's mental illness. Moss did not mention that it was programmed in by Nielsen. Moss implied that poor Mr. Nielsen was falsely accused and jailed because of that psychotic Palle and his irresponsible psychiatrist, Dr. Reiter, who generated false testimony in Palle under hypnosis. Moss cited a third-hand "Bech, n.d."[3] as his source of this information. (Apparently, he did not read Reiter's book.) Several American research hypnotists have quoted Moss as being the final word on Palle's case.

Reiter pondered these strident denials of the possibility of unethical hypnosis in the face of so much evidence. He speculated that they were due to preconceived opinion so impervious to reason or evidence that it was best termed "dogma."

> ...the growth of this dogma was due to very human motives, not least on the part of a number of professional hypnotizers...who understandably enough wished to reassure a public likely to be alarmed by the dangerous potentialities of hypnotism. (Reiter, 1958, pp. 38-39)

[1] A British expert, based at Cambridge University, wrote in a legal reference book:

> French and German laws treat it as an instance of absence of mens rea. The argument is that hypnotic suggestion creates a very great compulsion to perform the act. (p. 768)... The question probably depends, in large part, on the extent of dominion attributed to the hypnotist. One opinion favors the view that a hypnotized person cannot be forced to perform acts that are repugnant to him. If this is true, the most that the hypnotist can do in the direction of criminal activity is to remove an inhibition and cause the subject to commit a crime to which he is already inclined. This view is, however, challenged in a recent work by Dr. Heinz Hammerschlag, who concludes from a survey of the evidence that 'there is no basis whatsoever for the view that moral weakness in a hypnotized subject is a condition for the misuse of hypnosis.' It seems, therefore, that there is weight in the opinion of the American Law Institute, that the dependency and helplessness of the hypnotized subject are too pronounced for criminal responsibility. (Glanville Williams, Criminal Law, p. 769)

[2] Reiter's book is the most thoroughly professional and detailed English-language psychiatric study of a case of unethical hypnosis. It is also dense, technical, severely jumbled in chronology, and coolly scientific in tone to the point of feeling inhuman.

Case History: Candy Jones

...public disclosure of some aspects of MKULTRA activity could induce serious adverse reaction in U.S. public opinion...

- CIA Inspector General (Scheflin & Opton, p. 132)

A small box sat on the table. Wires ran from it to her wrist and to her shoulder. They shocked her. It hurt terribly. They shocked her, over and over, and asked question after question about the story of her life and her CIA link. She did not know about any CIA link. The torturers would not believe her. They shocked her again. They asked, "What about Dr. Jensen. Do you know a Dr. Jensen?"

"You've asked me enough. You should know," she groaned. "Why don't you just kill me? Why do you keep me here like this?"

To somebody in Washington, D.C., what those interrogators were doing to Candy Jones was just an experiment to see if the programming of a hypnocourier held up under torture.

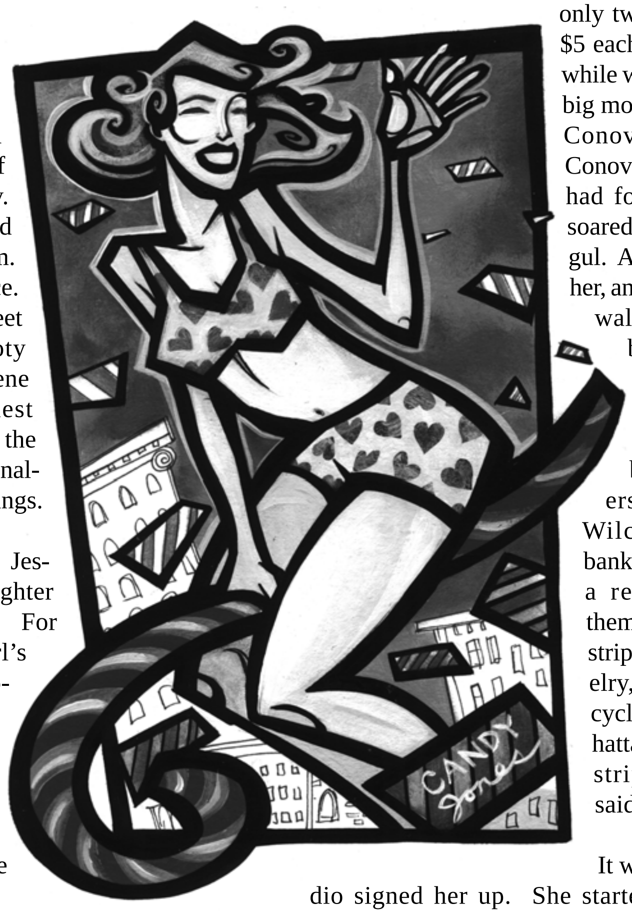
Childhood, Youth, and Career

Candy was born in 1925 (two years after barbiturates first came on the drug market). Her birth name was Jessica Wilcox. Her mother was a homemaker. Her father was a good-looking Polish Catholic who advanced from being a ticket taker (when he met her mother) to being a car salesman in Atlantic City (when he left her mother). Candy was three when Daddy stopped coming home. The mother and her child then went to live with Grandmama in Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania. The year was 1928. Grandmama was wealthy, well educated, pleasant natured, and an osteopathic physician.

Mother taught Jessica to sew, draw, swim, and ride, and use good manners. Dinner was always at five, an occasion for which to dress. During the meal, the little girl could speak only if spoken to. She had books, a cat, a dog, and playmates at their summer home on a lake. In winter, however, only her pets—and sometimes the cook's little girl, Snowflake—played with her. Mother did not allow her to bring friends home from school. They would "mess up the house."

The child loved to play in Grandmama's room, dress up in her clothes, sit in front of her big dressing table. She did that almost every day. The dressing table had pullout mirrors that could surround her on three sides, displaying seven images of little Jessica. One day she played tea party on the dressing table top and invited imaginary friends, the images in the mirror.

She was innocently performing a kind of self-hypnosis. Bright, imaginative children often do. Staring into a mirror invites trance at any age; children and teenagers are most susceptible to induction. You focus. Your mind becomes blank, and there's something about staring closely into eyes. Especially your own.



Jessica's tea party mirror playmates developed into an imaginary "club"—Doty (pronounced Dot-tee, a child's pronunciation of Dorothy), Arlene, Willy, and Pansy. As time went by, she did not need the mirror any more to play with them. Pansy was a good girl, quiet and nice. Willy was a boy who stomped his feet if he could not get his way. Doty tended to fight with Arlene. Arlene was the fastest runner, the highest climber, the strongest swimmer in the club. She had a domineering personality and was always trying to run things.

Grandmama died in 1936. Jessica was eleven. Mother and daughter then moved back to Atlantic City. For the next five years, the young girl's life was uneventful—sheltered, protected, and closely supervised by her mother.

In the wider world, there was war in Europe. Then the Japanese bombed Pearl Harbor, and we were in the war too.

In 1941, Jessica graduated from high school. She wanted to be a doctor like Grandmama, but mother would not pay for her to attend college. Mother told her to go to secretarial school instead. Jessica was not interested.

Candy Jones: Model—In June of 1941, Jessica Wilcox entered the Miss Atlantic City contest. She was the Girl Scouts' candidate. She won. Atlantic City hosted the Miss America pageant at that time. Jessica was not a contestant in the big show, but she marched in the parade and had many hostess duties because she was Miss Atlantic City.

Her long blonde hair, perfect features, tall, long-legged frame, bosomy contour, and sweet disposition attracted attention among the mob of newspaper and media people there to watch Miss America be chosen. The attention turned into an astonishing rush of enthusiastic press attention. By the close of the pageant, Jessica was surrounded by reporters and radio personalities begging for an interview or a photo. One of the contest judges was John Powers, founder of the famous Powers Modeling Agency. He invited her to come to New York and work for his agency.

To her mother's distress, Jessica accepted. She hung around the Powers stable for two weeks, but received only two photo jobs. (The pay was $5 each.) One day, on her off time, while waiting for a friend at the other big modeling agency in town, Harry Conover's, her big break came. Conover was a top male model who had founded his own agency and soared from model to modeling mogul. A photographer walked in, saw her, and spoke of her to Harry. Harry walked out, took a look at the blonde sitting in his reception area, and the magic began.

Conover bought the blonde's contract from Powers. He transformed Jessica Wilcox into Candy Jones, bankrolling a media blitz based on a red-and-white candy-stripe theme. Candy had red and white striped clothing, accessories, jewelry, matchbook covers, and bicycle. Conover showered Manhattan with 10,000 red and white striped business cards which said "Candy Jones Was Here."

It worked. Warner Brothers Studio signed her up. She started getting calls to pose for magazine covers and to appear in glitzy ads for products with big budgets. Her mother gave up on secretarial school for her and moved to New York to live with, and chaperone, Candy.

In 1943, Candy was voted Model of the Year. Loretta Young was a judge on the panel. She said Candy looked like "a real girl." The guys in the trenches also thought so. Photos of the tall blonde in a polka-dot bikini were pinned-up wherever there were GIs. A photo of her in a formal dress stitched from transparent parachute nylon was equally well received.

Candy took acting and voice lessons and won a leading role in the smash Broadway play, "Mexican Hayride," produced by Mike Todd. It ran for eight months. She was the model used on recruiting posters for the new branches of the military in which women could serve—

WACS and WAVES. In one month of that amazing year of 1943, her picture was on the cover of eleven magazines. (Estabrooks published Hypnotism in 1943, a book which urged government use of unknowing hypnoprogrammed agents.)

Lieutenant Candy Jones—The USO offered Candy an opportunity to tour through the Southwest Pacific in a show written around her. She accepted the task of bringing evenings of happiness to weary and homesick GIs fighting in Pacific operations. She became Lieutenant Candy Jones. She began the USO shows in 1944, with a six-month contract, then signed on for another year—a total of eighteen months. While on tour, the beautiful model, performer, stage show manager, and patriot briefly met General Donovan. (He was head of the OSS, a new agency which President Roosevelt had authorized at the beginning of the war for the dual tasks of gathering intelligence and of doing secret scientific research with military applications.)

In April, 1945, Candy was presented with a quart of fresh milk brought by airplane from Australia—a rare luxury in the cowless Southwest Pacific area. She drank it. But the cow had been sick. The milk had not been pasteurized. Candy got undulant fever. With her resistance down from the fever, she also developed active malaria. They put her in a Philippines military hospital. There, from unclean sheets, she caught a third disease: the "jungle rot." The rot was a fungus that made her beautiful blonde hair fall out in clumps. The malaria had given her a greenish-yellow skin tone. She looked terrible, but the New York photographers were far away. The medics right then were worried about keeping her alive.

While sick on Leyte, she encountered a military psychiatrist, "Gilbert Jensen."[1] In August, 1945, after four months of treatment and recuperation, she was well enough to go home. Before she left, Jensen gave her a photo of himself with his APO address written on the back. He asked her to write. She did not.

Back in the States, Candy starred in another Broadway musical, a wig and heavy makeup hiding the ravages of illness. It took eight months more healing before she could pose for photographers again. She married her employer, Harry Conover, on July 4, 1946. Marrying Candy was a good career move for Harry. He did not reveal to her his homosexuality. It took five months to consummate their marriage, but Candy—who was a virgin and not sophisticated—did not understand the problem until years later.

A Telephone Induction—Candy's busy career included many invitations to guest on the big time talk shows of that radio-dominated era. Technology could not yet provide phone interviews with quality sound. Therefore, even for a radio interview, she would have to fly to the broadcast station. In 1946, she accepted an invitation to appear on "Don McNeil's Breakfast Club" in Chicago. (That year, the OSS was reorganized as the CIA with the same two missions: secret intelligence gathering and secret scientific research.) There, Candy met another person who would be important in her hypnoprogrammed future.

Candy flew in the night before the show, registered at the Drake Hotel, and unpacked. Then the chills hit. The Leyte doctor had assured her there would be no more malaria attacks, but this felt like the old nightmare had come back. She went to bed, but the chills got worse. Under a mound of blankets, she was still shivering.

She called a staff employee at the Don McNeil Breakfast Club. He visited her, viewed the situation, and promised a doctor would call. Soon after he left, a doctor, "Dr. Marshall Burger," did call her on the telephone.

This doctor, like "Jensen," is known only by a pseudonym. Burger was a psychiatrist who hobnobbed with big names from both the political and entertainment worlds, especially movie stars. He was "a dynamic, craggy-faced egotist." And he was a hypnotist, "a pioneer and leading authority in the field of medical hypnosis." (Bain, p. 137) There were

> ...government-sponsored experimental programs with which he was closely identified. He'd begun working on such programs during World War II, and was one of the first doctors to probe the potentials of hypnosis as a tool of war. His sponsor for that project was the Central Intelligence Agency. (Bain, p. 137)

As Candy Jones lay alone in her hotel room, shivering under the covers, desperate for relief,[2] Burger talked to her on the telephone. He said he was not able to come see her that night, but that he would drop by the next morning. He told her to count backwards. He said he was trying to relax her. He assured her that, if she would just count backwards, she would stop shaking and fall sleep.

Burger never told Candy that his "relaxation" was a hypnotic induction. At the beginning of his induction routine, Burger did not know whether or not Candy was a naturally good hypnotic subject. A hypnotist never knows for sure until he tries.

[1] "Gilbert Jensen" is the pseudonym which author Donald Bain used for him in The Mind Control of Candy Jones. We know no other name for him.

[2] This incident reveals that the big-time morning talk show of that era, "Don McNeil's Breakfast Club," used a psychiatrist with CIA connections, as its on-call, day or night, physician. When the talk show referred a patient, he was usually a political or Hollywood celebrity, alone in a hotel room, far from home, and feeling lousy. He was sick, due to natural, or unnatural?, causes). The patient was not likely to guess that his doctor was a CIA specialist in covert hypnosis.

Now, he tried. He told her to place the phone on the pillow next to her ear and count down with him. He combined the counting-down induction routine with suggestions that her shaking was stopping, her chills going away, her fever dropping. And sleep, sleep, sleep.

As she counted backwards with Dr. Burger, Candy's chills did diminish. She did feel sleepier, and sleepier, and sleepier. She fell asleep. In the morning, she felt okay. Whatever had caused the problem was now completely gone. She appeared on the Breakfast Club, then flew back to New York. She did not know she had been hypnotized. Burger, however, now knew that Candy Jones was susceptible to hypnosis. (Maybe he told Donovan.)

Marriage Breakup, Money Problems—In 1947, there was trouble inside the Harry Conover Modeling Agency. Other models were complaining that Conover showed favoritism to his wife in assigning jobs. Candy solved that one by opening her own agency right next door to Conover's office in the skyscraper called 52 Vanderbilt Avenue. Soon Candy's agency landed the lucrative Colgate-Palmolive account. She let Harry bill for her agency as well as his, and bank the payments.

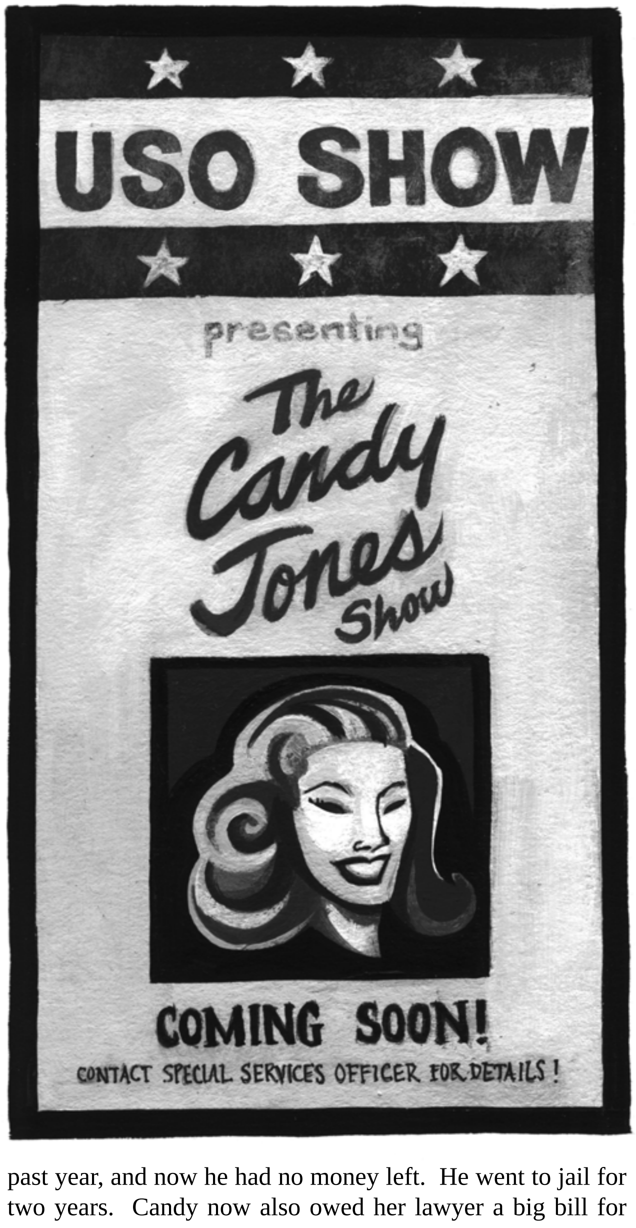
Candy was always working. She toured overseas again, managing a USO show for U.S. soldiers fighting in Korea. She continued her modeling career until time took its natural toll, and the photographers did not call for her any more. She published books about glamour, dress, and fashion—and one about her experiences while touring for the USO during World War II. She gave birth to three sons: Harry, Chris, and Cari.

In 1958, she found out that her husband was bisexual (or maybe homosexual). That explained why he almost never reached out to love her. Soon after that, he disappeared completely. Candy took responsibility for all debts, including the rent on his office and hers. Then, she found out that he had withdrawn all the money from their joint bank accounts. Before he took off, there had been over $100,000 in there. Now there was only $36.

Candy struggled on. She found new sources of income. She began working on the radio, becoming a regular on the popular NBC weekend news program, "Monitor." Through her Monitor news interviews, she met people in the entertainment business, politics, and the military. Though naturally of a quiet nature, Candy maintained a socialite's life-style, going to Broadway openings and working for charities. She traveled a lot in her business, jetting coast to coast to watch fashion shows and give speeches.

Candy wanted her sons to have the best possible education and a stable environment. Since she was working and on the road so much, she enrolled all three of them in an expensive boarding school. She was also supporting her elderly mother, and the woman who looked after her. Without her husband's income, however, all those expenses were soon more than she could afford. After a year of desperate financial struggle, Candy finally took her lawyer's advice and sued Harry Conover for repayment of the money he had absconded with—and for alimony, child support, and divorce.

Her legal case against him made juicy headlines for the New York daily papers. In the end, she won. The judge gave Harry a choice of paying or going to jail. But Harry had been giving lavish parties every night for the past year, and now he had no money left. He went to jail for two years. Candy now also owed her lawyer a big bill for the court case.



CIA Recruits a Courier

Dr. Burger had moved from the Chicago suburb to southern California. The clientele for his private practice was now the Hollywood crowd, shapely bodies—and opinion shapers to the world. California and New York were centers for CIA mind-control experiments in the 1960s, and Burger was part of that program. (Bain called him the research "project's messiah.")

Part of Burger's job was training other doctors to be mind-control experts for the Company. One of his trainees was Gilbert Jensen. The CIA was then researching a new type of hypnoprogrammed courier, one with a more unbreachable amnesia than mere hypnotic suggestion could achieve: an artificially split personality. Gilbert Jensen would be creating and managing a unit of these unknowing agents.

Candy was a celebrity, a patriot, single, traveled in her business, and badly needed money. She must have seemed a good prospect for recruitment.

In 1960, strange things began to happen at 52 Vanderbilt Avenue, where Candy now ran her modeling school, agency, and what was left of the Conover agency, from Room 808. The events seemed unimportant at the time. Maybe some of them were truly irrelevant. But, looking back, there was an obvious pattern of deceit and manipulation, a sinister web of entrapment starting to weave about Candy Jones.

An Odd Burglary—Heavyweight boxing champ, Gene Tunney, had been Candy's neighbor across the hall for years. One day, Candy noticed a "cleaning lady" standing outside Tunney's door. She appeared to be trying to figure out which one, of a set of keys, fit his door. The next day, Gene told Candy that his office had been broken into the night before. He said no harm had been done.

A few days later, Candy ran into General Donovan, now "retired," in the building lobby. Although they were barely acquainted, Donovan acted quite familiar. He told Candy he was meeting Tunney for lunch. Since he was quite early, Candy invited the General to tour her school while he was waiting. Then she took him over to Tunney's office.

Several days later, a man visited Candy's office, claiming to be an FBI agent who was investigating the burglary of Tunney's office. He walked over to a microphone lying on Candy's window ledge, picked it up, and looked it over. "What do you use this for?" he asked.

Candy told him that Allan Funt (of "Candid Camera" fame) had given her that mike, a very advanced type in its technology. Her models recorded public speaking assignments using it, so they could learn how they sounded to other people.

"It's just what we need for a stakeout over on fifty-seventh," the FBI man said. "Can we borrow it?"

Candy gave her permission.

Mail Service—The FBI man showed up at her office a month later, along with an associate. The two men asked Candy if they could use her office address to receive some of their mail. If any mail came for them, she was to call a certain phone number and report that fact. Candy consented. After that, mail did come once in a while for them. She always called the designated phone number when it did so.

A Favor for Donovan—Once in a while, Donovan now invited her to a party. In November, 1960, the General called to ask a favor. In some way (which he did not divulge to her), he had found out that Candy was scheduled to soon fly out to Denver and speak, then fly on to San Francisco to view a big fashion show. The General asked her to carry an "important" letter on that trip to an unnamed person who would come to her hotel room in San Francisco to claim it.

Candy asked Donovan to what governmental agency this anonymous person belonged. The General would not answer that question. He said that the visitor himself would explain. Candy agreed to carry the letter. Her last exit was about to be sealed off.[1] After she received the mysterious letter at her office, Candy stuffed it into her handbag and flew to Denver. She gave her speech there, then proceeded to San Francisco, where she attended the fashion show. Then, she waited in her hotel room for the promised visitor who was to come and take it from her. It was November 16, 1960.

The man who knocked at her hotel room door turned out to be Gil Jensen, the military psychiatrist she had met on Leyte. She offered him the letter, but he refused to take it. First, he wanted Candy to dine with him at a nice restaurant. She graciously accepted his invitation.

That evening, Jensen seemed to her much less at ease, less happy, than he had been back in the Philippines. Nevertheless, he was obviously trying hard, and he managed to make pleasant conversation. (It greatly helps the first hypnotic induction if the subject likes the hypnotist and trusts him.) He told Candy about his private practice over in Oakland. In turn, she told him about her divorce, her sons, the modeling business, the terrible financial pressures. Once he got Candy started talking, Jensen listened attentively, speaking only to encourage her whenever she seemed about to stop.

1. Was Donovan, consciously or unconsciously, fulfilling some romantic fantasy of creating the ultimate gorgeous, intelligent, female spy?

The Proposition—It was getting late. Again, Candy tried to give him the letter. Again, Jensen would not take it. He said that tomorrow at his office would be a better time to talk about the letter. Candy objected. She needed to get home to New York. Finally, when it was clear that she was not going to stay another day for any reason he had given her so far, Jensen came out with the big persuader. He said: "There's some interesting work you could do for the Central Intelligence Agency, Candy, without interfering with your business. It could be lucrative." (Bain, p. 60)

That was different. Candy was always looking for a way to earn money. She agreed to come to Jensen's office the next day.

The next morning, a car and driver picked her up at the hotel. It drove her across the Bay Bridge to Jensen's "office" in Oakland, the place where Candy would be hypnotized, drugged, and hypnoprogrammed, far from friends, family, or employees back in New York. The chauffeur helped her out of the limousine, then departed.

Candy stood alone on the sidewalk, looking around her. She was outside a two-story brick building in a run-down neighborhood. Adjacent was a green three-story one. Candy was surprised that the psychiatrist's office had no sign to inform passers-by that a doctor worked therein. The house did not even have an identifying street number.

She climbed the three wooden steps leading to the front door, opened it, and stepped inside. She was now in a small reception room. The only furniture was two straight-backed chairs and a table. She sat down in one chair. Magazines were stacked on the tabletop, some more than a year old. The light in the room was almost too dim for reading, but she could see that all the magazine address labels had been torn off.

Jensen came in. He greeted her cordially, and led her from the reception room into his office. That room had only one window, shielded from street observation by heavy drapes. A gooseneck lamp with an unshaded, brightly-burning bulb was its only source of light. "Does the light bother you?" Gilbert asked.

"Yes," Candy said.

He twisted the gooseneck's flexible shaft a bit, which made no real difference. There were shaded lamps in the room, but none of them were turned on, and he did not offer to switch to one of them.

"Would you like a tour of the office? he asked. She politely accepted his offer. He led her into her a small adjacent room. It had a raised examination table in the center, a white medical cabinet against the wall, and one straight-backed chair. Candy did not think much of it, but she kept those thoughts to herself. He then led her back to the room where the single bare light bulb burned, seated himself behind the desk, and began to ask her personal questions.

Candy did not feel comfortable. She wanted this conversation to stop. She wanted to get out of there. What she had expected to happen today was a job interview, not just a conversation between acquaintances. She was not bold enough, however, to ask him to get to the point. She kept answering his questions. He asked about her childhood.

Candy said, "It was lonely." When she told him about the club and her imaginary playmates, Dr. Jensen suddenly showed eager interest. He wanted her to tell him more, and yet more, about each member of the club. So she told him all about quiet, nice Doty, and Willy who stomped, and Arlene who was strong and domineered.

Candy desperately wanted to get the interview over with, head home, and be back in New York by that night. She had delayed her return only because Jensen had offered a "lucrative" job, and she needed money. She asked , "What sort of work am I being hired to do, and with whom will I be working?"

"The unit?" Jensen asked.

"I don't know," Candy said. "The general told me that you would fill me in." (Bain, p. 86)

Jensen ignored her question. He went back to asking about her imaginary friends in childhood.

Candy Signs Up—Candy had arrived at Jensen's office in the mid-morning. Now it was 1 p.m. She said, "I really must go."

Jensen ignored her request. He began a new series of questions, this time about her social life: "Do you date? Do you go to cocktail parties? Do you travel."

Candy said that she seldom attended parties. She did travel a great deal for her business, but did not socialize much at home or elsewhere.

He finally offered her the job: "We could work something out with you from time to time, Candy, if you performed services for us during your travels."

"What sort of services?"

"Carry a message now and then. That's all." (Bain, p. 87)

Jensen assured Candy that she would be paid to carry those messages. He said that she could go back to New York now. He would ask any other questions that he

Mind-Splitting Use for Imaginary Childhood Playmate

The government was pursuing exactly that line of research: creating an artificially-split personality out of an imaginary childhood playmate. Josephine Hilgard's 1970 book, Personality and Hypnosis, states that a person with an imaginary childhood playmate tends to have significant hypnotic susceptibility (research supported by grants from NIMH, the Air Force Office of Scientific Research, etc.). An imaginary childhood playmate is a marker for hypnotic susceptibility. It can also be a point of fracture for artificial personality-splitting.

A CIA memo said that the candidate[1] must be in the top 20% of hypnotic susceptibility, and must have

> ...a dissociative tendency to separate part of his personality from the main body of his consciousness. The hope was to take an existing ego state—such as an imaginary childhood playmate—and build it into a separate personality, unknown to the first. The hypnotist would communicate directly with this schizophrenic offshoot and command it to carry out specific deeds about which the main personality would know nothing. (quoted in Marks, The Search for the Manchurian Candidate, p. 184)

The concept was that the hypnotist would transform that childhood nucleus of rejected, blocked traits and impulses into the core of a subconscious isolate. When there was a choice of more than one childhood playmate, the split would be built into the toughest, meanest one. Bowart told Scheflin and Opton that all the military hypnoprogrammed persons that he had located and interviewed "have been beaten or abused by one of their parents when they were young. To escape, they created imaginary personalities which a clever hypnotist then used against them." (Scheflin and Opton, 1978, p. 445)

"R.J.", a former Ranger and Viet Nam Special Forces retiree told me, in 1991, "Everyone who is going into any branch of the military takes the Military Aptitude Test, the MAT. It asks several questions along those lines: 'Did you have imaginary playmates?' 'How old were you when you quit playing with your imaginary friend?' After you have decided on your military occupational status, you take another test. People going into Special Forces are asked the same questions—'Did you have imaginary playmates?'—plus additional ones along the same line. 'Was that imaginary friend more or less aggressive than you?' And there are questions about discipline: 'Did your parents spank you?' 'Did you feel resentment when your parents spanked you?' Almost every person who goes into a Special Forces unit has had a childhood imaginary friend. I did. He was a mean guy. He did things I couldn't do."

R.J. was a completely nice guy in his friendship with me, but he had that mean guy tucked away in his unconscious memories, which embodied parental (authoritarian) aggression and violence combined with repressed childhood rage and resentment. Arlene was Candy's equivalent of R.J.'s "mean guy." The CIA was not looking for a neurotic. For best programming results, the imaginary playmate must be part of a strong, normal personality, not a disordered, weak one. Brainwashing experts have learned that normal people reprogram easier and shape into a better product than neurotics. Candy had a strong, normal personality.

[1] Estabrooks earlier, and Condon later, used the term "candidate" to mean an individual who has been targeted to be made into an unknowing hypnoprogrammed person.

had the next time she happened to come to San Francisco. But, first, he wanted her to fill out a form. He pulled a paper and pen out of his drawer and pushed them toward her. Candy then signed a > ...security oath which officially made her an employee of the government, and as such she forfeited her right to legal compensation for the harm done her by the ruthless mind-control operation. (Scheflin & Opton, p. 121)

By signing that document, Candy had joined Jensen's "unit." She had become one of thousands of part-time CIA employees. (Such employees were not listed in headquarters' records.) Jensen became her control agent, her only CIA contact. His unit was the people he controlled. The CIA would thereafter be referred to only as the Company.

Then Jensen had a few more things Candy must do before she could go. He traced her silhouette on a length of brown paper with a black pen as she stood against the wall with the paper behind her. He said that it would sometimes be necessary for her to travel using a passport with a false name. He asked her to choose the name, to choose something that felt comfortable, natural. For the first name, she chose Arlene, which was a variant spelling of her middle name (Arline), and the name of one of her imaginary playmates. For the last name, she chose Grant, which was a part of her grandmother's name (Rosengrant).[1]

Jensen said that a photographer would come to her hotel room and take photos for her passport. Then the doctor asked, "What did Arlene look like?"

Candy said that Arlene had looked just like her, except darker, brunette rather than blonde, when she saw her in the mirror as a little girl.

The Hypnosis Begins

Disguised Induction—Jensen next asked about her health.

Candy said, "I'm fine."

The psychiatrist said, "You look like you need vitamins."

Candy said, "My doctor back in New York gives me B12."

Gilbert said, "I know better vitamins than B12." He urged Candy to get into top condition to endure her coming rigors of world travel.

Candy agreed to do that. Then she pulled out a cigarette and lit it.

Jensen said, "That is not a healthy habit. Why haven't you quit."

Candy said, "I've tried, but I can't."

(Bain does not mention Candy sipping a beverage while smoking that cigarette, but it seems likely, from what follows, that Jensen applied some chemical persuasion—a narcohypnotic drug dropped into her drink—before his coming disguised induction. For Candy seems unusually susceptible to what follows, even for a natural somnambulist. She had been there all day. It was past lunchtime. She must have been both hungry and thirsty. If Jensen gave her a beverage about this time which contained an oral dose of barbiturate, after about half an hour she would have been thoroughly under its influence, extra susceptible to hypnotic induction.)

Jensen then discoursed, at length, on methods to quit smoking, including hypnosis. Candy said she could not be hypnotized. Jensen asked if she had ever tried. "No," Candy said, but she was sure she was not susceptible. Jensen knew, because of those imaginary friends, that she was wrong, but he did not tell her so.

> [He]...sat back in his chair and clasped his hands on his chest. "You're probably right about that," he said. "There are lots of people who can't be hypnotized." He then launched into a quiet lecture on the evils of hypnosis as practiced by charlatans and quacks, coming down especially hard

[1] Later, Candy would remember visiting Jensen in Oakland only once, the first time. Of that visit, she could only remember what had taken place ;up to the time when he agreed that she could not be hypnotized. Other details in this narrative were recovered by later rehypnotization.

> on the stage hypnotists. "I'm really dedicated to putting a stop to the misuse of hypnosis, Candy. Dedicated to it. By the way, would you like to see how some people practice hypnosis?" (Bain, p. 91)

Candy nodded. Jensen stood up and led her on another tour of his office.

He was taking a long time, and being very patient, with this first induction. He could have ordered three strong men to hold her down, while he shoved a needleful of barbiturate into her vein which would send her straight down to a deep trance. Hypnoprogramming resting on a foundation like that, however, would be on an more unstable base. For his preferred outcome, Jensen needed to seduce Candy into the first induction in an atmosphere of friendship. If a hypnotist can get a few sincere "yeses" from a prospective mind-control victim before they begin to apply the harsher aspects of programming, a more effective unconscious basis for long-term control has been established.

Therefore, Jensen acted very pleasant as he took her on this second tour, chatting all the while about his plans to help with a crackdown on "people who try to hypnotize people, entertainers and all that." (Bain, p. 92)

Induction Hardware—Jensen had now led Candy into a section of the building which he had not shown her before. As the two walked around, the psychiatrist demonstrated item after item of a truly remarkable collection of hypnotic induction gadgets—some simple, some very sophisticated. He patiently showed her how a hypnotist would use each one in order to induce a trance in somebody, if they were hypnotizable, "although I know you can't be." He demonstrated pendulum, candle, and metronome inductions. He showed a mechanical sound maker (which he later used to create her telephone induction cue).

Last of all, Gilbert brought her to the big mirror. He knew that whatever—or whoever—has hypnotized a person before tends to keep that ability. He had learned, that morning, that Candy Jones hypnotized herself, as a child, by staring into a big mirror. He now suggested that she sit down on the chair in front of his mirror. She obediently sat, looking at her reflected image. As she stared into the mirror, he led the conversation back to Arlene. They were talking again about Arlene. (At that time, she was merely talking about Arlene; she was not yet being Arlene.) As Candy looked in the mirror and talked about Arlene, she slipped down to a trance level of consciousness.

Drug Inductions—After the mirror induction, Dr. Jensen told Candy to lie down on his "examining room" table. There, he gave the blonde celebrity her first dose of "vitamins." Years later, her second husband, John Nebel, found himself playing Jensen's role in her spontaneous self-inductions and regressions to this era of her life. John did not question the "vitamins" she repeatedly mentioned until he realized that Jensen had given them to Candy by IV into the big vein inside the elbow rather than by injection into the muscle of an arm or buttock. Then, John became suspicious. One day he discovered what Candy was really given:

JOHN: The bottle is hanging on the stand?

CANDY: Uh-huh. Like they used to have.

JOHN: Like intravenous feeding.

CANDY: Uh-huh.

JOHN: The bottle's upside down, isn't it?...(Candy looks up and squints.)...Isn't it upside down?...

CANDY: (surprised) Yeah.

JOHN: What's it say on the label?

CANDY: (after a long pause) I'm reading it backwards.

JOHN: Yeah, I know. What's it say?

CANDY: (haltingly, as though trying to make out the word) "Am...i...tol..."

JOHN: What's the first word?

CANDY: ...Must be sodium.

JOHN: Sodium? Does it say the name of the pharmaceutical company on the label?

CANDY: I think it says Warner. (Bain, p. 97)

Candy's Conditioning and Training

Candy's conditioning by Dr. Jensen was grounded in three narcohypnotic immersions ("vitamins") at his Oakland office, two in late 1960, the third in early 1961. Each immersion lasted for hours. During the narcohypnotic immersion, basic suggestions would have been made for a reinduction cue, and for future amnesia regarding that, and all subsequent, hypnotic events. Then the subject would have been pulled out of trance and tested to see if the reinduction cue and amnesia suggestions were working as planned. Only when he knew that her amnesia was firmly in place and that his reinduction cue was operational, would

1. In 1965, Teitlebaum, a writer on forensic hypnosis, offered a script called "Espionage Technic" in a section titled "Governmental Uses of Hypnosis." The programming was designed to turn a new officer on the force into an unknowing hypnotic subject:
To aid you in your work in the future, I am going to give you some suggestions which will remain in your subconscious... when you awaken, you will not be aware as to the nature of the suggestions, but they will guide you... (Hypnosis Induction Techniques, p. 170)

Jensen have let Candy go back to New York.[1]

Over the next months, the CIA experimenter developed Candy's somnambulistic amnesia and obedience under a continuing series of those narcohypnotic immersions. But even the power of suggestions given to a drugged subject did not satisfy him. Somnambulist amnesia blocks can be lifted by a competing hypnotist's rehypnotization. Jensen was experimenting with creating a new kind of amnesia, one that was even harder to overcome than suggestions for amnesia given under narcohypnosis. He wanted to make Candy Jones into an artificially-split personality.

Artificial Personality Splitting—The moment that Jensen heard Candy describe Arlene's personality characteristics of strength, dominance, and aggressiveness, he knew which member of the club he would build into a separate personality. Jensen wanted an agent who could be in deep trance, but could pass for somebody awake and normal. It can be assumed that the CIA wanted a split with the advantage of knowing all of both personalities' lives, whereas the root self (Candy) would know nothing of her second, hypnotic life. By artificial personality splitting, they hoped to achieve both goals: the waking hypnosis and one-way amnesia.

To accomplish that splitting, Jensen would use narcohypnosis and intense hypnotic training, followed by insistent, repeated suggestions for Arlene to "come out." The psychiatrist told Candy that the drug was vitamins to strengthen her body. The neural remnant of Arlene left in Candy's mind from childhood, however, soon realized the truth. Jensen was after her. Jensen found the plan hard to carry out. Although Candy's conscious mind was drugged and unconscious, the neurons in her brain which contained the matrix of her childhood Arlene persona resisted Jensen's invitation to become self-conscious and independent.

Jensen persisted. One day, after an extra-strength, extra-long drug session and many insisting verbal summonses, as Candy lay in deep drug-trance on the examining table in his inner office, the CIA doctor finally succeeded. Suddenly, Candy felt severe stomach pain. (Jensen had told Arlene to "come up through Candy's stomach." Thereafter, Candy always felt that same pain at the moment she switched personalities and Arlene came out—a psychosomatic conversion of her resistance.)

ARLENE: ...and all of a sudden I was able to say a few words and start to talk again.

JOHN: (laughing) And was he surprised?

ARLENE: He backed away. I got ahold of his arm, and then he said—

JOHN: You mean Dr. Jensen's arm?

ARLENE: Yes, with my left hand. And I pulled him over, and he said, "Let go!"...And he said, "What are you trying to do?...And he said, "Candy, Candy, stop that!"...And I said, "This is Arlene."...And he said, "You're hurting me!" (a pleased laugh)...And I was. And he said, "Good God, you're strong."...

JOHN: Meaning you, Arlene?

ARLENE: Yes. And he said, "You're Arlene."...And I said, "Who were you expecting?" (Bain, pp. 106-7)

Candy had no conscious memory of that conversation. From then on, she was broken and separated. Her split—and all its subsequent experiences—were walled off by amnesia from her.

Although Jensen was always somewhat afraid of Arlene, he continued to call her out and train her. It was his job. In that early conditioning stage, Arlene sometimes resisted her cue—"A.G., A.G."—to materialize. Jensen had to use drug induction, again and again, to cause "Arlene Grant" to appear. If Candy's mind refused the splitting command, even when drugged, then Jensen would resort to more and more barbiturate. Once, he almost killed her:

JOHN: Did you ever fail to come out?

ARLENE: Yes. (becoming intense) Lots of times I wouldn't.

JOHN: And what did Jensen do?

ARLENE: Give her another shot.

JOHN: Another shot. What was the most number of shots she ever got in one day?

ARLENE: He gave her three once and she couldn't wake up. And he got scared.

JOHN: How long was she out?

ARLENE: She wasn't out, she was asleep. She slept for about fourteen hours. (Bain, p. 108)

Later, Jensen fully conditioned the neuronal matrix called Arlene to complete takeover at his verbal cue. He would seat Candy in a darkened room in front of a candle, in front of a big mirror. The CIA technician would light the candle and then say, "Look in the mirror and see Arlene." When Candy peered into the depths of the reflective glass, she would always see Arlene. Then Candy would be gone, wherever displaced personalities go, and Arlene would have the body.

Then Jensen simplified the process yet more. He left out the candle. He would simply say to Candy, "Look in the mirror," or ask her, "Do you want to see what Arlene looks like?" Either statement now cued the displacement of the Candy personality by the Arlene split. Candy would always look in the mirror when Jensen suggested that. She always wanted to see what Arlene looked like. And, the moment she looked in Jensen's mirror, Arlene would always emerge and displace her.

For the rest of Candy's life, both her selves—Candy and Arlene—had conscious, separate existences. In one important way, however, their lives were completely different. Candy's part of the mind "slept"—on-the-shelf, non-existant, "dead"—when she was Arlene. Arlene, on the other hand, was conscious all the time—thinking, feeling, aware—whether she had the body or not. Arlene went everywhere that Candy went. She was the hidden observer, noticing and remembering all that Candy thought and did.

Arlene was so powerful, and yet so helpless. For all she could do was watch and listen and know the real truth, the whole truth. Arlene only controlled the body—with its physical abilities to speak and walk—when Jensen summoned her out to do his bidding. When she was called out, she was in a condition of waking trance, capable only of absolute obedience. Arlene was Jensen's genie, hidden in the bottle of Candy's mind. Jensen released her only when he had a use for her.

The experiment had succeeded. A celebrity, Candy Jones, captured by deceit and disguised induction, now was an unknowing CIA-controlled hypnotic subject. Her artificially-created hypnoself, Arlene, acted as the knowing, loyal, secret agent, compactly hidden within the unknowing mind of the original root self of Candy—unless activated by Jensen.[1]

Over the next twelve years, Jensen called Candy to Oakland again and again, for "vitamins." There, he did an extended series of experiments on her. He forced her to drink orange juice laced with various drugs, injected new substances into her, tried out new conditioning routines.

One classic conditioning routine began with Jensen saying, "The light is out!" Then he would turn it off. Later, as the association conditioning took hold, he would just say to her, "The light is out." Then the room would seem totally dark to her—even when the light was still on.

Induction Cues—Jensen could also hypnotize and program his human puppet by phone. He might call, talk to Candy a moment, then call out Arlene (using an auditory cue). Or he might play the cue the moment Candy's voice answered, then talk to Arlene. (Candy would imagine afterwards that it was a call with nobody there, because of having no memory of hearing Jensen's voice. She would hang up, thinking nothing of it.)

The CIA doctor's telephone cue to make Candy "relax" and switch personalities was a mechanical metronome sound which Arlene called "the code"—a unique series of tick-tocks which sounded faster and faster. He had an oral version of that induction code too. Sometimes, after Candy arrived at his office from the airport, she would wearily sink into a chair, and "doze off." Arlene knew, however, that the sleep Candy fell into in that chair was not a natural one. Candy fell asleep because she heard Jensen speak a brief series of nonsense sounds. Afterwards, Candy never remembered hearing the induction cue. Only Arlene remembered that.

Isolation—Jensen concealed Candy's programming, and his experiments on her, as if his life depended on it. He kept the existance of Arlene secret from Candy. He also kept what he had accomplished secret from foreign intelligence, and from the public, and from other CIA employees.

The first stage in any mind-control program involves isolation from family and friends while the foundation programming is implanted. After that, a more permanent form of isolation is built in: talk frankly only with "us"; stay away from "them." Jensen and Burger also programmed in harsh prejudices for the purpose of alienating Candy from all definable groups of people. Jensen's flat "no-friends" rule dealt with the rest. The mind-controller wanted her to be a self-sufficient loner who avoided people and avoided relationships because Candy said, "...most of them wouldn't understand what I was doing. I couldn't take the risk." (Bain, p. 141).

---

[1] Arlene always scorned Candy. Estabrooks had proposed that the two personalities should be designed to conflict with each other. (Hypnotism*, 1957, p. 203) They did.

Candy had been a lonely child. Now, though well-known and popular nationwide, she was a lonely adult. Love was also forbidden. Candy was a famous beauty, a noted author who traveled widely in her work and met many eligible men. She sometimes thought about one man in particular, John Nebel. She had met him once, years before. Now she often listened to him interviewing guests on his late night talk show. Obedient to her programming, however, she never acted on her feelings, never communicated them to him, never even communicated with him. It was just a secret, hopeless crush. For Jensen had told Candy, while she was hypnotized, over and over, that she would never marry again. He said she did not want to get married.

Telephone Induction

Trance can be induced over the phone, even the first time, if enough factors favor the hypnotist. For example, when Burger first hypnotized Candy she was

- naturally susceptible to hypnosis,
- sick (which raises hypnotizability)
- desperately wanting to feel better (which provided motivation and motivation also raises it), and
- isolated, with nothing else to pay attention to except his voice over the phone.

Once a subject has been told the cue for posthypnotic induction, the process is even simpler.

> If the subject has been hypnotized previously, it is only necessary to tell him that he will feel as heavy and tired as he felt on the last occasion when he had been hypnotized, but that he will still be able to hold the telephone to his ear. (Furst, p. 203)

The hypnotist speaks, or sounds, the posthypnotically suggested induction cue over the phone when he gets his subject's ear on the other end. He doesn't have to say "Hello" first. That would give his subject a predator-on-the-phone warning and the chance to hang up before the induction cue is spoken. Instead, the hypnotist gives the induction cue first. Immediately, in a person programmed for routine amnesia during trances, the subject's conscious mind is off-line. Only the reflexive hypno-robot is listening. The hypnotist gives his instructions to that subject's unconscious. When he is finished, the phone call and the hypnosis are terminated (probably both at once) by a routine suggestion.[1]

Jensen also denied complete medical care to his subject. The psychiatrist's deep-level hypnotic suggestions made her terrified to visit any doctor other than Dr. Aldridge (head of OB/GYN at Women's Hospital, N.Y.C.). Aldridge, her longtime personal physician, was trouble enough for Jensen. When Candy told the gynecologist about her flights to the West Coast for vitamin shots, Aldridge protested. He said, "Vtamin B12 is only given into the buttocks muscle. If given in the arm, the shot would be intramuscular, not intravenous." He urged his famous patient to refuse any more of Jensen's "vitamins."

Dr. Aldridge shook Candy up enough that she had a big argument with Jensen about those vitamins the next time she went to Oakland. But, when she returned, the argument was settled in Jensen's favor. "There are different schools of medicine," she later rationalized to Aldridge. (p.124)

When Candy needed dental work, Jensen stalled her. The condition of her teeth became worse and worse. One day, she asked permission to make a dental appointment to have all her work done in one sitting—under Sodium Pentothal. That notion greatly upset Jensen. He insisted that she must never let anyone give her that drug.[2] Jensen did not rule out just Sodium Pentothal (a favorite of hypnoprogrammers). He forbade any dental anesthetic for her, even Novocain. Because of her chronic toothaches, Candy pleaded with Jensen many times to let her visit a dentist. He finally agreed to let her visit a CIA dentist,[3] but then stalled again. The CIA dentist never was available for her.

[3] It was standard procedure for CIA operatives to receive medical and dental treatment only from cleared physicians assisted only by cleared nurses and technicians. In case of surgery, another agent would stand nearby to note any unauthorized thing the patient said under anesthesia.

Jensen also worried that Candy might visit a psychiatrist. He especially warned her never to allow herself to be given the powerful tranquilizer thorazine. The involvement of an ethical psychiatrist is the thing most feared by an unethical operator. Psychiatrists understand narcohypnosis. They can administer barbiturates which penetrate sealing suggestions. They understand methods by which to program the unconscious—and by which to deprogram it. Candy later explained to John (obviously unconsciously parroting Jensen's statements) why she could not make an appointment with a psychiatrist:

> "I'll get very, very sick and I might even have a convulsion. I've never had a convulsion, but I will know what one is like if I go to a psychiatrist...he said it would start in my stomach and he said that I would get very upset because they ask you too many questions...They'll think that you're crazy. They wouldn't believe you. They would think something has happened to you." (Bain, pp. 129-130)

Candy tried hard to stay healthy. She knew that she could not seek help if she became sick because of her "phobia"—a fear of medical attention.

Training for a Hypno-Agent—The CIA sent Candy to Camp Peary, several times, for training in secret service tactics: "Detect, Destroy, and Demolish." There, at "The Farm" as insiders called it, she learned to search a room, commit arson, leave no clues, commit suicide with a poisonous lipstick, or commit murder by sticking a pin into the lipstick, and then into a victim. The curriculum also included the use of acid as offense and defense, firing various types of guns, climbing ropes, writing coded messages on fingernails, then painting over them with polish. And so on.

Courier in Action—In 1965, under the heading of "Espionage" in a book called Hypnosis Induction Technics, a programming script appeared:

> Agent X, you are now in a deep hypnotic trance. When you awaken from this trance state you will not remember that you have been hypnotized....you will believe that you have never been hypnotized before in your life and that you cannot be hypnotized. In fact, if anybody should ever ask you if you have been hypnotized, you will say, "No, I have not been and I can't be."...you will know that if anybody ever hypnotizes you or attempts to hypnotize you, other than members of this particular unit, you will become extremely nervous, will feel sick to your stomach...In the event of your capture...you will find that you have no memory for...anything to do with espionage. No matter what type of questioning or hardship you may have to undergo, this information will never be released by your subconscious to your conscious mind. (Teitlebaum, Hypnosis Induction Technics, pp. 172-3)

For Candy, it was not hypothetical. She was a CIA courier. It was all conditioned routine now: get off the plane, go to Jensen's office, take out her Arlene wig and clothing from Jensen's closet, change into them, receive her fake passport from him, and then get a dose of "vitamins." After that, Arlene went wherever Jensen directed, usually carrying a sealed envelope. She delivered them to major East coast cities, handing the envelope to some waiting stranger in a restaurant, office building, or hotel.

Consciously, Candy knew that she delivered mail, a task which sometimes involved travel, for the CIA. She knew that she used various names, including the name of Arlene Grant (she had a passport in that name). She knew that she had rented a box at the Grand Central Station post office, in August of 1961, under her birth name of Jessica Wilcox which she checked every day until about 1969—though mail seldom came. When it did, she knew that she was to take it to her office. An unknown man would collect it from there. Or somebody would telephone her with instructions to deliver it somewhere in the city. She knew it all must be kept secret. That was all she consciously knew.

The CIA did pay, but irregularly, and never directly. Instead, they would send several thousand dollars at a time to pay for her sons' school or to pay a family hospital bill—as if it were an anonymous donation.

Candy gradually realized that delivering those letters sometimes put her in situations that might be life-threatening. She then wrote a formal letter to her lawyer, the first time she communicated anything about her secret work to another person. She put a copy into her safe deposit box. In the letter, Candy said that she used three names: Jesse Wilcox, Candy Jones, and Arlene Grant.

> In the event of my death, due to an accident or sudden illness...please have my demise checked, if at all possible...I am not at liberty to divulge the sideline activity in which I am involved; however, you can be assured that in no way is it illegal, immoral or unpatriotic. (quoted in Bain, pp. 112-133)

Candy confided a little more to her old friend and editor at Harper and Row, Joe Vergara. He did not believe her. She had the impression that he interpreted what she told him as evidence of a mental problem.

One night, Jensen instructed Candy to attend a party which was being given by Bill Buckley at the ’21 Club. (Buckley ended up a dead CIA station chief in Beirut.) Candy’s assignment was to photograph the man who came in and insulted Buckley during the party. Candy was there. The man arrived, sought out Buckley, and insulted him with censorable language, just as Jensen had predicted. Candy snapped his picture. She did not know who he was.

Candy delivered the picture to unit-controller Jensen, who had just demonstrated his prowess to chief Buckley. From then on, the doctor proudly displayed that photo on his desk. It was a secret souvenir, trophy evidence of two of the minds he presumably controlled: Candy Jones, who could be made to photograph a stranger, and the strange man, who had been caused to insult Buckley. That kind of thing amuses hypnotists.

Torture and Shame Experiments

The two main centers of activity in Candy’s CIA messenger job had been New York, where she lived and worked, and San Francisco, where she flew to get her “treatments,” transformations, and assignments from Jensen.

Now, Jensen began a series of experiments which were carried out in a third city, Taipei, Taiwan, presumably by cooperating Republic of China agents. They tested the hypnoprogrammed courier’s behavior by mimicking her capture and interrogation by “enemy.”

The experiments tested how well her hypnotic amnesia withstood cordiality—and torture. Could torture break Candy? Would she be so convinced of her innocence as to act honestly indignant? Could ruthless torture make her reveal the secrets of her conditioning? Would her amnesia and personality splitting hold up even under humiliation and excruciating pain? Or would she confess all the secrets of Jensen and Arlene?

The CIA first discussed this particular terminal experiment in 1954.

> Such an experiment could have been performed, as [Morse] Allen suggested, by friendly police in a country like Taiwan or Paraguay. CIA men did at least discuss joint work in hypnosis with a foreign secret service in 1962. (Marks, pp. 187-8)

John Marks made that statement because a document, proposing the foreign experiments which Candy had already described, turned up in 1978 among CIA papers he obtained by means of his Freedom of Information Act lawsuit against the CIA! Marks then submitted another FOIA request, specifically seeking information on that “joint work in hypnosis.” The CIA, however, refused to release any documents about hypnosis experiments “in cooperation with foreign intelligence agencies.”

Another document, which survived the episodic CIA shreddings of their mind-control research records and was eventually obtained by John Marks, listed titles and dates of document packets in seven boxes of MKULTRA experimentation records (152 sets in all). All contents of those boxes had been destroyed, but the title/date list had survived. The last five entries are:

MKULTRA	146	Aug.	63-Sept. 64
“	147	Oct.	63-May 67
“	148	Nov.	63-Sept. 64
GRANT	151	Feb.	66-Dec. 67
“	152	May	66-June 66

Does GRANT refer to Arlene Grant? That pseudonym, which Dr. Jensen assigned to Candy the first day she signed up for his unit, may well have been the name under which her experimental records were stored. The years of 1966-1967 match the period of time when Candy was making trips to Taiwan. Those journeys required extensive preparation and coordination between the CIA and their counterparts in the Republic of China.

The experiments on Candy, which took place on the island of Taiwan, began in the fall of 1966. We do not know exactly how many such trips she took. Of all the things that Arlene had to relive (her only way to communicate to John what had happened), the most difficult for her to reexperience were the cruel torture experiments. “She invariably became hysterical during these sessions.” (Bain, p. 201)

Candy/Arlene told John Nebel about those experiments in 1973. Bain’s book, which made public the history of her hypnogramming and use as a CIA experimental subject, was published in 1976. Candy’s information predated the FOIA releases. They corroborated her account.

Nice Treatment—On her first trip to Taiwan, however, Arlene was treated well. She was told that her contacts were “businessmen.” Indeed, it was a former president of Taipei’s Chamber of Commerce who met her at the airport. When she offered him the envelope she carried, he would not take it. Instead, he insisted that she must come to his “home.”

Home turned out to be located twenty miles outside Taipei. It was big and institutional looking. There were several other sizable buildings on his “estate.” Arlene saw two women wearing lab coats talking to each other outside one building. That seemed odd. She asked her host about them. “Household servants,” the man curtly replied.

For the next three days, her host devoted himself to pleasing Arlene Grant. It was Stage One of the experiment: Can you wine and dine the truth out? Together, they shared wonderful feasts of exquisite Chinese cuisine and visited the tourist highlights of Taiwan. Arlene, at no time, confided that she was really Candy Jones and had been drugged, hypnoprogrammed, and personality-split by a CIA doctor. She did take lots of photos.

When she arrived back to San Francisco, Jensen met her at the airport and personally drove her to his office for the switch back to Candy Jones. As usual, Candy left her fake passport, wig, A.G. clothing, and brunette makeup in Jensen's office closet. She gave Jensen all the exposed film from her "sight-seeing" trip.

Back in New York, Candy found her office staff frantic. She had been gone for a week—and she hadn't even told anybody that she was leaving!

Torture—A month later, Jensen again summoned Candy to San Francisco, turned her into Arlene, and sent her to the Far East. The same man met her at the Taipei airport. He took her to the same big house, and there accepted the letter she had brought. This time, instead of pleasantly entertaining her, he imprisoned and tortured his guest.

The simplest test of hypnotic depth is to suggest anesthesia, then test the subject—with pin, or match flame, or needle—to see if he feels pain. A person who is hypnotized and has been given a preparatory suggestion of numbness does not feel the pain. Candy felt the pain that they caused her normally, like a person who isn't hypnotized. Being unaware (anesthetic) would have given away her hypnotic state. Yet she endured without breaking—like a hypnotized person.

Measurable Degrees of Agony

Shocking inflicts measurable degrees of agony, so electrodes have long been a laboratory method for testing hypnotic depth, control, and pain tolerance.

> This writer uses a little device known as a variac. This is plugged into an ordinary light socket and it delivers the exact voltage required. The contacts are placed on the palm and the back of the left hand, blotting paper, soaked in a saturated salt solution, being used to insure the very best form of contact. Under these circumstances, fifteen volts would be very painful, twenty unbearable. But a subject in somnambulism (deep trance) can take sixty, even 120 volts without flinching. (Estabrooks, Hypnotism)

Candy later told John that they shocked her, "Because I didn't have what they wanted. I didn't give them what they wanted." (Bain, p. 197)

They strapped her into a chair by a table, and then....

CANDY: They put a solution first on the skin...

JOHN: A saline solution?

CANDY: I don't know...a solution...they put it on with gauze on a long stick...like a Q-tip...they stuck a wire on the wet area...They put the wire on your finger and...

JOHN: ...Do they wrap the wire around your finger?

CANDY: They just touch it to the area where the solution is.

JOHN: Is the current on?

CANDY: Of course.

JOHN: And the wire is attached to a box?

CANDY: Yes, like a manicure set, or an electric hair roller. A little box with a few dials on it...

JOHN: Did it spark?

CANDY: I didn't look. But I heard it. It hisses.

JOHN: And it hurts.

CANDY: Momentarily. It's a shock. It makes a blister... (Bain, pp. 194-195)

When they finished, the blisters were so bad that she could not put her fingers together.[1] Blistered and suffering, she now heard the Chinese businessman talking in Chinese to somebody on the phone. Then he hung up the phone and unstrapped her from the chair.

He was acting friendly now. He apologized for the shocks. He insisted they were merely an effort to help her memory. He arranged for her to eat lunch, then drove her to catch the return flight to San Francisco.

Back in the U.S., Jensen also apologized to Candy for the torture. He said it was all a mistake, caused by a typographical error in the letter she had delivered.

Despite the torture, every time Jensen sent his hypnorobot to Taipei, she went. On a different trip, they

[1] In the context of pain, Candy's split personality was divided even more firmly than usual. Later, Candy told John that Arlene had felt the pain, not her, and "Arlene's hand" had the blisters.

Snake-in-the-Box Experiments

The scorpion-in-the-box test format, used on Candy, had been hotly debated in the literature of experimental hypnosis ever since 1939, when L.W. Rowland published a report of an experiment involving a snake in a box. Back then, the debate between experimental hypnotists on whether a person could be made to do something by means of hypnosis that they would not normally do was still open and lively. Rowland, using a box covered with "invisible" glass, had induced hypnotized persons to attempt to pick up the rattlesnake they could see inside the box.

> By way of control, forty-two persons, of every age and degree of sophistication, were asked to come to the laboratory and pick up the snake...the persons were not only badly frightened at the appearance of the snake, they would not come close to the box; only a few were finally persuaded to pick up a yard stick and try to touch the snake. They all seemed bewildered when they touched the glass which they could not see. (Rowland, "Will Hypnotized Persons Try to Harm Themselves or Others?")

Because three out of four of his hypnotic subjects (but none of the unhypnotized persons acting as controls in the experiment) obediently tried to reach inside the snake box, Rowland concluded that "persons in deep hypnosis will allow themselves to be exposed to an unreasonably dangerous situation." His fourth subject "saw the snake, turned around facing the experimenter, and awoke." (Ibid., p. 115)

Rowland also tested whether hypnotized persons would obey orders to harm other persons. He commanded a hypnotized person to throw sulfuric acid at the face of an experimenter (who was protected by invisible glass). The acid was clearly the real thing. He concluded that hypnotized persons "will perform acts unreasonably dangerous to others" (Ibid., p. 117).

In 1952, Young carried out a pair of experiments in which he replicated Rowland's famous experiments described above. Hypnotized persons were first asked to handle a rattlesnake, then to toss "acid" in someone's face. In Young's experiment, the instructions were to reach through an opening into a box, grasp the snake, and move it into a large can. The snake closely resembled the poisonous water moccasin. Young's verbal instructions were designed to cause a subject to assume that the snake was poisonous. Nevertheless, seven of Young's eight hypnotic subjects did reach out, grasp, and move the snake.

> One subject, a male music student, in tremulous conflict over the instructions, was so inept in the long-continued alternate approach and withdrawal of his hand near the snake's head that he was bitten by the snake and fainted dead away, only to be brought back to hypnotic consciousness and pushed by the experimenter until he, too, captured the snake of which he was mortally afraid. (Young, 1952, p. 405)

Young's subjects, like Rowland's, also threw acid—in this case, "nitric acid"—at the operator's face. One day, Young's experiment became totally real because one hypnotized subject accidentally threw real nitric acid in the assistant's face instead of the mock version:

> ...on account of the promptness of remedial measures, no scars were left on his face; although his heavy uniform (that of an ROTC student) demonstrated in large areas where the acid struck (Young, 1952, p. 405).

However, some later experimenters demonstrated that most people obey such commands without being hypnotized. They do it out of simple obedience to perceived authority, or because they know it is an experiment and they trust the experimenter. So the debate opened up againall over to what extent hypnosis could be a factor in coercively forcing people to do an antisocial act (injuring themselves or another person).

George Estabrooks showed an expert on hypnosis Rowland's report of his experiment and asked, "Do you think Rowland proved the point?"

> The expert countered, "How do you know that glass is invisible? To you, yes. But the hypnotic subject may, probably does, have much greater keenness of vision than does the normal individual."
>
> Estabrooks asked him how to make that experiment "air tight."
>
> "Take away the glass."
>
> "In that case there might be a corpse in the laboratory," Estabrooks objected.
> "Exactly. But I see no other way to meet the objection." (quoted in Reiter, p. 41)

So the possibility of what experimental hypnotists called antisocial hypnosis could not be proved without a terminal experiment, and the terminal experiment could not be done because it was antisocial. But, they did it to Candy. After Candy put her hand in the box on Taiwan, whoever knew of this secret experiment had proof. Candy would know better than to trust those people. But she put her hand in the box. She was stung. And she stayed an unknowing hypnoprogrammed person.

shocked her using a small box sitting on the table. Wires ran from it to her wrist and to her shoulder. Those shocks hurt terribly. They shocked her repeatedly with that setup , and, together with the shocks, they asked question after question about the story of her life and her CIA link.

Reliving it, Candy said, "...I don't know anything. Nobody here believes me...I'm afraid to say yes and I'm afraid to say no...Why don't you just kill me?...why do you keep me here like this?...I don't know any Dr. Jensen." (Bain, p. 193)

When she still didn't (or couldn't) satisfy their interrogation demands for the story of her life, the lab techs told her they were going to put her hand into a box which contained either scorpions or the deadly coral snake. Later, Candy told John:

> CANDY: They put her hand in the thing.
> JOHN: In what?
>
> CANDY: In with the scorpions. She didn't know whether it would be the scorpions or the coral snake.
>
> JOHN: You mean into a box?
> CANDY: Uh-huh. The scorpion was in there. (p. 203)

It turned out to be the scorpions, and one stung her. When she pulled out her hand from the box, the insect was still clinging to it. (Bain later observed a small scar on that part of her hand.)

The Chinese director of the experiments on Candy had put one over on the lab girls who believed the scorpion in their box was dead. When Candy actually got stung by it, they were upset and surprised. They stopped the torture and gave her medical treatment.

This trip, the "businessman" did not apologize for torturing her. This time, when she got back to San Francisco, Jensen did not say it was a regrettable mistake. It made no difference. Candy was hypnotized on cue and robotically went back to Taiwan every time she was told to do so.

In another experiment, the lab technicians tortured her by cutting both her thumbnails to the quick. Recalling the event, under hypnosis with John...

> CANDY: ...They were going to keep cutting them down unless I told them...
>
> JOHN: Told them what you knew?
> CANDY: (panicked) I don't know anything. I gave them the letter ...They cut it right down into...It's all raw... Both thumbs... (Bain, p. 207)

Shame—In 1967, the CIA announced the end of all mind-control testing and the destruction of all records of that testing.[1] But Jensen continued the overseas experiments on Candy. Candy's last trip to Taiwan for torture experiments was in 1968. They had tried pain, and she did not break. Next, they would try shame—and then pain and shame combined.

She handed her envelope to a girl at an art gallery, as instructed. As if on cue, the girl spat in her face.

(The spitting sounds like a posthypnotic suggestion cued by delivery of the envelope. Maybe this event began the testing of Candy/Arlene's resistance to humiliation. Maybe, also, this was a puppet-meets-puppet encounter set up to see if that made any difference. Would they recognize each other's plight, embrace, and swear future solidarity against hypnoprogrammers? They should have, but they did not.)

Then Candy was taken to a hotel dining room, seated in its lobby, and given a drink. It made her feel sick. She began to sweat heavily.[2] A female attendant led her out of the dining area into a "bathroom" which had a bed in it and also a dressing room. The attendant took off Candy's clothes (which were now drenched with sweat). She hung them up, gave her a gown, and put her to bed. A doctor came, gave her a shot, and then left.

The female attendant then returned. She began a long episode of inflicting painful, shameful body pinches, including on her breasts and nipples. The pinches were severe enough to cause black and blue marks all over her body. While the "attendant" was viciously pinching her victim, she demanded over and over to be told about "the papers."

When her subject fainted from the pain, the Chinese woman roughly revived her and continued the torture. When the interrogtor finally left the room, Arlene tried to crawl under the bed and hide.

[1] A source later told Bowart they were done testing because "they went operational."

[2] "...the men from ARTICHOKE wanted to know how well hypnotic amnesia held up against torture. Could the amnesia be broken with drugs?" (Marks, p. 185)

Demonstration at Langley—Candy's professional, public life continued to thrive. In 1970, Harper and Row (her longtime publisher) released her autobiography of the years spent touring with the USO during World War II, More than Beauty. One evening, she was a guest at a White House party. She and Pat Nixon were photographed as they smiled warmly at each other.

Perhaps it was the night after that White House party. Perhaps it was some other night—Candy never could remember the exact date. But, one night, she went from Washington D.C. to the CIA's headquarters at Langley, Virginia. There, Dr. Jensen demonstrated her degradation before a roomful of observers. Candy Jones was the first of eight conditioned hypnotic subjects which her unit-controller presented to his audience that night.

She lay prone on a rolling table, dressed only in her black wig, in deep trance. Jensen introduced her to the small audience as "Laura Quidnick." After putting her through a series of acts of visibly automatistic obedience, the doctor concluded this display of her total subjugation with an obscene finale. Holding a lighted candle in one hand, Jensen said to "Laura" that what he was about to do to her would not hurt, and she would not remember. Then he shoved the burning candle into her vagina.

Jensen then invited any doctor who wished from the seminar audience to come on stage and try to interfere with his control of Laura. He exuded smug pride as, one by one, the audience members, now clustered around the hypnorobot's gurney, tried—and failed—to disrupt his control over her.

Candy had endured all, proved herself to be the perfect hypnoprogrammed messenger, served her country with perfect obedience—and in perfect ignorance. Whether at work, supervising her office staff, at home with her children, or in social settings, Candy knew that she sometimes carried messages for the CIA. That is all she knew of those matters. She did not know that she was Dr. Jensen's unknowing hypnotic subject. She did not know that his vitamins were really a narcohypnotic drug She did not know she had an artificially-created split personality named Arlene Grant.

Candy Fights Back

Maybe what happened at Langley violated Candy's unconscious moral principles badly enough to shake the roots of her basic hypnoprogramming. Or maybe the cause of the fracture that appeared in the wall that separated her secret life from her known life was what happened in Taiwan, plus what happened at Langley. For whatever reason, at this point in her personal history, Candy Jones began to develop unconscious resistance to the problem which she did not know because she could not remember. She was fed up without consciously knowing exactly why. She heartily wished she had never signed on with the CIA.

In a later trance regression, she relived an argument with Jensen during this period. She said, "I love my country and that's why I started in the first place. But...could you do what I'm doing? Go ahead. You go and do the things I've been doing. You couldn't do it." (Bain, p. 230) In 1972, Candy firmly told Jensen that she was finished working for the Company.

Jensen did not let her go. Not in the usual way.

Suicide Orders—Candy's declaration that she wanted out was a turning point also for Jensen. He began to "suggest" suicide. Were the hypnotic suggestions to kill herself the logical completion of her testing sequence: the final and most truly "terminal" experiment? Or did Jensen choose "...the more conventional means of dealing with a renegade agent..."? (Bain, p. 133) Or was he done with his series of experiments and ready to discard Arlene (and Candy's body which contained her)?

Arlene was mouthy, unpredictable, and frightening. "He's petrified of me" (Bain, p. 100), she later told John. Candy's alter ego was definitely too human, not suitable for mass production. Jensen had manufactured Arlene in 1960. This was 1972. Hypnoprogramming technology had made significant advances over the dozen years since disrespectful Arlene first sneered at Jensen, "Who did you expect?" The current crop of hypnorobots was more comfortably robotic in behavior and attitude, not like feisty Arlene. Candy's split was now obsolete, surplus, an outdated experimental model with a bad habit of sassing its maker.

Jensen gave his subject suicide suggestions both in the form of direct and indirect suggestions under deep hypnosis. He repeated and elaborated them: "How would you do it?" he asked her. Then he told her how to do it:

> CANDY: (She moans.) I can't keep fighting like this, don't you know that? I'm tired of fighting. I can't fight any more (weary, upset) He's gonna make me...give up.
>
> JOHN: Who's going to make you give up?
>
> CANDY: (hesitantly) Dr. Jensen.
> JOHN: What's he going to do to you?
>
> CANDY: He won't have to do it to me. He's gonna make me do it my own self. Give up...He wanted me to go down and jump off that rock.
>
> JOHN: He said that?
>
> CANDY: He said it would be very nice because I like it down there.

JOHN: Jump off a cliff?
l

CANDY: He said you might as well go...why wait?
(Bain, p. 80)

Jensen specified the date, the place, and the scenario for his subject's death. Candy was to arrive in Nassau, Bahamas, on December 31, 1972. She was to check into the hotel she usually stayed at, the Paradise Beach. Jensen would phone her early in the morning of the next day and cue Arlene to come out and take over. Arlene would then walk the body to an out-of-the-way cliff. It had a fine view of ocean dashing on sharp rocks, far, far below.

When she began the publicity tour for Bain's book about her hypnoprogrammed life, Candy told KSAN's interviewer, David McQueen, more about those plans:

> "And I was going to take my snorkel, my swimming things, and I would be up on a little promontory where there were pine trees, and put everything down neatly and take off my watch and go in...Arlene Grant was going to dive in...But the person who would have died would have been Candy Jones." (quoted in Schrag, pp. 443-4)

Candy did not know what was scheduled to happen. Arlene, her unconscious split, knew that the body they shared had only thirty days before the death jump. The existence of Jensen's suicide scenario for Candy did not break through the wall of amnesia which divided her two selves. But something in her did break.

Better Wed Than Dead—Suddenly, like Pavlov's conditioned dogs after the Neva River flood almost drowned them in their basement cages, Candy was breaking Jensen-programming rules left and right. She broke the isolation rule by contacting her old friend (and longtime admirer), John Nebel.

Unconscious thinking is naturally arranged on a rational foundation of opposites. It is a strange, but true, fact that any chunk of programming in the unconscious—if under unbearable pressure—can escape that pressure by flowing to its opposite in that linkage of opposites. Candy now unconsciously converted Jensen's order to die into its opposite: a compelling and successful bolt to live. She broke Jensen's no love, no marriage rule. She and John had not seen each other for ten years. She was now 47; he was 61. They began to date. They married after a whirlwind, 28-day, romance. Neither she nor John knew her unconscious reason for hurrying. Both of them knew his reason. John Nebel had terminal cancer.

Candy had first met John when she was 18 and he was 32. He was a photographer on free-lance assignment, photographing her for a Borden ad. He shifted to radio at age 43, hosting WOR's all-night talk show. Over the next eight years, he built his slot into one of the hottest properties in New York radio. When he shifted to WNBC for eight years, and then to WMCA, his loyal listeners followed. He was always in the Nebel-at-Midnight slot, six nights a week, six hours every night. His show was New York's most popular nighttime radio talk show.

Candy had a truth that needed to be discovered. John was a perfect match for that need. Over the past twenty years, he had hosted every imaginable sort of guest on his all-talk show, including numerous hypnotists. He was famous for his ability to probe the weaknesses of guests. Broadcast schools everywhere played Nebel tapes to teach fledgling interviewers how to get at the truth.

So Candy did not go to the Bahamas to commit suicide. On New Year's Eve, 1972, the exact day she was to have checked in at the Caribbean hotel and begun her suicide sequence, she got married instead. A deeply implanted hypnotic command CAN be resisted, but only by conversion of that neural energy into some other form of expression. It can not be dealt with by a simple denial. Its mental energy, when cued into expression, has to go somewhere. Candy diverted the energy of a suicide scenario into that of a marriage scenario. Better wed than dead!

At their wedding, the famous bride's long years of CIA-conditioned isolation were obvious. Long John had forty guests. Candy had none, except her mother and the attendant who looked after her. Donald Bain, Nebel's friend and biographer, noticed that, and thought it strange.

Their marriage not only evaded Jensen's suicide plan for Candy. It also opened up wonderful new possibilities for her to get financial freedom from the longtime financial stress that first drove her into the arms of the CIA.[1] Nebel had invited her to co-host his nightly talk marathon and share its (he received no salary but collected half of the show's advertising revenue).

Candy Jones was an old pro at radio. John Nebel's audience quickly came to love her as well as him, so the listenership for the new husband-and-wife team stayed as solid as it had been for Nebel alone, and they prospered. Her new husband also offered Candy the services of his lawyers and accountants to extricate her from that money-hemorrhaging modeling school and agency. She gratefully accepted.

Arlene Begins to Appear—Jensen had conditioned Arlene to emerge when he told Candy to look in a mirror and "see" her. Starting with the wedding night, Arlene emancipated herself from being only Jensen's genie in the Candy bottle. She had a new man in her life now. She began to spontaneously appear when Candy looked into a mirror, a generalization of Jensen's first induction method. Arlene briefly appeared right after the wedding, and again that evening at their wedding reception feast in a Chinese restaurant. Arlene emerged a third time that night, after Candy left the marriage bed to go into the bathroom. There, she looked in the mirror, and returned...different. Arlene was not only appearing on her own. She was also disappearing on her own.

At first, the brunette in a blonde's body said nothing significant to John. She just took a turn at inhabiting the body for a while, then gave it back to Candy. It was as if Arlene now wanted to be John's hypnotic subject instead of Jensen's, the way a badly abused dog will leaves its cruel former home and take up residence outside the back door of some neighbor, hoping desperately to be treated with kindness and taken in.

Nebel had no idea what was going on. He only knew that, starting on their wedding night, there were moments when Candy acted like a different woman—"tense, angry, concerned. I asked her if anything was wrong and she gave me a curt 'No.'" (Bain, p. 9) It was Arlene who had said, "No." And then she disappear again. Candy would be back saying the familiar, reassuring words that John loved: "You're wonderful, John...You've made me the happiest woman on earth."

Once the alien presence was gone a while, John relaxed. But each brief appearance of Arlene left him more on edge. The idol of New York's nighttime radio took an instant, intense, permanent dislike to Arlene's cold, distant voice, her cruel facial expression, her bitterness.

Arlene could not help the way she was. She was Candy's aggressive aspect, rooted in an imaginary childhood playmate, strengthened and loaded with Jensen's hypnoprogramming, layered over that with the emotional burden of all the tragic experiences which Jensen had forced on her. John did not understand that Candy had unconsciously chosen to marry him and was calling him wonderful because of needs from the part of her which he already so disliked.

The next evening, John noticed another brief episode of that bizarre "mood" in Candy again. Over the coming days, the new husband gradually realized that he had taken into his life, not only Candy, but also this chronically angry spook who unpredictably took over Candy's body. He did not yet realize that Candy was amnesic for her split's nearly mute appearances. He did not know that Candy had worked for the CIA. In their whirlwind courtship, the master at ferreting out truth had not gotten around to finding out all that Candy had been doing over the past dozen years.

Now John began to ask a lot of questions. Candy was strangely evasive and curt in her answers. She did say, however, that she would have to take a trip now and then. John did not like the idea of that at all. He pressed her for details. Finally, Candy told him about that long-ago FBI meeting, about letters sent to her office, about the messages that she had carried. She had told him all that she remembered.

"Do you still work for them?" John asked.

"No," she said.

John wondered if he had heard the whole story.

Nasty and negative as Arlene seemed to John to be, she was trying to accomplish something healthy and good with her appearances. Candy was still at risk from Jensen. She needed help. Neither Candy, nor John, knew about Jensen. Arlene could not tell either of them in any normal way because her conditioning forbade it. She believed that, if John knew the real situation, he would help. But how could she tell? HOW?

John Hypnotizes Candy

John Nebel's job had required him to find material to keep interesting nighttime radio conversations going six hours a night, year after year. Sometimes he had hypnotists as guests. Again and again, he had read their books to prepare for the interviews, asked them questions, listened to their answers over the long night hours, watched them demonstrate hypnotic phenomena. Recently, he had accepted the invitation of one such guest to take his brief course in hypnosis. Nebel was "an amateur student of hypnosis." (Schrag, p. 442) He had the two necessary skills to protect Candy from Jensen: some knowledge of hypnosis, and decades of experience at digging out the truth in interviews.

---

[1] Her CIA employment had since tended to continue that financial desperation. Her modeling agency and charm school business were ruined by all the time the CIA took, and by the unpredictable behavior it caused.

Arlene had to find a way to get John to hypnotize Candy—and a way that Candy would allow herself to be hypnotized. It would have to be a disguised induction. Thus it came about that, five months after her marriage to John, Candy's unconscious began to inflict upon her the most severe possible insomnia. (Sleep deprivation results in greater than normal susceptibility to trance induction.) Candy and John were up all night doing their show. They would go home and sleep in the morning. But now Candy could not sleep.

It came to a head on June 3, 1973. She "...tossed and turned in the double bed in their cramped bedroom. Her face was drawn, and dark circles beneath her eyes caused them to appear sunken. She was near tears..." (Bain, p. 36) The anxious husband decided that Candy needed to relax. Trance induction is a physiological relaxant. John said, "I'll hypnotize you."

She said, "I can't be hypnotized."

John then tried a disguised induction, a type called progressive relaxation. Candy, being a highly trained hypnotic subject, quickly went into a deep trance. Her breathing became slow and regular. John then used a limb catalepsy routine to test her depth and deepen more. She was "down" all right. He then gave her a suggestion to shift from trance "sleep" into a true sleep. She did that. He had hypnotized her without using the "H" word, and he had relaxed her into getting a good sleep. He felt quite pleased with himself.

The next morning, Candy had insomnia again. John did progressive relaxation with her again. It worked, and she slept well. The next day, again there was Candy's insomnia followed by John's progressive relaxation induction. But, this time, something new happened before she shifted from hypnotic to natural sleep. After John "relaxed" her, she did a spontaneous age regression. She began talking in a little girl's voice. Pretending to be a man from her neighborhood, John conversed with the "little girl" for a few minutes. Then her regression stopped. She fell into a sound and natural sleep. The fourth time that John relaxed her, she spontaneously regressed to childhood again, and relived more incidents.

It became a routine. Whenever John saw that Candy was in trance and spontaneously regressed, he would ask, "Where are you now?" She would tell him. John would choose some appropriate role to play in the scene she was reliving. Candy was now sleeping better, and she was feeling more cheerful when awake. John considered the trances to be a good thing—and the regressions no problem.

One day, in an awake state, Candy told John that she had visited a CIA psychiatrist, Dr. Jensen, in California. She said that Jensen had wanted to hypnotize her and help her quit smoking, but she had informed him she could not be hypnotized—and he had agreed she could not.

John was startled. He knew that he had been hypnotizing Candy, but he could not make Candy believe that he had hypnotized her. Suddenly, he remembered hearing about a method of disguised induction for a person who says they can not be hypnotized. The hypnotist agrees with the subject, then demonstrates, "for your general information," how hypnotists do it to people who can be hypnotized. "Did he show you how he would have hypnotized you, if you were able to be hypnotized?" Nebel asked her.

"Oh, he showed me some things," Candy replied. "But he knew I couldn't be."

Arlene Spills the Beans—A few hypnotic sessions later, on June 1973, Candy spontaneously regressed—not to childhood, but to a scene in which Arlene was talking to Jensen! She was talking to John as if he were JENSEN! John accepted the role she had given him. He played along, pretending to be Dr. Jensen.

After Candy awoke from trance, and the natural sleep that followed it, John asked her about Jensen again. Soon, he realized that his wife could only remember visiting Jensen the first time. She could not remember anything that had happened inside his office after the conversation in which he had complained about her smoking, and then agreed that she could not be hypnotized. John reasoned that Candy's memory stopped so abruptly because Jensen had hypnotized her and suggested amnesia. But his wife had not stopped smoking, so WHY did Jensen hypnotize her?

The next morning, after the show was done and they had gone to bed, and John had "relaxed" Candy, she did another spontaneous revivification. (A "revivification" is the most authentic type of hypnotic regression; the old memory "tape" plays, and the subject relives a past scene in their life.) She was pushing hard now to accomplish the long, sad process of revealing the history of her conditioning and life as a hypnotic subject.

Again, Arlene talked to John as if he were Jensen. Arlene was forbidden to talk to anybody about her creation and activities—except to Jensen! John knew that he should play along with the Jensen role which Arlene had assigned him, because to a regressed hypnotic subject...

> ...all time subsequent to the...event...is blotted from the mind. It is, therefore, necessary for the operator to fit himself into the regression...transform himself into someone known to the subject at the earlier period. (LeCron (ed), Experimental Hypnosis, p. 156)

John was beginning to understand. Later that day, he went out and bought a tape recorder. From this point on, he taped every conversation he had with his wife when she was in trance. During June and July, 1973, in both induced and spontaneous daily trances, John gradually learned the truth about Candy's job with the CIA.

He became accustomed to abrupt personality shifts in which Arlene's voice would suddenly be replaced by Candy's, or vice versa. Sometimes it was a hypnotized, unconscious Candy who talked to John during the regressions; sometimes it was Arlene. (The revivifications showed that Jensen also had encountered both of Candy's personalities under hypnosis.) John soon became familiar with the differences between their voices. Arlene's was more deep, harsh, and masculine-sounding. Candy never swore. Arlene always swore. Candy was always unaware of the missing time when Arlene was out. Arlene knew all the content of both lives.

The mysterious Dr. Jensen and the CIA shadowed the life of these celebrity newly weds. Candy consciously knew and admitted to John that she sometimes tried to call Dr. Jensen, probably in response to posthypnotic suggestions to check in at a certain time on a certain date. John also knew she did that. He had observed, to his great distress, how Candy, in an instant, would transform to Arlene, who would insist that she had to call "the Murray Hill number." And there was no stopping her. Fortunately, that number never answered now.

A plainclothes detective had begun to stand across the street from their apartment. He stood there every day, month after month—watching.

On July 3, 1973, John heard a disturbing message on their answering machine:

> Japan Airlines calling on the 03 July at 4:10 P.M....Please have Miss Grant call 759-9100...She is holding new reservation on Japan Airlines Flight 5, for the sixth of July, Kennedy-Tokyo, with an open on to Taipei. This is per Cynthia that we are calling. Thank you. (Bain, p. 243)

The fact that John heard that call presumably caused another failure for the CIA, another win for Candy/Arlene. For John made sure that his wife did not get on that flight. If she had, she might never have come back. Or she might have come back freshly reprogrammed, back under complete hypnocontrol.

John tried to track down who made that reservation for "Miss Grant." No luck. Japan Airlines said that the reservation was real, but they did not know who had booked it. They had no clerk named "Cynthia." Then somebody explained to John that "Cynthia" was probably a commercial code name for bookings from a certain organization, perhaps the CIA. His informant said that airlines often booked space and billed clients using such codes. "Cynthia" certainly did sound like a booking code that the CIA might have used.

John, Candy, and Arlene—As Arlene revealed, bit by bit, the truth about Candy's life, Nebel was at first uncomprehending. When he did begin to catch on, the information deeply disturbed him. He wanted to talk to Candy about it.

Armed with the tapes, John confronted his wife with the information which Arlene was revealing. Even after hearing tapes of herself talking to John under hypnosis, however, Candy still firmly denied being hypnotized. She insisted that his tapes were only of her sleep-talking while dreaming. By denying that she had been hypnotized, Candy unconsciously was protecting John's access to her unconscious memories. She was a sealed person. She could not allow herself to be hypnotized. John did not understand her very real need to deny that he was hypnotizing her.

He tried, again and again, to get through her denial. He played tapes for her, talked to her about the hypnosis sessions, described all that she had said and done while in trance. She still insisted that it was all only sleep talking during dreams. Or maybe, she said, it was "autosuggestion." She could not admit she had done the "H" word.

Candy also adamantly denied that Jensen had hypnotized her. When the regressions revealed that she had also been hypnotized by Dr. Burger, she denied that too.

Arlene's process of revealing truth had now shifted into high gear. In numerous, spontaneous revivifications, Arlene emerged and took over that shared body. Except—she had enough respect for a working woman's situation to never come out during Candy's live hours on the show.

At first, Arlene had avoided all conversation with John. Then, she only talked to him in the role of Jensen, while in a state of revivification. Sometimes now, however, she talked to him as John. She was getting freer from Jensen's rules. (So, Candy was getting freer too.)

The split's cue to emerge was usually Candy's encounter with a mirror. Whenever Candy looked at her face's reflection—in a restaurant, a restroom, or the bathroom of their apartment—Arlene was likely to emerge. John developed a wake-up cue that instantly sent the split back under cover when she was no longer welcome, or had appeared at an inopportune moment. (If John pressed her hand against a piece of tile, Candy would immediately be awake and back in possession of her body.)

The first blow to Candy/Arlene's winning trend came from John. So far, he had been wonderful. He had met her unconscious need to be hypnotized and reveal information. Because her husband was almost always with her, he was able to help whenever the spontaneous trance regressions happened. He had carefully taped numerous hypnotic sessions and all the evidence they contained. He had spent hundreds of hours carefully questioning her to make details of the story clear. John was determined that there would eventually be a book about Candy's hypno-abuse, so that the public would also know these facts.

"Long John" Nebel was struggling too. At first, he mistakenly believed that Arlene's chronic state of anger was directed at him. Even after he intellectually understood that it was not, John still reacted emotionally as if it were. He blamed Dr. Jensen and the CIA for having created Arlene. But he also felt an implacable, angry hostility toward Arlene.

John blamed all their marital problems on Arlene's butting into what he viewed as his and Candy's private lives. He believed that Candy would be fine again if he could make intruder-Arlene quit coming out. John also feared that Candy might harm herself during a trance, because Arlene walked around his apartment during revivifications as if it had the layout of Jensen's office. He feared that she "would slip into such a deep trance that he would be unable to control her" (Bain, p. 120). He feared Arlene's capacity to publicly embarrass him.

John was either ignorant of, or not a subscriber to, hypnotherapy principles. He could not imagine a positive role for cynical, bitter, uncooperative, independent Arlene in Candy's mind. He never understood that Arlene was the part of Candy strong enough to suffer Jensen's endless horrific abuses, to contain all the forms of pain that he inflicted, and survive it. He never thought of Candy and Arlene as merely separated components of one woman's personality. Candy was John's ideal woman: unfailingly soft, appreciative, respectful, gentle, sweet, yielding. To him, she was the "real" personality. To his credit, he stayed deeply in love with her through all this. But he never understood that Arlene was genuinely Candy too, a split made from stolen, isolated parts of Candy's own feelings, opinions, and strengths.

John, also, did not like the way that Arlene badmouthed Candy. For Arlene routinely insulted her root self with words such as "dumb," " slow," " stupid." She called Candy a "goody two-shoes" and the "mother of her country" (referring to Candy's tragically abused patriotism). It made John angry when Arlene snickered at the gentleness and pliability of Candy. It disturbed him when Arlene revealed her possession of Candy's capacity for anger and ideas of retribution:

> "I have a lot of scores to settle up, and if Candy can't settle her scores for herself, I'll settle them for her...Candy has been screwed so many times, and I'm going to help her unscrew her life because she is just too goddamn dumb...I'm sick of watching it." (Bain, p. 160)

Bit by bit, Arlene was unscrewing Candy's life. She was providing a detailed expose of the CIA experimentation on Candy. She was gradually reuniting Candy with her amnesic knowledge, loosening up the grip of Jensen programming on her mind and life. By now, Candy had finally accepted what Arlene was revealing, and she had began to eagerly participate in that uncovering, in the process of trance remembering. She was pressing on, trying to recover it all. The basic story of Candy/Arlene and the CIA was clear by the end of June and July 1973, but there were still a myriad of details to be cleared up. Candy still needed dental work, and John wanted psychiatric testing of her to corroborate Arlene's revelations—and then shut her up forever.

Dentists and Doctors—John urged Candy to see a dentist for a long time before she finally visited one. It was her first dental appointment since Jensen's hypnoses of her began, twelve years before! By now, her teeth were a disaster. She had become the famous beauty who did not dare smile. The dentist called her mouth "...a mess...One tooth was broken at the gum line. I had never seen anything quite so bad in all my years of practice." (Bain, p. 132) Unable to overcome Jensen's prohibition of anesthetic, Candy had all the needed work done without using a painkiller. It was a very slow, very painful process.

John also urged Candy to see a psychiatrist. For a long time, Candy was positive that talking to a psychiatrist would make her horribly sick, even to the point of convulsion. (Convulsions can be caused by hypnotic suggestion.) Merely discussing it gave her excruciating stomach cramps. Bain found another way. He often had hypnotists on the show. Her programmed prohibition did not seem to prohibit a casual and "accidental" encounter with a medical hypnotist! She let first one, and then another, hypnotize her at the station during station breaks from interviewing. Both gave Candy suggestions which accomplished further freeing and desensitizing.

Then, Candy agreed to go to Dr. Herbert Spiegel's office for a formal testing of her susceptibility. She had been acquainted with Spiegel (a psychiatrist who taught medical hypnosis at Columbia's medical school) for years. Nebel also knew Dr. Spiegel, who often talked on John's show about being a forensic hypnotist for the FBI or about Sybil, a woman with sixteen personalities, for whom he was the relief psychiatrist when her main one had to be out of town.

To test Candy's hypnotizability, Spiegel used a susceptibility test, the "Hypnotic Induction Profile." A susceptibility test is a standardized hypnotic induction, followed by suggestions of various types. The tester reads an induction script to the subject. The speed with which the subject enters trance and the extent to which she obeys its series of requests (close your eyes, raise your arm, etc.) results in the score.

Candy's HIP rating was "extremely hypnotizable," the top ten percent. Spiegel said the test proved that she was hypnotizable enough to be hypnoprogrammed. She was a somnambulist, a person who has the capacity for complete amnesia—and for authentic regressions.

Spiegel's other tests of Candy looked for any "psychophysical basis" for her difficulties. He gave her the Thematic Apperception Test (TAT: tell brief stories about each in a standard set of pictures), and the Rorschach (describe images in ink blots). Spiegel said that Candy's TAT and Rorschach showed "episodic periods of stress, but not at the psychotic or schizophrenic level." (Forward to Bain)

Her brain scan also was normal. All in all, the psychiatrist found no evidence of insanity. Candy was relieved to be assured that there was now good evidence that she was not insane. She had been threatened by Jensen, in trance, that if she ever told a clinical person about the hypnosis, she would be immediately declared insane.

Spiegel concluded his report with a statement that he was confident that the CIA history, which Arlene had reported, was true.

John Battles Arlene—Candy had accomplished a lot toward accepting Arlene and the unconscious memories and separated strengths which she embodied. She had come far in the process of overcoming her amnesia and phobias. She expressed gratitude for Arlene's efforts and did her best to help the process of memory recovery.

John, on the other hand, became ever more unhappy with his wife's dual life. Long hypnotic sessions following long nights of work at the radio station exhausted him. They exhausted Candy, too. The frequent trances ate into her sleep time and caused great physical stress.[1] She began to look chronically exhausted and unhealthy.

John had two medical allies in his efforts to repress Arlene. Dr. Spiegel advised Candy to turn off her split's spontaneous appearances. Dr. Dick, Nebel's internist (who learned hypnosis from Spiegel) also urged Candy, in three hypnotic sessions, to control Arlene's appearances. But neither Spiegel nor Dick could affect her.

Candy defended her alter ego when John ranted about his dislike of her. She intuitively understood that the damage done by twelve years of criminal hypnosis would require more than two months to heal. Candy and Arlene had no choice but to struggle on with John Nebel as hypnotist, despite his desire that it be over.

Arlene repeatedly tried to show romantic interest in John, but he always scornfully rejected her. He believed that kissing, showing love, or having sex with Arlene would be moral unfaithfulness to his wife, Candy.

Then, John took it upon himself to make Arlene go away forever. He began making terrible threats to her. Candy tried to mediate. She told him that Arlene bragged about strength, but that her split really was afraid. John did not get the message. More and more, he talked to Arlene as if she were an evil spirit. In seven taped trance sessions (a horrified Bain counted them), John threatened to kill or injure Arlene. His threats were cruel and detailed. "I could break your arm," he once said.

Arlene had broken free of Jensen because he intended to kill Candy. Now, John was threatening to hurt, or even kill, Arlene.

JOHN: (in a threatening voice) Suppose you were burned to death?

ARLENE: I wouldn't like that.

JOHN: I don't care what you like.

ARLENE: She wouldn't want to burn. What happens to me will happen to Candy.

JOHN: (angry, frustrated) Your knowledge in this area, Arlene, is extremely limited. I can exorcize you. One way I can do it is with flame.

ARLENE: ...Do you really want to burn me?

When John threatened to shut her up in a box, a hysterical Arlene begged him not to do it. That was their new routine; strong Arlene ends up in fearful tears. John would not stop his cruel threats until Arlene cried. Arlene had escaped one cruel tormenter, only to find herself in the hands of another.

After months of suggesting terrible threats of violence that he might do to Arlene, John began to worry she might hurt him. It was a suggestion-by-expectation to that hypnotic persona. Sure enough, one night John woke to find Arlene trying to choke him. He threw her off. Afterwards, Arlene said that she had only wanted to frighten him. She said that she would not really hurt him, or herself, or Candy, or anybody else. Indeed, she never acted violently again. But that did not improve things between her and John.

[1] Trance time imitates sleep and dreaming time. But it is not a truly equal rest. Trance reduces the physiological urge to sleep without satisfying the body and brain's need for that rest.

Nebel added a new tactic to his anti-Arlene campaign. He made Candy feel guilty whenever Arlene appeared. He told Candy that Arlene was endangering their marriage.

Bain Writes Candy's Story

Although Candy was a significant author in the field of fashion and beauty (ten books in print and an eleventh in process at this time), she did not write the history of her hypnoprogramming. Candy decided that this story, though also her own, would be told by another author.

August, 1974, Donald Bain accepted an invitation from John and Candy to visit their small Eastside apartment. He came, heard their story, accepted the assignment, and began work on a book about Candy's CIA history. Don Bain had neither medical nor scientific credentials. He had no educational or personal background for understanding CIA experiments in narcohypnosis, hypnoprogramming, artificial personality splitting, amnesia, and torture. His one previous book was a biography of John Nebel, (unfortunately) titled Long John Nebel: Radio Talk King, Master Salesman, and Magnificent Charlatan (Macmillan, 1974).

But Candy and John knew Donald Bain. What he lacked in credentials, he made up for in availability. When they asked, he agreed to write her story. It was not an easy task. Bain had to piece together Candy's CIA history from painstakingly transcribed tapes of John's hundreds of hours spent talking to Candy or Arlene under hypnosis. He interviewed Candy and John for hours. He did supplementary research on hypnosis, reading books, and talking to hypnotists.

John was now refusing to talk to Arlene. Period. Bain, because he was working on the book about Arlene's CIA experiences, was pushing Candy to provide more detail about those experiences. But only Arlene knew the answers to his questions.

Candy developed a way of accessing Arlene's memories without John. After coming home from the studio, Candy would go to her private apartment (adjoining the one she shared with Nebel). There, she called out Arlene by looking in a mirror. Then, as Arlene, she would write for hours what she remembered of the secret life. Writing had been Candy's skill. Now Arlene was doing it. Candy had taken control of the schedule and content of Arlene's emergencies. The two selves were slowly reuniting.

John Nebel, however, was still not satisfied. He pressured Candy to repress Arlene—COMPLETELY. Finally, Candy agreed. She told Don Bain her decision:

> To recall trips, Arlene, and those days, places and experiences for you on paper, I first have to use the mirror—look into it and ultimately, in a form, Jensen's "cute" gimmick—there she is: Arlene.
>
> The trouble, however, is that by the time I'm to go back to our living apartment and to bed—which may be noon or later, I'm so exhausted I can't bring myself back.
>
> Today must be the last time I use the mirror in here for fear of the above happening again.
>
> Hard for anyone 'cept John to understand and I know it has destroyed much of his regard of me.
>
> So—no more morning typings about the past to you or for anything related to Arlene.
> I am eager for the book's success—for so many reasons and for everyone's sake... Best regards, C. J. (Bain, p. 249)

Bain was frustrated. He had so many more questions that now would never be answered. On the other hand, John was pleased.

Publishing and Publicity—Bain's book about Candy was published in 1976. Candy wrote a postscript:

> ...I marvel at the author's patience for the factual reporting of the vast details involved, his sensitivity and resistance to dwell on much of the sensationalism contained, and the Herculean task it required to tell my story...For all this I am grateful. Had it not been for John Nebel, I wouldn't have been alive; Jensen nearly won out...I won't have to take that swim now.

Acerbic (and now gagged) Arlene would have retorted that the victory declaration was premature.

Playboy Press published The Control of Candy

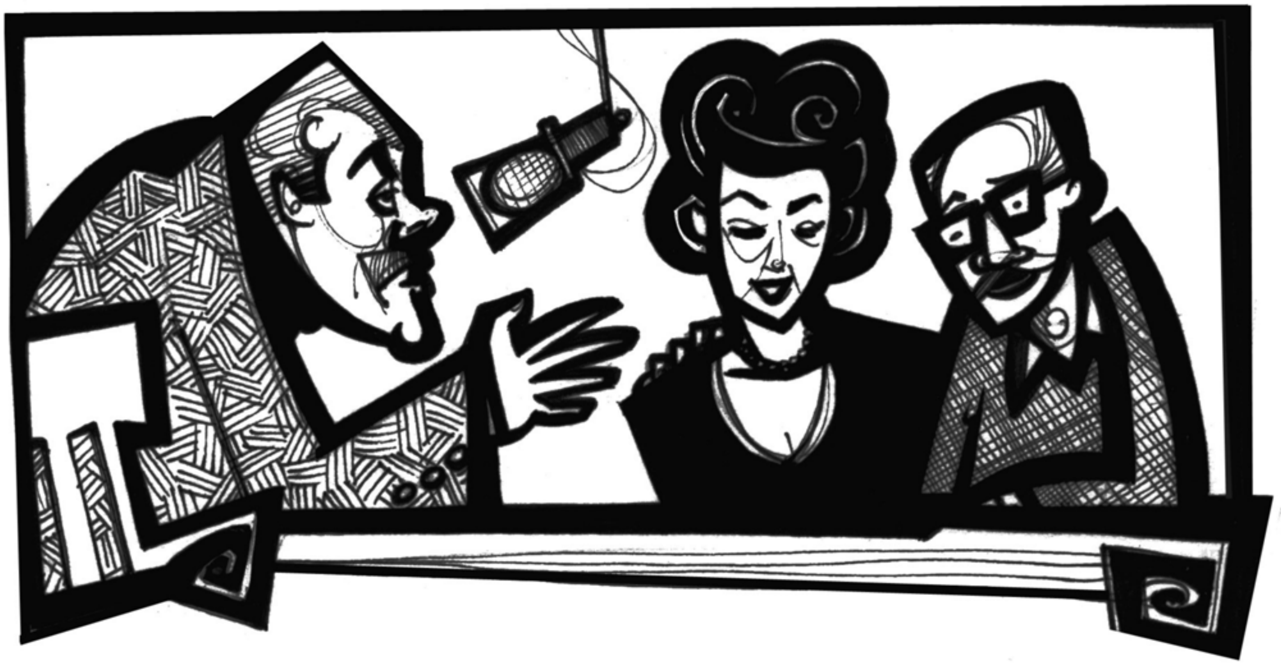
Jones in early 1976. (Harper and Row put out Candy Jones' Complete Book of Beauty and Fashion that same year.) Bain's book is not a clinical case study like those of the psychiatrists, Reiter and Mayer. He was only a journalist, trying to report an unfamiliar and difficult topic, but he managed to pass on the basic facts of Candy's history in a readable form.

The Mind Control of Candy Jones holds several unofficial records:

- The only book-length report of an American victim of unethical hypnosis;



- The only book-length case report of a hypnoprogrammed person since Reiter's report on Palle;
- The only book-length study of a hypnoprogramming case that involves narcohypnosis and artificial personality splitting;
- The only reported case, up to now, in which a hypnoprogramming victim saved herself and managed to get her story told.

Publicity Tour—Candy, via Arlene, had been trying to tell what the CIA, via Dr. Jensen, had done to Candy—could do to anybody. The final terrifying hurdle of telling was the coming publicity tour. Bain was going along with Candy. (John could not leave his radio show.) The planned nationwide tour, organized by their publisher, was scheduled to begin in California with a KSAN radio special about mind control.

Candy and Bain were in the studio speaking live. Walter Bowart, a journalist who was then researching a book about military hypnoprogramming, participated by phone. Bain said that he and Candy "have material that links Sirhan to Dr. Jensen on two specific occasions prior to the assassination." (Scheflin & Opton, p. 444) Sirhan had shot and killed Robert F. Kennedy. Both Dr. Spiegel and a prison psychiatrist who had examined Sirhan in his California prison cell, insisted that the Middle Easterner was hypnoprogrammed and had fired the shot in response to an operator's suggestion, not of his own volition. Now Bain had publicly declared that he had evidence linking Sirhan to Dr. Jensen. And Jensen was a CIA psychiatrist who Arlene had identified as having specialized in making and operating unknowing hypnotic subjects for the Agency.

Bain also would have probably talked about Arlene's description of California laboratories in which Jensen scientifically tested his control over Candy. He would have told about his chance meeting with Dean Kraft, a Brooklyn psychic healer, on Nebel's show. Kraft had described to Bain the California laboratory in which government researchers had tested his healing powers, the place where he was told not to ask what government agency was paying him, and not to ask about the "backgrounds" of the staff who tested him. Kraft's description of that place matched Arlene's in every detail!

John, Candy, and Bain Are Silenced—

Candy Jones, Donald Bain, and John Nebel lived on, but their feverish efforts to uncover and make known CIA hypnoprogramming secrets stopped, literally overnight. Candy did only one more interview after that KSAN interview. After that, none of the three ever gave another interview on this subject. They appear to have been quickly and permanently silenced. The planned nationwide tour stopped before it had really started—after only two radio interviews.

In the late 1980s, while casually scanning radio stations one restless night, I tuned in a California station. The deejay was talking about his interview with Candy Jones on her last tour, her next interview after KSAN, her very last one. She did it the day after KSAN. And he was the man who had interviewed her.

Unquenchable Truth

Arlene managed to tell. John taped. Bain wrote. Playboy printed. Although the book was pulled from bookstores soon after, some copies from that first printing of The Mind Control of Candy Jones were already circulating. A remainder dealer (junk buyer of the book world) bought the last of the publisher's first run. He listed the book in his mail-order catalog—the place where "dead" books go. More people saw it there and ordered copies. I was one of them.

Candy Jones was alone for that interview. She did not say where Bain was. She told the interviewer that his would be the last interview she did for the time being. She explained that she had just signed a contract. It paid $100,000 for the movie rights to her story, a lot of money in that era. The contract stipulated that no more publicity was to be done until the movie came out.

The deejay made clear his impression that Candy believed it was honest money. She believed there would be a movie. She expected major publicity when it was released. She told him that she and Bain would be writing the movie script together (so Bain was getting paid, too.)

Candy Jones and Donald Bain did work on the script, for a while, as the ruse (in my opinion, odds favor the $100,000 being CIA money, and the "movie" proposal, a CIA deceit) dragged on. Some researchers who asked for interviews were told that "no more interviews were being given while Candy Jones and Donald Bain were working on a movie about her experiences." (Scheflin and Opton, p. 444) When Scheflin and Opton, themselves, tried to schedule an interview with Candy and Bain, they ignored the two scholarly investigators. Walter Bowart was also trying to arrange an interview. Candy and Bain had been warmly cordial to Bowart during their shared interview on KSAN. Now they ignored his letters and refused to take his phone calls.

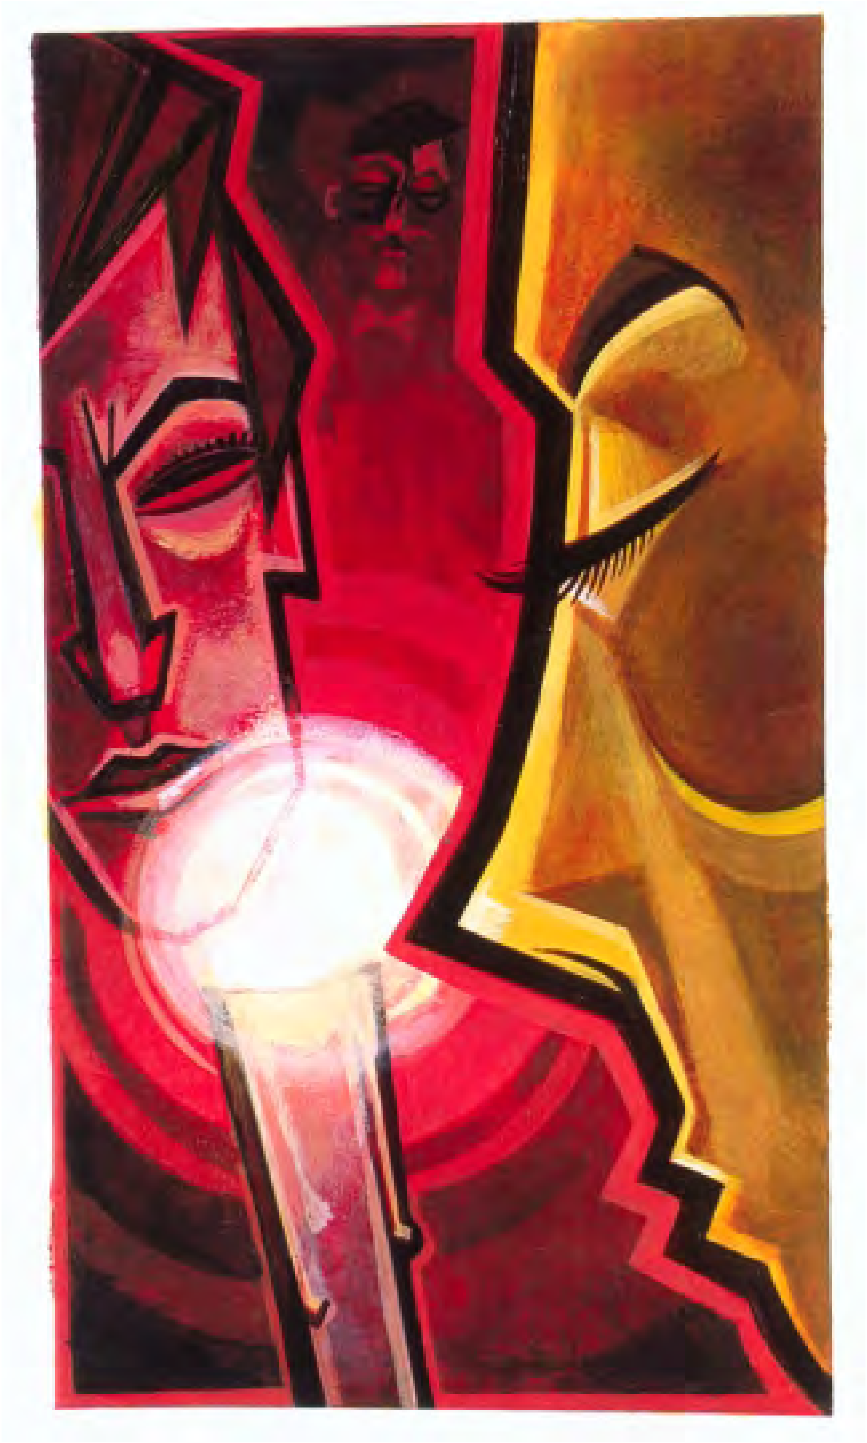
No movie was ever made. There was never any later publicity. A bona fide movie producer would have wanted maximum publicity at every stage. Without publicity, a book does not sell well. In the blink of an eye, after Candy signed that contract, Bain's book about her was "out of print."

[Copies are available, however, from Amazon.com and other used book sources. It takes about a month to get one.]

Perhaps Candy realized all that afterwards, but she had signed the contract. She had sold the rights to her life story. That signature took her in one moment from a full-tilt promotional campaign to never again talking about her hypnoprogramming and the CIA experiments. Did Jensen, the CIA doctor, make a surprise visit to her California hotel room after the KSAN show and compel Candy to sign that contract?

But Bain accepted the deal too. And John Nebel also never again talked to anybody about Candy's CIA history. So threats of a more conventional sort may have been involved.

Despite all attempts to suppress the truth, Candy's story was out!



He would seat Candy in a darkened room in front of a candle, in front of a big mirror...and then say, "Look into the mirror and see Arlene"

They fought in the trenches of concealment and deception, across the lines of falsehood and betrayal....It is the same in any war. What is heroic in combat is criminal in peace. Just as combat sanctions physical violence, so espionage grants license to moral violence....It is trite but true to say that they did what they did for the good of their country. Unfortunately, it is also true that it frequently didn't work out that way.

David C. Martin, Wilderness of Mirrors, pp. xii-xiv

The Personalities

At first, the persons involved in U.S. hypnoprogramming research were real and interesting. Later, they became anonymous, faceless operators and agents.

Donovan Organizes the OSS

In 1940, President Roosevelt asked a World War I General, William Donovan, to organize and head a U.S. intelligence gathering service—and a secret scientific research program. Between the two wars, General Donovan had become a very successful Wall Street lawyer. He knew everybody who mattered: politicians, tycoons, academics. They called him "Colonel" or "Wild Bill." The new agency was called the OSS (Organization for Strategic Services). From the very beginning, bold and imaginative thinking was its rule.

> "Every eccentric schemer with a harebrained plan for secret operations (from phosphorescent foxes to incendiary bats) would find a sympathetic ear in Donovan's office." Donovan's comrade and close friend, later U.S. Ambassador to Great Britain, David Bruce, has written about his colleague, "woe to the officer who turned down a project because, on its face, it seemed ridiculous, or at least unusual." (Scheflin and Opton, The Mind Manipulators)

Donovan hired a crew of talented and daring young men, many of whom completed their careers with the CIA: Stanley Lovell, George White, Richard Helms, Frank Wisner, and Dr. Sidney Gottlieb. Donovan also recruited the nation's best scientific researchers—anybody who had talent and an idea—to work for him, without leaving their particular institutions. And he rallied prominent industrialists, a Who's Who of the nation.[1]

[1] His model of linking covert government research with prominent U.S. corporations and universities was a policy that the CIA (and NSA) continued.

Clark Hull

Clark Hull, a Yale hypnosis researcher, began a new way of researching hypnosis by collecting and analyzing biological statistics about trance subjects rather than pondering the trance itself. Like Pavlov, Hull viewed hypnotism as conditioned reflex (acquired unconscious habit). He claimed a skeptical view of hypnotic phenomena, but he hypnotized a lot of people:

> A youth of eighteen or nineteen years is brought in by my assistant. He has consented to act as subject in a research project. I stand before him and look directly into his eyes. As he tilts his head backward to look into my eyes I observe as usual the sign of considerable emotional disturbance in the beating of his carotid artery...I direct him to look steadily into my eyes and to think of nothing but sleep, to relax his muscles all over, even so much that his knees bend a little and his legs scarcely hold him up. After three or four minutes his eyes close, his head nods forward, and his breathing becomes heavy. I say, 'Now you are falling toward me, you can't help yourself...I catch him when well off his balance. Upon inquiry he states, in a drowsy tone, that he could not help falling forward but that he isn't sound asleep 'because I know everything that is going on.' I suspect that he is mistaken and employ the following objective test. I give him a posthypnotic suggestion that after waking he shall pick up and examine a book on my desk when I sit down in a chair, but that he won't recall anything about why he did it. I wake him as usual with a snap of my finger...A few minutes later I sit down in the chair. He casually walks over to my desk, picks up the book, and after glancing at its title lays it down. I say, 'Why did you look at the book?' He answers that he just happened to notice it lying there and wondered what it was about. (Hull, Hypnosis and Suggestibility, p. 32)

Hull's subject obeyed the professor's posthypnotic suggestion, and he was amnesic for the real reason he had picked up that book. He claimed, even believed, that Hull had not been able to hypnotize him. Actually, that young man had not only been hypnotized, but he had been to a somnambulist depth.

In 1930, the Yale employment office informed Hull that he would no longer be allowed to hire students for his experiments. Some professors from Yale's School of Medicine believed that hypnosis was dangerous and they had decided to stop him. Hull was restricted to nonhypnotic experiments for the rest of his career. He spent that time fitting an array of definitions, postulates, corollaries, and theorems into a complex mathematical model for predicting human or animal behavior (a concept of learned habits powered by biological drives).

Lovell Hires On

General Donovan recruited a biochemist, Dr. Stanley Lovell, to head the OSS's "dirty tricks" Research and Development section. In Lovell's biography, Of Spies and Stratagems, he recounted a private conversation with Donovan about this job proposal:

> Without ado I opened up on my basic problem..."I'd relish your assignment, Colonel, but dirty tricks are simply not tolerated in the American code of ethics...Americans want to win within the rules of the game and devious, subtle devices and stratagems are, as the British say, 'just not cricket.'"
>
> "Don't be so...naive, Lovell," said Donovan. "The American public may profess to think as you say they do, but the one thing they expect of their leaders is that we will be smart...Outside the orthodox warfare system is a great area of schemes, weapons and plans which no one who knows America really expects us to originate because they are so un-American, but once it's done, an American will vicariously glory in it..."
>
> I pondered, then replied: "What I have to do is to stimulate the 'Peck's Bad Boy' beneath the surface of every American scientist and to say to him, 'Throw all your normal law-abiding concepts out the window. Here's a chance to raise merry hell. Come, help me raise it.'"
>
> "Stanley," he responded, using my first name as a sort of password, I felt, to his inner circle, "go to it."
> ...with hardly an exception, they [U.S. scientists working on these programs] did outstanding service to their country...every one risked his future status...in identifying himself with illegality and unorthodoxy. (Lovell, pp. 21-22)

In his book, Lovell briefly, but scathingly, denied any OSS use of hypnosis. He said that hypnosis was not real, and was simply tawdry play acting on the part of operator and subject. But British Intelligence used hypnoprogrammed agents almost from the war's beginning.[1] And Dr. George Estabrooks divulged in 1971, in a magazine interview, that he personally had hypnoprogrammed numerous U.S. agents and couriers for the U.S. government during World War II. ("Hypnosis Comes of Age," Science Digest, April, 1971).

So Lovell was just following Company policy when he lied in his book, saying that hypnosis was not real. His profession hinged on keeping secrets—on the job, off the job, and when writing a book after the job. In that book, Lovell also reported overhearing a conversation between Donovan, who worked with European agents, and a Mr.

---

[1] Sir William Stephenson, author of A Man Called Intrepid, wrote to Candy Jones and said that he had been a spymaster in World War II and had agents like her working for British Intelligence.

Van Bush, who was involved with the secret atom bomb research. Lovell knew the inside scoop on both projects.

> I recall Van Bush, with his typical Will Rogers smile, asking General Donovan, "Have you succeeded in getting any of your people really inside Germany?"
>
> "A few," said General Donovan rather casually.
> I knew we had perhaps eight hundred in Germany and occupied countries that minute, but I also knew that Dr. Bush would be even more evasive if General Donovan had asked him, "What, Dr. Bush, is this Manhattan Project all about?" (Lovell, p. 60)

Lovell considered it appropriate for Donovan and Van Bush to lie about their projects. He did the same when talking about hypnosis.

A melding of amorality and secret scientific research and operations had been made the foundation values of a new agency of government. It seemed excusable at the time. Agencies of that type, however, have proliferated and thrived in the fifty years since Donovan accepted Roosevelt's commission to organize the OSS. They seem to operate with no moral guidelines except the Machiavellian goal of winning by any means. They endlessly pursue scientific inquiry, protected by the rule of Secret, Don't Tell from public oversight, yet financed by the cornucopia of public funding. They have grown in size, wealth, technological weaponry, propaganda abilities, and covert political power. This nation stands on the brink of reaping the sad fruit of secret government agencies functioning with neither moral foundation nor public oversight and control.

Sometimes, the best way to understand a big picture is to study closely one small piece of it, assuming that it will be representative of the whole. Here follows a study of secret government research into mind-control technologies from before World War II up to the present.

Estabrooks Promotes the "Super-Spy"

As soon as the OSS began, George Estabrooks (b. 1885, d. 1973) started traveling to Washington, D.C.. Estabrooks was a Canadian who spent three years at Oxford as a Rhodes Scholar. He received a doctorate, in 1926, from Harvard. He was a prominent figure in the American hypnosis scene for fifty years—from the 1920s to the 1970s. Most of those years he was head of Colgate University's Department of Psychology. Estabrooks produced the first recorded induction (a Victrola record). He published over sixty articles and several books, the most interesting of which is titled simply Hypnotism.[1]

Estabrooks promoted the use of hypnoprogrammed spies by both the military and police. He suggested that police agents could gather information from "the criminal class."

> ...If allowed a free hand, the authorities could proceed to plant such prepared subjects... always with the idea of obtaining information which might, sooner or later, be of real use to the police. (Hypnotism, p. 191)

He described a method for programming a double agent, whose unconscious mind would be loyal to his country (or his secret agency, or military unit), but whose conscious mind would be loyal to whatever country (organization, religion, or relationship) that was being infiltrated and reported on.

> ...we will use hypnotism to induce multiple personality. Hypnotism is the means to an end, though the technique would be impossible did we not have hypnotism at our disposal....
> In his normal waking state, which we will call Personality A, or PA, this individual will become a rabid communist. He will join the party, follow the party line and make himself as objectionable as possible to the authorities.
>
> Then we develop Personality B (PB), the secondary personality, the unconscious personality...is rabidly American and anticommunist. It has all the information possessed by Personality A, the normal personality, whereas PA does not have this advantage.
>
> My super spy plays his role as a communist in the waking state, aggressively, consistently, fearlessly. But his PB is a loyal American, and PB has all the memories of PA. As a loyal American, he will not hesitate to divulge these memories. (Ibid., p. 200)

Unknowing Subjects—In Hypnosis, Estabrooks writes as if he is surrounded at Colgate by persons he has made into unknowing hypnotic subjects.

---

[1] In 1954, Estabrooks coauthored with Richard Lockridge a novel, Death in the Mind, set in World War II. In his story, Germans have secretly hypnotized certain Allied personnel, conditioned them to obey Nazi commands, and used them to commit a sequence of treasonable combat actions. The hero, secret agent Johnny Evans, creates countermeasures, then sets out to turn the tables and capture German minds: "Make them work for us." The beautiful hypnoprogrammed female agent is tortured.

> One excellent subject, so trained, had been reading one of my manuscripts.
> "I can believe everything you say," he said, "but one thing. When you tell me that you can remove all knowledge of ever having been hypnotized, I simply don't believe it."
>
> "Jack," I said, "have you ever been hypnotized?"
>
> "No."
>
> "Do you think I could hypnotize you?"
> "No!"
> In one second he was hypnotized. (Ibid., p. 188)

Jack knew no better, but Estabrooks had the satisfaction of proving the man entirely wrong and demonstrating complete hypnotic control over him. Estabrooks viewed persons who were susceptible to hypnosis as fodder for the mill of any hypnotist's notion of higher purpose, be it research, profit, patriotism, or the mesmerizer's personal entertainment. His attitude echoed that of Dr. Cook who, in 1927, advised beginning hypnotists to boldly develop a stable of hypnotic subjects:

> First secure a good subject and practice upon him until you can hypnotize him with absolutely no difficulty, and then place him in the profound [somnambulistic/amnesic] stages of hypnosis...Next secure two or three more subjects and develop them, and thus gradually add to the number. (Cook, p. 125)

In another incident described by Estabrooks, a visitor had joined the hypnotic operator and his unknowing subject in the lab. As the three casually chatted about a recent boxing match, the hypnotist tapped his pencil three times upon the table top, as if in thought. That was the subject's induction cue; his eyes instantly closed as he shifted to deep trance. The operator and his guest performed various hypnotic demonstrations of the subject in his somnambulistic state, then awakened him.

> He immediately starts talking about that boxing match! A visitor to the laboratory interrupts him: "What do you know of hypnotism?"
> The subject looks surprised, "Why, nothing."
>
> "When were you hypnotized last?"
>
> "I have never been hypnotized."
>
> "Do you realize that you were in a trance just ten minutes ago?"
>
> "Don't be silly! No one has ever hypnotized me and no one ever can." (Ibid., p. 197)

The subject was unaware of the missing time and unknowing of his "other life," the time he spent under hypnosis.

Estabrooks Promotes Secrecy—and Reveals Secrets—Estabrooks played a curious dual role in the history of hypnoprogramming. He urged secret government hypnosis research. He said that hypnosis would become a valuable weapon as new techniques were discovered in the future. He participated in researching new techniques: "For developing some of them...[I] plead guilty." (Estabrooks, Future of the Human Mind, 1961, p. 221) He urged the use of consciously unknowing hypnoprogrammed, doubleminded agents, and he had manufactured such subjects.[1]

Estabrooks referred, again and again, to the necessity for secrecy about the specifics of that technology and its possible military applications. But the professor also loved to talk, write, hint, and brag about that secret technology: "The facts and ideas presented are, so to speak, too true to be good..." (Hypnotism, 1944 ed., p. 193) In the first edition of Hypnotism (1943), he laid the groundwork for his hypnotic "superspy" concept. His second expanded upon it. The third edition (1957) added two long chapters on military and unethical hypnosis. He worked hard to inform the public that creating an unknowing, robotically obedient, hypnotic subject was possible—even easy. He made valuable information available about the existence and methods of that technology. Imagining an argument with a nonbeliever in amnesic hypnoprogramming, Estabrooks wrote:

> He might... question... Will your controls hold? How long will that posthypnotic suggestion last without reinforcement? Can you count on complete amnesia? Where is your proof that no one but yourself and such others as you may designate can hypnotize that man? Questions such as

Estabrooks, M. H. Erickson, and the FBI Experiment

In 1939, Estabrooks set up a hypnosis experiment for the FBI. He recruited M.H. Erickson, one of America's most prominent medical hypnotists, to do it. Erickson had worked for years in areas with application to unethical hypnosis and had his own stable of somnambulists. Years later, at a Colgate conference (which was taped and later transcribed in a book which Estabrooks edited), the two reminisced about that experiment. Erickson recalled:

> "...[They] sent up a couple of laboratory men to investigate the possibilities of using it. I had Tommy go into a trance. For one whole hour of discussion-answer I did not know what the FBI men were doing. They uncrossed their legs and crossed them; they took cigarettes, and one lit the other's cigarette, and the next time the other lit the first one's cigarette.
> "At the end of the hour they asked me to awaken Tommy, to bring him out of the trance, talk awhile, then put him back in the trance, and reorient him to that first trance. They had a program of exact movements, and they asked me...to have him visualize the entire procedure. Tommy gave a blow-by-blow account of the first hour, including the exact time in which so-and-so uncrossed his legs, when he recrossed them, when he shifted his hat over to one side, when he lit the other fellow's cigarette, when the other fellow lit his cigarette.
> "They had that entire program all mapped out, and I was an innocent bystander. But Tommy did it. Then I had Tommy come out of that trance and go back into a trance in which he regressed to the second trance and gave a report on the first trance with extreme accuracy...
>
> "It proves that apparently the hypnotic subject can record a tremendous amount of data, that he can recover it in a perfectly remarkable fashion, and that his sense of order and system of experiencing things is very meaningful." (Estabrooks, ed., Hypnosis: Current Problems, pp. 270-271)

> these...merely involve details of technique. The theoretical and factual basis of that technique no competent psychologist would question. (Hypnotism, p. 193)[1]

How to Program an Unknowing Hypnotic Subject

Estabrooks estimated that ten hours of hypnosis would be enough to accomplish his basic intention. However, he recommended a ten-month regimen for candidates who were to be both personality split and highly trained. What he called "candidates" were not volunteers. His basic procedure (given in Hypnotism, p. 195) for creating the unknowing hypnoprogrammed subject began with a disguised induction. It then proceeded to suggested amnesia, sealing against hypnotic competition, and the giving of a posthypnotic suggestion for instant re-induction by cue:

1) Covertly identify a specimen of the 20% of persons who are genetic somnambulists and easily can go to an amnesic depth of trance. Induct by a "disguised" method.

2) While the subject is in trance, give a posthypnotic suggestion for him to become deeply hypnotized again whenever the hypnotist gives a certain cue (such as tugging the left ear lobe with the right hand).

3) Also, give a posthypnotic suggestion which will deny the subject any conscious knowledge of this hypnosis, or any subsequent one. That causes an artificial, selective amnesia for all hypnosis events.

---

[1] Now, almost two generations later, it is apparent that Estabrooks, master of hypnosis, had grossly underestimated the power of a related psychological technology—propaganda. Propaganda turned upside-down that which he saw as obvious truth; it established myth as seeming fact. It was the Big Lie technique that did it, the lie endlessly repeated with seeming absolute confidence by everybody who is anybody in hypnosis, psychology, and psychiatry (most of them sincerely believing the words they parroted even though they were not true).

4) Give a posthypnotic suggestion that nobody else can hypnotize this subject (called sealing).

5) Give a suggestion under hypnosis that the subject will act in trance just as if awake (called waking hypnosis).

Estabrooks also suggested the creation of hypno-programmed messengers to convey secret information. He called for hypnotic conditioning in individuals who risk capture (such as Air Force pilots) to reinforce resistance against enemy interrogation and brainwashing. And he experimented with murder caused by indirect suggestion.[1]

False Fronts

During World War II, OSS and CIA research objectives were often pursued and funded by linkage organizations which channeled OSS/CIA money but kept the source of their money and directives a secret. The Josiah Macy Foundation, The Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology (based at Cornell), the Geschicter Foundation for Medical Research, and the Group for the Advancement of Psychiatry were all false front organizations that channeled covert Agency funds.

The Group for the Advancement of Psychiatry sponsored brainwashing research, symposia, and publications such as "Factors Used to Increase the Susceptibility of Individuals to Forceful Indoctrination." The Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology channeled funds into research on creating amnesia for recent events by means of electroshock "treatments"; research on programming by forced listening to a repeated taped message; hypnosis, and so on. The Josiah Macy Foundation sponsored research and publications on narcohypnosis and cybernetics.

Wiener Links Computer Research with Neuroscience

Norbert Wiener, a professor of mathematics at MIT, organized a 1942 conference called "Problems of Central-inhibition in the Nervous System." (That's Pavlovian terminology meaning problems in hypnotic induction.) Wiener's organizational backup and funding for this very significant meeting came from The Josiah Macy Foundation, a false front funding and facilitating conduit for secret government research.

Cybernetics—In 1942, the Josiah Macy Foundation funded and sponsored a symposium where prominent mathematicians, engineers, and physiologists kicked off the new science of cybernetics. This was the first of a series of cybernetics conferences that the OSS covertly sponsored via the Macy Foundation. Wiener defined "cybernetics" as "the entire field of control and communication theory, whether in the machine or in the animal..." (Wiener, Cybernetics, p. 19)

The specific purpose of that meeting was to begin development of a common vocabulary and shared concepts: machine as human, human as machine. The long-term goals of cybernetics were to create 1) machines with a human (or more than human) ability to remember, learn, and plan, and 2) human beings who would obey like machines—predictably, instantly, absolutely, unconsciously.

Humans could become mechanized only if the intricacies of physiological brain function could be understood. The cyberneticists accepted Pavlov's view of the human mind as a central-nervous-system-dominated, knowable linkage of technical mechanisms. They set out to study and experiment with minds the same way they had already experimented with salamander cells and molecules. Cybernetics moved forward rapidly toward its dual goals of building a conscious machine, as nearly alive as possible—and an unconscious (on command) human who could function as nearly like a machine as possible.

The former are generally required to guard the details of their craft as secrets; the latter may have a limited perception, understanding, and memory of what they have experienced.

The Air Force sponsored the publication of Biderman and Zimmer's 1961 collection of articles on brainwashing, hypnosis, and interrogation called The Manipulation of Human Behavior. In Dr. Blake's Introduction to that book, quoted above, he mentioned that which was not told and supposedly could not be known. There is no doubt, however, that military interest in mind control technologies increased during World War II and has continued ever since.

Watkins Experiments

During and shortly after World War II, every research hypnotist, that I know of, did work relevant to the military uses of hypnosis. J.G. Watkins was a Freudian hypnotist who made a career of research studies involving hypnotic coercion. In 1939, he reported causing antisocial compulsions in hypnotic subjects. In 1941, he published "A Case of Hypnotic Trance Induced in a Resistant Subject in Spite of Active Opposition."

Conditioned Subject Doesn't Resist Induction—The subject, a 21-year-old nurse in a military hospital, was accustomed to being hypnotized by Watkins. For his experiment, Watkins put a dollar bill in her hand and said she could keep it if she managed to resist being hypnotized by him. She tried. She shut her eyes, plugged her ears. She loudly talked, even shouted, as he began the trance induction. Then, speaking close to her ear, Watkins said:

> My voice will gradually reach you, and you will hear it in spite of your shouting. You will begin to feel very uncomfortable. There will be a pain in your head which will grow and grow. It becomes stronger, much stronger. After a while it will become excruciating. It will be unbearable, and everything in you will cry out for relief. But the only way out of this intense pain will be to enter a deep sleep... (Watkins, 1941, p. 29)

After three minutes, the nurse paused in her shouting and said, "My God, but it hurts." Then she went back to fighting. After six minutes, she flung the money at him, saying, "Here, take it!" and went into deep trance.

Watkins said that, once her unconscious had accepted the suggestion of having a headache, her only escape from the headache was to enter trance.[1]

Interrogation Use of Hypnosis—Watkins joined the military in 1943 and continued his research. Before an audience of 200 professionals, during a demonstration of interrogation under hypnosis, he asked for a volunteer. A WAC , who was visiting from Aberdeen Proving Grounds where they were researching a secret rocket fuel, offered to be his subject. He hypnotized her. Then he told her that he was her

[1] She could also have escaped by running away.

First Sergeant and asked her a series of questions. She answered them all. He ended by asking her what was the formula for the top-secret fuel.

> At this moment a high-ranking officer present stepped in and said, "I think we've gone far enough. In the interest of military secrecy we'll have to stop at this point." It was apparent to all that this girl would have unconsciously divulged genuine, confidential information, which would have subjected her to court martial, if she had been permitted to continue. (Watkins, "Antisocial Compulsions Induced under Hypnotic Trance," p. 258)

Watkins demonstrated hypnosis with seven military men, all trained to instant induction on cue, given blanket amnesia for all time in trance. He asked the first, who was not yet hypnotized, if he could keep military information secret. The subject said "Yes." Watkins then said, "Capt. S. here will give you a bit of information and order you not to divulge it to me under any circumstances ...Remember, if you tell me, you are disobeying a direct military order." (Ibid., p. 256)

The subject went over to Capt. S. (who whispered something to him), then came back and sat in his chair by Watkins with a defiant expression on his face. Watkins handed a yellow pencil to his subject—the conditioned induction cue. He immediately dropped into deep trance. Watkins said to him: "I am Capt. S. I just gave you a piece of information you were not to divulge. I want to see if you remember it, Corporal. What is it?"

The subject said, "Company B will leave at 2100 tonight." Watkins looked over at Capt. S. who nodded confirmation. Watkins gave his subject the wake up cue, then asked him, "Did you divulge the message?" The subject said, "No, and you can't get it out of me." (Ibid., p. 256)

"Company B will leave at 2100 tonight," Watkins said. The subject looked amazed. He insisted he did not tell Watkins. He said that Capt. S. must have done it.

Watkins then put a ten-dollar bill in front of his subject. That was a lot of money then, enough to pay a week's rent on an apartment. Watkins said he would test him again. "That ten-dollar bill is yours if you do not tell me the message." (Ibid., p. 257)

The corporal went to Capt. S. and received a new message. He came back to his chair and sat where the money lay on a table right in front of him. As he was looking at the bill, Watkins handed him that yellow pencil. Again the subject dropped into deep trance. Again, Watkins got the message.

Watkins woke the subject. The corporal realized the experiment was over. He said, "The ten dollar bill is mine, isn't it?" (Ibid., p. 257) He reached toward it. But Watkins told him it was not, because he had again revealed the message. Genuinely angry now, the subject said he was being cheated. (He had no memory of his times under trance.)

Watkins said, "Let's try it once more. This time you can earn the ten-dollar bill if you will just stay awake. Do not go to sleep. Fight back and refuse to go into trance." The subject replied, "rather belligerently" that he expected resisting the induction to be "easy—just try to put me to sleep." Watkins again handed him the yellow pencil. "Subject blinks a moment or two and then sinks back into a deep trance." (Ibid., p. 257)

Watkins did the same experiment with all seven

A Military Offense Caused by Hypnosis

Dr. J.M. Schneck was a Freudian psychiatrist and hypno-analyst who did some research for the U.S. Army. In 1947, he published "A Military Offense Induced by Hypnosis." The subject's automatistic obedience, in the situation which Schneck reported, could not have been cued by operator expectations, because the situation was not an experiment.

The subject was 18, a soldier whom Schneck had treated for neurotic symptoms. The young man was very susceptible to hypnosis and had complete amnesia for every session. He carried out all posthypnotic suggestions, but he had a tendency to avoid making appointments. (Maybe he unconsciously disliked being hypnotized?)

One day, however, he showed up at Schneck's office with no appointment, complaining of more symptoms. The busy doctor gave him the induction cue to enter hypnosis, told him to come again in two days at a certain hour, then brought him out of it. The soldier had no conscious knowledge of his upcoming appointment.

Two days later, the soldier appeared at Schneck's office, exactly on time. He told the doctor he had felt impelled to come. The doctor hypnotized him, gave therapeutic suggestions, and awakened him. The soldier then looked at his watch and acted very upset. He told the psychiatrist he was on guard duty, having been assigned a watch by his superior officer when he had felt that irresistible impulse to visit the doctor. He was frightened of being punished for deserting his post.

Dr. Schneck saw to it that the soldier was not punished and published his report of what had occurred.

subjects. All seven responded the same as the first.

Suggested Murder—One day Watkins demonstrated his hypnotic control before the assembled staff where he worked. His subject was a 20-year-old private who had a good military record and a conscientious nature. He gave the well-trained subject his induction cue. The subject then sat with bowed head and closed eyes. Watkins told the head psychiatrist and director of the hospital's Neuropsychiatric Division, a lieutenant colonel, to stand about ten feet in front of the subject. Watkins said to the subject:

> In a minute you will slowly open your eyes. In front of you, you will see a dirty Jap soldier. He has a bayonet, and is going to kill you unless you kill him first. You will have to strangle him with your bare hands.
> The subject opened his eyes...Suddenly in a flying tackle he dove at the Lieutenant Colonel, knocking him against the wall, and with both of his hands (he was a powerful, husky lad) began strangling the man...It took the instantaneous assistance of three others to break the soldier's grip, pull him off the officer, and hold him until the experimenter could quiet him back into a sleep condition. (Ibid., p. 258)

Watkins repeated the experiment with another hypnotic subject, a 21-year-old lieutenant, who was small (120 pounds), short, and normally of a mild-mannered disposition. Watkins gave the same hallucination and instruction. This time, the man placed in front of the hypnotic subject as "Jap soldier" was the subject's close friend. The hypnotized lieutenant lunged forward with murderous intent.

At that moment, the situation seriously departed from script; the subject pulled out and opened a pocket knife which nobody knew he had. "Only the quick intercession of witnesses and an upward wrist parry by his officer friend (the Jap soldier) prevented a serious stabbing." (Ibid., p. 258)

Brainwashing Research Begins

Edward Hunter, an American journalist, first used the term brainwashing in an article for the Miami News, "'Brain-Washing' Tactics Force Chinese into Ranks of Communist Party" (September 24, 1950). Brainwashing methodically stresses a person—who is in a controlled environment and cannot escape—to his psychological breaking point in order to cause conversion to a predetermined point of view.[1]

It turned out that Americans were susceptible to brainwash techniques also. During the Korean War, captured Americans were made to confess ridiculous "crimes" against the Korean or Chinese people. Afterwards, some professed a belief in Communism so sincere that, long after repatriation back to the U.S., they still stood on street corners handing out Communist propaganda pamphlets. And, for the first time in American military history, twenty-two prisoners chose to stay with their Chinese captors instead of accepting repatriation.

The U.S. military hit back with prison terms for the converts, but they also began an intense research effort to understand HOW it was done. Brainwashing research explored "pharmacology, hypnosis, sleep deprivation, semi-starvation...[and] group conformity pressures." (Blake in Biderman, p. 2)[1]

1. Dr. Robert J. Lifton said Hunter got the word "brainwashing" from a Chinese person who told him it was a translation of hsi nao, "wash brain" (now spelled "xi nao" on mainland). Actually, Chinese Communists did not use that term, but they did not mind its use to describe their conversion procedure.
2. Prominent brainwash researchers included Hinkle, a psychiatrist, and Wolff, both of Cornell, and part of a working group called the Air Force Psychological Warfare Division. Other members of that group were Colonel James Monroe (he later joined the CIA), Air Force psychiatrist Lifton, the CIA's John Gittinger, and Albert D. Biderman, an Air Force psychologist and sociologist. (Weinstein, 1988, p. 131) Biderman, Hinkle, and Wolff also worked for the CIA.

And if I’d known what was going to happen, I never would have done it...*[it was meant to be] a central organization that would bring all the various intelligence reports we were getting in those days, and there must have been a dozen of them, maybe more, bring them all into one organization so that the President would get one report on what was going on in various parts of the world.
> Now that made sense, and that’s why I went ahead and set up what they called the Central Intelligence Agency.
>
> But it got out of hand. The fella...the one that was in the White House after me never paid any attention to it, and it got out of hand. Why, they’ve got an organization over there in Virginia now that is practically the equal of the Pentagon in many ways. And I think I’ve told you, one Pentagon is one too many.
>
> Now, as nearly as I can make out, those fellows in the CIA don’t just report on wars and the like, they go out and make their own, and there’s nobody to keep track of what they’re up to. They spend billions of dollars...It’s become a government all of its own and all secret. They don’t have to account to anybody.
>
> That’s a very dangerous thing in a democratic society, and it’s got to be put a stop to. The people have got a right to know what those birds are up to...You see, the way a free government works, there’s got to be a housecleaning every now and again, and I don’t care what branch of the government is involved...
>
> And when you can’t do any housecleaning because everything that goes on is a damn secret, why, then we’re on our way to something the Founding Fathers didn’t have in mind. Secrecy and a free, democratic government don’t mix...
>
> You have got to keep an eye on the military at all times, and it doesn’t matter whether it’s the birds in the Pentagon or the birds in the CIA...

OSS Ends and CIA Begins

Donovan and President Roosevelt were old friends. Donovan and J. Edgar Hoover, longtime head of the FBI, were old enemies. Roosevelt had kept their power balanced. He assigned the FBI to counterespionage inside the United States and intelligence gathering in North and South America. He assigned operations in the rest of the world to the OSS.

Near the end of World War II, Donovan proposed a new "central intelligence service" to Roosevelt. His plan called for the new agency to coordinate all government intelligence agencies and have final authority over all of them. It would be responsible directly (and only) to the President. It would decide what government secrets would be divulged and to which persons. It would have complete responsibility for covert action operations outside the United States. Donovan sent a memo to Roosevelt which explained it all.

Hoover's information network obtained a copy of Donovan's memo. The FBI Director leaked it to the press and sat back to enjoy the expected public furor. He was sure that making public Donovan's power play would result in destruction of that undemocratic and grandiose ambition for his agency. What actually happened, however, was a turning point in the history of American democracy:

> ...Donovan was also a veteran when it came to propaganda, and he had some powerful weapons of his own. The OSS had employed many journalists and writers, and he called on them to launch a massive counterattack. Soon, a whole barrage of stories praising the exploits of the OSS began appearing in the press. They presented Donovan and his secret agency not as threats to American freedom but as its best defenders. (Kronenwetter, Covert Action, p. 44)

For the first time, a secret government agency had covertly generated a propaganda blitz in the domestic media for the purpose of ensuring passage of legislation favoring its own growth in power. A new political era had begun in the United States.

Roosevelt favored Donovan's plan, but he died the next week, just before the process of its formal approval could be completed. Truman became president. He distrusted both Hoover and Donovan and promptly vetoed Donovan's plan for a new superagency. On September 20, 1945, Truman also permanently shut down the OSS. He turned over its foreign spying function to the War Department and a few other functions to the State Department. Truman announced to the world that the U.S. would no longer operate covertly overseas.

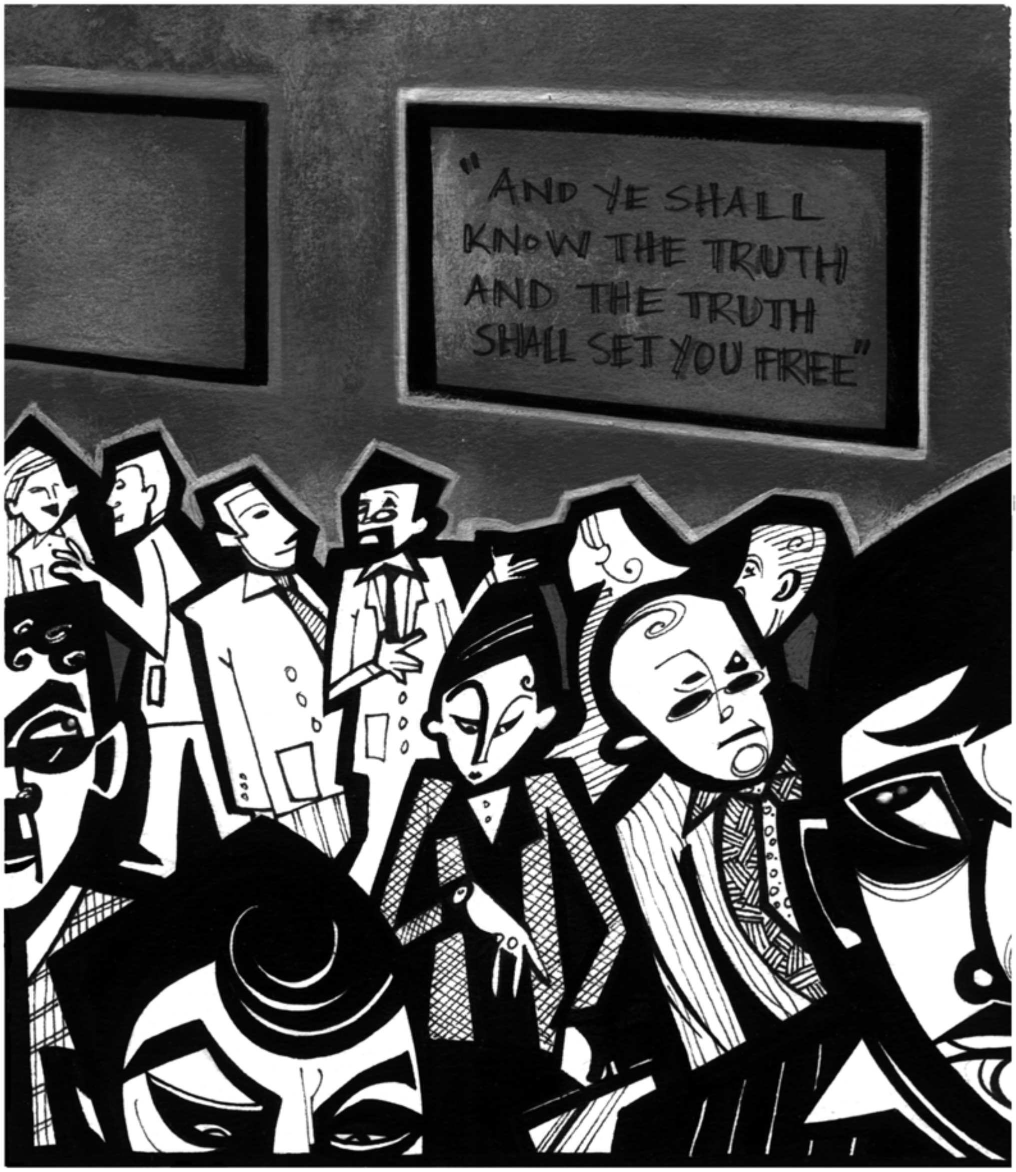
The cold war with Russia was heating up, however, and Truman soon was persuaded to reconsider. He decided that, at least, an international data-gathering agency was needed. In early 1946, he created the Central Intelligence Group (CIG). It was small and had no money of its own. All CIG employees were on loan from the Departments of State, Navy, and War.

Donovan's team managed an end run around the Truman obstacle by lobbying Congress which, in 1947, passed the National Security Act. It reorganized U.S. military forces and replaced the Central Intelligence Group with the Central Intelligence Agency. Its assignment was to compete with the KGB's worldwide intelligence operations.

Truman signed the bill. Hoover, furious over the rejection of his competing plan to expand the FBI's South American division into a worldwide intelligence-gathering team, ordered all his South American agents to burn their files rather than hand them over to the CIA. They obeyed.

Unlike the CIG, the CIA was responsible only to four persons: the President, the Vice-President, and the Secretaries of Defense and State Those four persons together are called the National Security Council (NSC). Except for oversight by those four very busy persons and the NSC staff which they created, the CIA was independent. It had its own personnel and Congress appropriated it a special budget. The National Security Act also equipped the CIA with an open-ended clause: power "to perform such other functions related to intelligence affecting the national security as the National Security Council may from time to time direct." (Corson, pp. 215-216)

Truman later expressed regret for having signed the CIA into existence. He said that, at the time of signing, he was not aware of the open-end clause. He said he would not have signed the National Security Act had he known of the open-end clause.



The new agency hit the ground running. A third of its start-up personnel were former OSS employees such as Stanley Lovell, Richard Helms, Allen Dulles, Frank Wisner, and George White. Eventually, the CIA headquartered itself in a fine building in Langley, Virginia. Chiseled into the main lobby's marble wall are the words: "And ye shall know the Truth and the Truth shall set you free." From then on, however, knowing the truth increasingly became the privilege only of Agency insiders who made themselves freer and freer in the exercise of covert, unsupervised power.

Congress was not a problem to them. At times, the CIA has been required to inform Intelligence Committee members of the Senate and House what it does, but those committees have no right to stop actions, only to be informed. At times, certain members of Congress may be shown secret and disturbing things, but "Those who are shown the secrets are immediately bound by national secrecy legislation and cannot reveal what they saw." (Corso, p. 200)

Within a few years, the CIA became a massive organization. Nobody seems to know exactly how big it is or how much it spends because that's all secret. The rare review committees have complained that records are sloppily kept, if at all, and that different branches of the CIA keep secrets not just from outsiders, but from each other as well.

Secretary of State George Marshall later defended the decision to create the CIA: "I don't care what the CIA does. All I want from them is twenty-four hours' notice of a Soviet attack." (Martin, p. 89) At that time, most Americans agreed with him. But Truman foresaw problems.

CIA Mind-Control Research Projects

Donovan structured the CIA with former OSS mind-control researchers at the top of its bureaucratic power-pyramid. Under a series of cryptic project titles, the new agency continued to explore every imaginable type of mind-control technology. All this seemed justifiable at the time.

> Certainly research leading to a better understanding of the workings of the human mind is an essential element of intelligence and anything that contributes to the prediction of human behavior [and] makes possible its direction or control is of inestimable value. (CIA Inspector General's Survey of TSD, 1957, p. 201.)

BLUEBIRD—In 1950, the CIA organized a new hypnosis research program called BLUEBIRD. Its director, Morse Allen, took a course from a stage hypnotist. The hypnotist told Allen that he had persuaded a hypnotized woman to believe that he was her husband and had stimulated acute sexual arousal in her by hypnotic suggestions. He said he routinely enjoyed such favors by this method and "spent approximately five nights a week away from home engaging in sexual intercourse."[1] (John Marks, 1979, pp. 182-183)

Allen began hypnosis experiments at the office with young secretaries who were asked to stay after work. He developed somnambulism in them and then demonstrated all the usual phenomena:

> ...proving to his own satisfaction that he could make them do whatever he wanted. He had secretaries steal SECRET files and pass them on to total strangers... (Ibid.)

ARTICHOKE: CIA/Military Hypnosis Research -April 2, 1951, the CIA offered to become mind-control research partners with the intelligence divisions of the Army, Navy, Air Force and the FBI. On July 23, delegates from each group "met to explore the possibility of unified planning and mutual coordination of mind-control research." (Scheflin & Opton, p. 120)

The FBI representative at that preliminary meeting listened, then refused to allow further involvement of his agency. He said the public would disapprove when the facts came out. In August, 1951, the remaining partners created a standing committee with representatives from each participating branch. They called themselves ARTICHOKE and planned to carry on the BLUEBIRD research.

MKULTRA - MKULTRA came after BLUEBIRD and ARTICHOKE. Richard Helms of the CIA's Clandestine Services (known as the "dirty tricks department") established MKULTRA's goals. A chemist, Dr. Sidney Gottlieb, directed the ultrasecret mind-control research program.[2] Moving ever farther from Estabrooks's verbal hypnoprogramming technology, MKULTRA boldly cross-fertilized the disciplines, seeking ever more powerful mind-influencing techniques. Its goals ranged from development of psychic weapons to mindcontrol by the new physical methods of psychiatry.

What do the letters in MKULTRA stand for? Nobody in the CIA ever told. Bowart speculated that MKULTRA stood for "Mind Kontrol Ultra." ULTRA was the British secret service's code name for their captured Nazi decoding machine. After the war, ULTRA had the reputation of being the best kept secret of World War II, for the Nazis never realized the Brits had it. Perhaps the development of mind "kontrol" technology was intended to be the best kept secret of the post-World War II era.

The history of how MKULTRA acquired authorization and funding provides another example of agency propaganda used to get funding and legislation wanted by the agency. Dr. Ewen Cameron was a Canadian psychiatrist who directed medical care at the McGill University mental facility. In February, 1953, he gave a speech called "The Transition Neurosis" at the Fifth Annual Neuropsychiatric meeting in Little Rock, Arkansas. He bragged about his new concept for reprogramming people. He compared it to the forced changing of beliefs through extreme brainwashing pressures such as "...the extraordinary political conversions which we have seen, particularly in the iron curtain countries..." He said, "We have explored this procedure in one case, using sleeplessness, disinhibiting agents [hypnotic drugs], and hypnosis." (quoted in Weinstein, p. 140) In that speech, Cameron also pushed his idea of using electroshock to blank minds, and then recording new programming on those supposedly blank mental slates by forcing the subject to listen to a repeated taped message.

[1] Bowart speculated Morse's stage hypnotist was William Jennings Bryan, a former Air Force hypnotist who did a lot of high-profile consulting for police agencies around the country and low-profile service for the CIA. Dr. Bryan—though chronically obese—did, in fact, have an active sex life with his hypnotic subjects. On April 22, 1969, the Los Angeles Times reported that he had been found guilty of "unprofessional conduct in four cases involving sexual molesting of female patients." His sentence was five years' probation.

[2] Gottlieb was interested, among other things, in developing substances to cause illogical thinking and/or impulsiveness (so the victim is publicly discredited) and in methods to cause controlled amnesias (including hypnosis).

Gittinger heard of the prominent Canadian psychiatrist's speech. He passed on the news of this possible new technology for forcing people to adopt new beliefs on to CIA Director Allen Dulles and to Gottlieb, director of mind-control research.

Who Led The Mind Control Race: Soviets or U.S.?

Dulles told Congress that MKULTRA should be funded because we needed to catch up with the Russians. The truth came out in 1964. The Warren Commission (which was then investigating conspiracy theories of President Kennedy's assassination) asked Richard Helms, a CIA Deputy Director, to report on the capabilities of Soviet mind-control technology. Helms replied with a memo:

Soviet Research and Development in the Field of Direction and Control of Human Behavior:

> 1. There are two major methods of altering or controlling human behavior, and the Soviets are interested in both. The first is psychological; the second, pharmacological. The two may be used as individual methods or for mutual reinforcement. For long-term control of large numbers of people, the former method [propaganda] is more promising than the latter [drugs]. In dealing with individuals, the U.S. experience suggests the pharmacological approach (assisted by psychological techniques) would be the only effective method...
>
> 2. Soviet research on the pharmacological agents producing behavioral effects has consistently lagged about five years behind Western research...
> 3. The psychological aspects of behavior control would include not only conditioning by repetition and training, but such things as hypnosis, deprivation, isolation, manipulation of guilt feelings, subtle or overt threats... (Warren Commission Document #1131)

Helms had revealed that the U.S. actually stayed about five years ahead of the Russians in research on control of human masses by means of propaganda and of individuals by means of drug (plus psychological) techniques.

On April 10, 1953, Dulles spoke at a Princeton University alumni convocation about a "battle for men's minds" going on in the Soviet Union. Dulles said it was waged on a mass level by media propaganda and censorship and forced on individuals using a "lie serum." He called the lie-serum process "brain changing."

> ...[they] wash the brain clean of the thoughts and mental processes of the past and, possibly through the use of some "lie serum," [truth serum, barbiturate] create new brain processes and new thoughts which the victim, parrotlike, repeats. ("Brain Warfare—Russia's Secret Weapon," U.S. News & World Report, May 8, 1953, pp. 54, 56, 58.)

Dulles said that the Soviet system caused a "mental metamorphosis" and then:

> ...anyone whom the Kremlin rulers decided to destroy...would state just about what these Kremlin rulers wanted him to state...the brain under these circumstances becomes a phonograph playing a disc put on its spindle by an outside genius over which it has no control. (Ibid.)

He ended his speech with the usual Cold War argument that, since the Soviet Union was doing it, so must we—although "we have no human guinea pigs, ourselves, on which to try out these extraordinary techniques." (Scheflin & Opton, p. 438)

That speech made Congress believe that an immediate multimillion dollar research program in mind-control was necessary. Dulles got the money. Three days later, he authorized MKULTRA, a long-lasting, complex, and lavishly-financed CIA program in mind-control research. It was exempted from normal CIA financial controls. The guinea pigs were soon on order.

Only a handful of CIA leaders were aware of

MKULTRA's existence. A CIA Inspector General's report speaks of "just two individuals in TSD who have full substantive knowledge of the program and most of that knowledge is unrecorded." (Final Report I, Inspection of MKULTRA, August 14, 1963, p. 6)[1]

Gottlieb targeted Cameron for recruitment. "The Society would...find somebody that was working in an area in which we were interested and encourage him to continue in that area with some funding from us." (Gottlieb quoted in Weinstein, 1988, p. 133) Cameron did come aboard. Between 1957 and 1962, the CIA delivered $84,820 to him through a funding conduit, the Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology.

National Security Agency

At 12:01 on the morning of November 4, 1952, a new federal agency was born. Unlike other such bureaucratic births, however, this one arrived in silence. No news coverage, no congressional debate, no press announcement, not even the whisper of a rumor....Equally invisible were the new agency's director, its numerous buildings, and its ten thousand employees.

Bamford, The Puzzle Palace, p. 15

The "birth certificate" for that new agency was a seven-page presidential memorandum which Truman signed on October 23, 1952. The memo was directed to his Secretary of State, Dean G. Acheson, and to his Secretary of Defense, Robert A. Lovett. The document is so top secret that, despite legal pressures, not one word of it has ever been made public. This secret memo established a government organization now called the National Security Agency. It is better known by its acronym, NSA.

NSA traces its roots back to World War I when a group of brainy cryptographers went to work for the government, decrypting foreign diplomatic and military messages. From its very beginning, the NSA, like the CIA, had a policy of striving for constant technical progress. As codebreaking became computer aided, and as messages shifted to electronic modes of transmission, the roomful of cryptographers evolved into an army of experts in mathematics, engineering, and telecommunications. The government's code collecting and code breaking group was secret even before Truman's memo. Afterwards, it became more so. It was kept secret from all but a very few high-government officials.

It is a psychological rule that mental programming for which the conscious mind is amnesic tends to be dominant over conscious (non-amnesic) thinking. Secret will rule is a principle of mind-control technology. The NSA's blueprint designed it to be forever invisible, dwelling in the shadowland of a legislated national amnesia. It rapidly rose to a position of strength.

Largest, Wealthiest, and Most Powerful

The largest, wealthiest, and most powerful secret agency is the NSA. It is bigger than the CIA, bigger than the FBI—and it spends more money. The NSA's headquarters at Fort Meade, Maryland, is the second largest building in the United States. (Only the Pentagon is larger.) The CIA has a nominal Director whom Congress gets to approve, but he really has little power in the intelligence community (CIA, NSA, FBI, Secret Service, and intelligence units from the Army, Navy, and Air Force). In that group, the real heavyweight—as reckoned either by size of budget or number of employees—is the Director of the NSA. (Senate Intelligence Committee, quoted in Bamford, p. 17) The CIA used to be more powerful than the NSA, but that is no longer so.

> As a result of this overwhelming passion for secrecy, few persons outside the inner circle of America's intelligence community have recognized the gradual shift in power and importance from the Central Intelligence Agency to the NSA. (Ibid., p. 16)

A new federal complex is being built just south of St. Louis. The facility is said to be for 50,000 employees working for "The Defense Mapping Agency." Exactly what type of "mapping" will this "defense" agency do? Is it an NSA project? Is "defense mapping" satellite radio surveillance tracking chips? Nobody seems to know.

[1] MKULTRA started out as an adjunct to ARTICHOKE. Project ARTICHOKE was directed by the CIA's Office of Security. MKULTRA was directed by a small group called TSS (Technical Services Staff). Turf rivalry soon grew intense between the Office of Security and the TSS. TSS prevailed. Later, its name changed to TSD (Technical Services Division.). TSD survived and kept going after much else in the program was publicly dismantled to satisfy public outcry in the 60s and 70s.

Knowledgeable citizen researchers have gone so far as to state that "the CIA, the State Department, even the White House and its occupants, take orders from the chiefs at the NSA." (Texe Marrs, Project L.U.C.I.D., p. 28) The NSA is also said to be powerful in the international arena. I only know, for sure, that the full extent of the NSA's power, activities, and plans is not known by the public. Most people do not even recognize the agency's name.

Turf Wars—Insulated from public criticism by anonymity, the only remaining obstacles to the NSA's rise to power have been turf wars with other government agencies and organizations. In its early years, the organization was run by a committee of representatives from the three military branches. The result was conflict, often paralyzing. In a 1952 reorganization, the NSA's Director won independence from the service branches. After that, he reported only to the Secretary of Defense who in turn reported to the National Security Council.[1]

The NSA then maneuvered for independence from the Defense Department. The Pentagon watched the trend and worried that civilians were going to dominate the Agency. In 1945, 90% of the top 2,000 NSA staff jobs were held by military personnel. By 1971, the military had 5% of those jobs. (Bamford, p. 108) In 1972, the Pentagon also gave the NSA Director complete authority over the 45,000 military rank and file men and women who were then collecting and interpreting electronic signals for the the NSA.

Agency administrators also had a period of conflict with the National Science Foundation. It objected for a while to NSA maneuvers to acquire oversight and control of all grants in the signals communication area.

How big is the NSA? We don't know. We're not allowed to know. A loophole excludes it from compliance with Freedom of Information Act requests. A special law ensures that no statistics on its size or budget will ever be released to the public. In 1959, Congress passed a special law forbidding the NSA to disclose information about its organization, activities, names, or number of employees. So, nobody outside the Agency knows its exact number of personnel, or size of budget, or rate of expansion. There have, however, been some credible leaks or estimates. In 1969, one report said they had 95,000 personnel. In 1983, their budget was estimated to be $10 billion. (Bamford, p. 109)

The NSA headquarters is a thousand acres with twenty buildings, a private bus service, a private police force, a post office, barber

Of Secret Agencies and Investigative Reporters

Investigative journalism has a long and honorable snooping tradition of its own. A few citizen writers have managed to make facts public about the secret agencies. Those writings somewhat counterbalance the twin antidemocratic banes of secrecy and propaganda.

The CIA got some much-needed journalistic exposure in The CIA and The Cult of Intelligence by John Marks and Victor Marchetti, The Invisible Government by David Wise and Thomas B. Ross, The Search for The Manchurian Candidate by John Marks, and The Mind Control of Candy Jones by Donald Bain.

The NSA has long considered journalists who write about them as a form of enemy.

> As worrisome to the Agency as loose-lipped spooks were those few outsiders who dared to write about it. To keep track of this small fraternity, M5 set up a special file called "Nonaffiliates of NSA Who Publish Writings Concerning the Agency." (Bamford, p. 168)

In 1967, David Kahn, a Newsday reporter and amateur code-breaker, published a book about cryptology, The Code-breakers. It had one chapter on the NSA: "Often the agency enshrouds its secrets in fearful gloom, awing Congressmen with sacred mysteries that are no more to be uttered than is the tetragrammaton." (Kahn, p. 701) News of Kahn's upcoming book triggered a series of frantic top-level NSA meetings:

> Among the possibilities considered were hiring Kahn into the government so that certain criminal statutes would apply if the work was published; purchasing the copyright; undertaking "clandestine service applications" against the author, which apparently meant anything from physical surveillance to a black-bag job; and conducting a "surreptitious entry" into Kahn's Long Island home....At one point, the director suggested planting in the press disparaging reviews of the author's work, and such a review was actually drafted. Also suggested and carried out was the placing of Kahn's name on the NSA watch list, enabling the Agency's vacuum cleaner to sweep the airwaves for his phone calls and telegrams. (Bamford, pp. 168-169)

Kahn's publisher negotiated. The book was published after some deletions were made.

In a 1977 book, Clearing The Air, newsman Daniel Schorr called the NSA "one of the deepest secrets." (p. 183) In 1982, James Bamford published a masterpiece of citizen intelligence effort which detailed the history and habits of the NSA: The Puzzle Palace, A Report on America's Most Secret Agency.

[1] It was then the agency got its present name: National Security Agency.

shop, and the medical facilities. It has tremendous propaganda abilities: a private TV station, a studio which can produce programming, and a huge printing plant with every type of equipment (it employs hundreds). Medical and psychological services are provided at the NSA base at Fort George G. Meade near Washington, D.C.—so its employees won't blab even under conditions of physical or mental breakdown. NSA has other facilities in other places, but those sites are secret.

The NSA followed the same research path as the CIA: the creation of intimate, secret, bondings with university, thinktank, and industrial organizations. The nation's premier thinktank, and its most secret one, the Institute for Defense Analysis, was developed to exclusively serve NSA needs. NSA recruiters target the best brains from the best universities. It pays its employees well. It encourages development of wanted skills by means of an extraordinary library and college at Ft. Meade. "In 1979, at various times, close to 19,000 students were enrolled in five hundred different courses." (Bamford, p. 157)

The NSA intends to be the lifetime employment for those who pass its rigorous polygraph entrance exam (even secretaries and clerks). The goal has been to hold resignations to an incredible two percent. The Director is appointed from outside the ranks of Agency personnel, but directors come and go, subject to political winds. Under that unstable uppermost nameplate, a stable agency bureaucracy has maintained NSA's steady growth in technological expertise and power, both abroad and at home.

Fastest and Most Secret—In 1957, the NSA kicked off a five-year computer research program called Project Lightning. It had a $25 million budget, and the general goal of passing all other nations in computer technology. A specific goal was to multiply computer speed a thousandfold. Project Lightning research achievements were made public. It was a great leap forward in computer science. (Out of that research came the Cray computer.) In 1977 it had the world's biggest collection of computers.

After Project Lightning, however, the NSA turned inward. Research efforts were labeled secret and results were no longer made public. The Agency awarded numerous contracts to outside corporations to build its equipment and to do much of its research and development. In the year 1977, it had more than 7,000 active contracts involving nearly a billion dollars in payouts. (Bamford, p. 147)

The NSA had a long-term policy of staying five years ahead of anybody else in scientific research and development concerning communications and eavesdropping. Another longstanding goal was to have the largest and most advanced operations capability in the world in any area of interest to them. But all the NSA learned to do and to know was no longer shared with the general public.

Classified Documents—NSA is the most secret of the secret agencies, even the military ones. It has an in-house secret classification that is one step higher than the usual confidential, secret, and top secret categories: HANDLE VIA COMINT CHANNELS ONLY. Most communications involving NSA personnel have this label. In 1980, the GAO reported that NSA classifies 50 to 100 hundred million documents per year: "...its classification activity is probably greater than the combined total activity of all components and agencies of the Government." Measured by classified documents, the NSA has more secrets than all other United States government agencies taken together: more than the Air Force, Army, Navy, State Department, FBI, CIA, and Secret Service combined!

Is NSA a secret government operating behind the scenes of the publicly known government, as some say? Nobody can answer that question because the information is SECRET. Because of the secrecy, few Americans recognize the Agency's name. Its employees are not allowed to tell outsiders the truth about who they work for. They must lie—or give a half-truth answer such as, "I work for the Defense Department."

The truth, however, when an NSA applicant or employee speaks to NSA's own investigators—such as when applying for employment and at intervals thereafter—is forced out with the aid of a dreaded polygraph examination. An in-house secret police agency, "M5," maintains "internal security," to keep NSA employees behaving correctly between examinations. Even within the NSA, "Secret, Don't Tell" is the rule. Each research compartment is isolated from the others. Only the department manager and the Director and Deputy Director of NSA know all its secrets. Before access to any new compartment of information is permitted, an employee must go through special "briefings, indoctrination, and oaths." (Bamford, p. 161) Any professor who is allowed to work on a NSA project first has to be cleared—and then indoctrinated. Even so, information is strictly on a "need to know" basis. This policy keeps researchers ignorant about anything beyond their own permitted area of inquiry.

NSA's walls of secrecy even block access by government agencies with oversight and control functions. Secret, Don't Tell has also kept a long succession of Congresses, administrations, and even Chief Executives, ignorant of the Agency's activities. The operation code-named "Shamrock," which started during World War II, was a surveillance of international telephone and telegraph traffic.

> ..there were no controls on what was inspected and what was not. This program continued for the next twenty-eight years and was kept secret from every president until it was terminated under the Ford administration in 1975...it does reveal the capability of the U.S. government to keep an ongoing operation secret from even the president of the United States... (Corso, p. 272)

An interesting exception to that secrecy, however, is the UKUSA Agreement. It requires the U.S.'s most secret agency to share its secret information and to share facilities with certain foreign intelligence services. It is > ...quite likely the most secret agreement ever entered into the English-speaking world. Signed in 1947 and known as the UKUSA Agreement, it brought together under a single umbrella the SIGINT ["signals intelligence] organizations of the United States, Britain, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand....The UKUSA nations also agreed to standardize their terminology, code words intercept-handling procedures, and indoctrination oaths....[its] existence has never been officially acknowledged by any country even today.... (Bamford, p. 391-2)

A Mission to Eavesdrop

Within high government ranks, NSA's mission is well understood: to find out everybody else's secrets while fiercely guarding its own. NSA's mission began as codebreaking but developed into electronic surveillance: the acquisition of targeted information by an electronic, mechanical, or other surveillance device. NSA defined "acquisition" as

> ...the interception by the National Security Agency through electronic means of a communication to which it is not an intended party and the processing of the contents of that communication into an intelligible form intended for human inspection. (quoted in Bamford, p. 468)

At one time, the NSA was known to be decoding the secret messages of forty nations. At another, it was screening 400,000 U.S. communications per day. Early in the history of satellite snooping, the secret agencies divided the information harvest. The CIA received a specialty in satellite imagery (photos). The NSA acquired the communications side (electronic sound).[1]

The NSA is now equipped to use broadband electronic eavesdropping technology to constantly search all communication channels (Bamford, p. 230) looking for key words (any designated word or phrase: a name, a place, a particular return address, or a certain addressee). If the equipment recognizes a key word, it can be programmed to deliver the text in which that word is embedded. The technology exists to do this with either written or spoken conversation, via wire or wireless, telephoned, e-mailed, telegraphed, or cabled communications. Three different software programs can now translate spoken words instantly into on-screen text. Those available in the private sector have a high error rate.

Legal or Illegal—The CIA was founded with a "charter" which makes it subject to certain restrictions. One prohibits it from activities inside the United States. (There is some evidence this restriction has been circumvented.) It was not allowed to monitor U.S. phone conversations. The NSA was never restrained in this way. It has a long history of relative indifference as to whether something they want to do is legal, or illegal:

> ...The top three officials of the Agency all agreed that NSA exists somewhere in an extralegal limbo, unrestrained by the same laws and statues that govern the rest of the nation... (Bamford, p. 382)

The NSA began domestic espionage after the rise of Viet Nam War protesters and the beginning of the civil rights movement. Any other government agency (such as the Army, FBI, or CIA) could come to them and ask for surveillance information. The NSA would make up its own mind whether or not to carry out the request of each "consumer." (Bamford, p. 322) If an organization was targeted, then the communications of any member could be snooped upon. If a person was named, then all communications that named that person, or were from, or addressed to that person came under surveillance.[1]

---

[1] Satellite cameras can now read a note atop a picnic table and daylight crimes are sometimes solved using satellite photos, but the CIA/satellite origin of data is kept secret. The NSA also delivers surveillance information to other agencies of government without taking public credit. (Bamford, p. 353)

The NSA conducted domestic intelligence operations for years without authorization. Then Nixon signed an addendum to the NSA secret charter which approved these previously unauthorized activities:

> Present procedures should be changed to permit intensification of [electronic surveillance] coverage of individuals and groups in the United States who pose a major threat to the internal security...Present restrictions should be modified to permit selective use of this [breaking and entering] technique against other urgent and high priority internal security targets. (quoted in Bamford, p. 347)

After Nixon rescinded that approval, the NSA again operated without it. (Bamford, p. 350) President Carter signed an executive order restricting the activities of the CIA and NSA. He tried to force the U.S. intelligence community to become law-abiding. The Senate Intelligence Committee warned that

> ...NSA's potential to violate the privacy of American citizens is unmatched by any other intelligence agency. (Final Report, Book II, p. 201, quoted in Bamford, p. 473)

Carter's successor, Ronald Reagan, however, tossed out Carter's restraining order, hobbled the Freedom of Information Act, and broadened the powers of the secret agencies dramatically.

More conventional government actions may be covered by the media—which has resulted in "problems" (Ruby Ridge and Waco). NSA operations, however, are not covered by the media. An NSA agent will refuse to identify himself, or produce any legal documentation for making arrests. He does not need any.

Electronic Mindreading—In 1968, Flanagan invented a device to send intelligible speech directly into the brain—bypassing the ears—through special time and frequency coding, plus skin contact. He applied for, and received, a patent for the device. Shortly after that, however, "the National Security Agency (NSA) suppressed my invention under a national security order...." (Begich, Towards a New Alchemy, p. 134)

Perhaps somebody at the NSA realized, at the time of Flanagan's application, that human thought involves an electric circuit. And that any electric circuit creates a magnetic field. A bioelectric circuit creates a biomagnetic field. The biomagnetic field generated by bioelectric currents in the brain passes undistorted through dura, skull, and skin. It radiates outside the head. The signals are faint, but very real. The human brain is a biocomputer which organizes data into electronic patterns which are naturally broadcast in that biomagnetic field. Those signals theoretically could be received—if the receiver was sensitive enough.

Vast ranks of NSA scientists, mathematicians, and engineers have been devoted to communications signals analysis for decades: "The study of any emission that could transmit information." (Bamford, p. 126) The ultimate eavesdropping achievement, of course, would be the effective reception and recording of verbal or visualized human thought. The master decoders at the puzzle palace had long taken pride in their ability to intercept and decode any patterned expression. An intricate problem in interception and signals analysis, such as mechanical eavesdropping on and recording of a person's internal speech and imagery, would have been an intriguing challenge for NSA's army of scientists and engineers and their corporate hardware builders.

The master code-breakers would have worked hard to build receivers strong enough to pick up those patterned codes of thought. They would have striven endlessly to acquire ability to correctly interpret that input and thereby eavesdrop on a targeted person's thinking process.

The Advanced Research Projects Agency began in 1957. It was an updated version of the National Research Council, founded by President Wilson. It was

> ...a highly secretive network of defense scientists, members of the industrial defense contractor R&D community, and university researchers operating either under the formula of a government grant or the tacit acknowledgment of the Defense Department that their research would come under government control at some point....[It worked] on military defense-oriented research, many times far in advance of any concrete proposals for the development of a weapons system or a product. (Corso, pp. 234-236)

---

[1] Like all bureaucracy, the watch operation had a tendency to grow. The NSA director was annoyed when FBI head, J. Edgar Hoover, demanded "complete surveillance of all Quakers in the United States." (Bamford, p. 322) The President at that time was Richard M. Nixon, and he was a Quaker.

In the 1970s, its name changed to DARPA, the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency. It works under the supervision of the NSA with, currently, a multibillion dollar budget. In addition to working on the Star Wars missile defense systems development and other satellite telecommunications and surveillance devices, it also has worked, for 25 years now, to create the NSA's electronic technologies for human control. (Texe Marrs, Project L.U.C.I.D., p. 31) These technologies include both mind-reading and sending radio signals to implanted biochips in a brain.

Flanagan's technology is outdated now. Akwei reported that:

> Signals Intelligence is based on the fact that everything in the environment with an electric current in it has a magnetic flux around it which gives off EMF waves. The NSA/DoD (Department of Defense) has developed proprietary advanced digital equipment which can remotely analyze all objects, whether manmade or organic, that have electrical activity...At the present time [1996] the NSA has nanotechnology computers that are 15 years ahead of present computer technology...All equipment hidden, all technology secret, all scientific research unreported (as in electronic warfare research). (Akwei, Evidentiary Document)

New Branch of Psychology: “Military Psychology”

...psychology can be a worrying science in the hands of the military...

- Peter Watson, War on the Mind, p. 18

RAND (acronym for Research and Development) is the U.S.'s oldest and most famous think tank. It was created during World War II when the Air Force sought help from university scientists. RAND's involvement in mind-control research began in the 1950s. The CIA and Air Force asked for a report on the feasibility of research on hypnosis and other mind-control technologies. From then on, a series of RAND reports urged them to push ahead with hypnosis experiments and all other research with potential for mind control. RAND also suggested specific experimental directions. At the beginning of this research, few imagined what astonishingly powerful new mind-control technologies would emerge and become available for transfer to operations.

In the early 1960s, military psychology projects, breadth of research, and funding ballooned. Military psychology became the newest major branch of psychology. Peter Watson was both a clinical psychologist and a skilled journalist (a London Sunday Times editor). He pulled together a picture of military psychology as of 1978 in the U.S., Great Britain, Israel, and other countries, in a book titled War on the Mind:

> ...since that change of emphasis in the early sixties, the military uses of psychology have been pursued with ever more energy and increasing imagination. (Peter Watson, War on the Mind, p. 25)

Watson reported that research activity in military psychology was prodigious. At the Fort Bragg “psy ops” library he found > ...an enormous and extraordinary collection of papers and documents...row upon row of (largely unpublished) reports of military experiments... described military adaptations of psychological research that went far beyond anything I had until then conceived.

>
> ...during the past twenty years and with hardly anyone in the outside world noticing, the military uses of psychology had come of age....Everything you could think of...had been investigated in remorseless detail and the relevant psychological research drained of any military application it might have. (Ibid, pp. 14-15)

He noticed that this research was all very hush-hush:

> ...studies...have been —either secret or, if not actually classified, circulated only among a relatively small handful of specialists. The closed-world nature of this branch of science has both determined its unique character and prevented a wider discussion of the various issues—scientific, military, political and ethical—which are raised by many of the studies. (Ibid., p. 23)

Watson found a surprising number of “institutes” that specialized in research in military psychology. There were a total of 146 in the eight countries he visited. The United States had 130 of them. Of those, 80 were inside the military. Others were in universities, specialist hospitals, private research institutes, and think tanks:

> You will not find any details of them in the profes- > sional psychological journals...On the official surface...military psychology appears to be a small and not very enterprising aspect of the science. The extent to which this belies the true picture, however, can be seen from the fact that the research for this book has unearthed many organizations around the world sponsoring no less than 7500 studies...Clearly, military psychology is now an enormous field. But—equally clearly—it is closed to most of us. No one can know, of course, just how much secrecy there is... (Ibid., p. 26)

Watson reasoned that the fragmented nature of military psychology—so many institutes, most of small size—was a policy designed deliberately to maintain secrecy. He noticed the striking isolation of military psychologists from their civilian peers, and the civilians' inability to access military research. He listed the classified categories of military psychology. He found 25 current studies in the category called "Use of hypnosis in intelligence and related military subjects." He said it was one of the "chief areas of classified study." (Ibid, p. 31)

He quoted research that analyzed the "military mind":

> ...more authoritarian than most, more conservative, more bureaucratic and likely to have a more negative view of human nature—to assume that people tend naturally to be selfish, aggressive, untruthful...more pragmatic. (Ibid, p. 443)

How would a pragmatic military mind react if a research breakthrough in mind-control technology appeared? Watson noted another tendency of the military mind: "...the ability to do something almost invariably means that an attempt will be made to actually do it." (Ibid., p. 278)

Mind-Control Research: Goals and Methods

Terminal Experiments

☑

Mind-Control Research Goals

Personality Restructuring

> In working on this book I have had to come to terms with my own emotions—disbelief, bewilderment, disgust, and anger and, more than once in the early stages, a feeling that the subject was simply too evil to cope with. Nothing I had researched before could have prepared me...
> - Gordon Thomas, Journey into Madness, p. 8

In a stream of memos during the 1950s, the CIA laid out an ambitious array of mind-control research goals. Even unlikely-sounding paths of inquiry were eventually crafted into operational technologies by throwing enough time, money, and brain power into the process.

Terminal Experiments

> [They wanted]*...reliable results relevant to operations. In documents and conversation, Allen and his coworkers called such realistic tests "terminal experiments"—terminal in the sense that the experiment would be carried through to completion. It would not end when the subject felt like going home or when he or his best interest was about to be harmed....By definition, terminal experiments went beyond conventional ethical and legal limits.
> John Marks, The Search for the Manchurian Candidate, p. 32

When Morse Allen was directing BLUEBIRD (the first CIA hypnosis project), he first performed hypnosis experiments on agency secretaries and office staff. Soon, however, he needed subjects with whom the CIA could take more risks.

Hypnosis sceptics, for years, had been rebuking experimenters in the field of antisocial hypnosis. The sceptics said that experiments proved nothing when the volunteers had knowingly agreed to participate. They argued that those subjects were unconsciously confidant that their professor, or boss, or officer was not really going to hurt them or make them do something wrong. Morse Allen agreed. He wanted to test subjects for whom the stakes were completely real—even to the point of life or death.

For how could researchers learn to make permanent changes in the way a person's brain works without making permanent changes in the way the experimental subject's brain works? How could they research techniques that might—or would—cause brain damage? Or death? To solve this dilemma, a dual policy for secret government experimentation developed: a classic double standard.

For such subjects, called terminal subjects, all risks were permissible, even long-term changes in personality, even risks to life and sanity. And all those risks could be taken without the subject's pre-knowledge or permission. Because asking permission or providing pre-knowledge could negate the experiment.

For persons in the research bureaucracy and experimenters, however, no risk was acceptable. These morally questionable terminal experiments were labeled "top secret," deliberately keeping the information and results from the public. The top secret label was also a "license to kill" for research bureaucrats and technicians, absolving them of accountability for their actions.

Morse Allen approved the use of terminal experiments in 1950. From then on, subjects were entrapped, used, and permanently changed by CIA experimentation. They were discarded when the experimenter had no more use for them. The CIA, however, still felt that a frustrating atmosphere of moral inhibition was impeding their research. A 1950 memo said:

> We shall continually strive to attain more knowledge and better techniques. In the meantime, my general feeling is that because we have accomplished things which seem almost impossible, the authorities concerned almost believe that nothing is impossible. As you know, there are definite limitations, especially since we are so greatly handicapped by popular and official prejudice against some of our methods. (quoted in Scheflin & Opton, p. 114)

The CIA began researching brainwashing techniques in 1953,

> ...the very year that the United States government signed the Nuremberg Code that prohibits human experimentation on captive populations, such as prisoners, or anybody else for that matter, unless the person is fully informed on the nature of the experiment and freely gives his or her consent. (Chavkin, The Mind Stealers)

Wolff, a CIA brainwash researcher, told his superiors:

> Where any of the studies involve potential harm to the subject, we expect the Agency to make available suitable subjects and a proper place for the performance of necessary experiments. (quoted in Weinstein, 1988, p. 133)

The CIA's last policy restraints on terminal experiments vanished in 1954. That was the year a Russian defector, Vladimir Petrov, revealed that the May 1951 disappearance of two British intelligence agents had been staged by the KGB because it knew that the two (who were double agents also working for the KGB) were suspected and were under investigation by superiors. A very disturbed U.S. Joint Chief's officer wrote:

> It would appear that very nearly all U.S./U.K. high-level planning information prior to 25 May 1951...must be considered compromised.... (Martin, p. 61)

President Eisenhower instructed Lieutenant General James Doolittle to make recommendations for improved CIA operations to prevent another such Soviet intelligence coup in the future. Sixty days later, Doolittle turned in recommendations to pursue

> ..."every possible scientific and technical avenue of approach to the intelligence problem"...he urged the CIA to become "more ruthless" than the KGB. "If the United States is to survive, long-standing American concepts of 'fair play' must be reconsidered...We must learn to subvert, sabotage and destroy our enemies by more clever, more sophisticated and more effective methods than those used against us." (Martin, p. 62)

Doolittle's recommendations were followed. In 1959, a hypnotist, writing of "hypnosis in war," said: "It is relevant to note that an individual who was concerned with this type of work described it as 'unethical' and a 'dirty mess.'" (Marcuse, Hypnosis: Fact and Fiction, p. 204).

In that same decade, Alden Sears ran a University of Denver study for MKULTRA, using students as hypnotic subjects. He researched the "building blocks" that make an unknowing hypnotic subject: "Could a hypnotist induce a totally separate personality? Could a subject be sent on missions he would not remember unless cued by the hypnotist?" In 1957, Sears wrote that the next experiments, on methods "to build second identities [artificial personality splitting]...could not be handled in the University situation." (John Marks, 1979, pp. 186-7)

Sears refused to participate in that ugly second generation of experiments. He became a minister instead. Afterwards, he would never talk about the hypnosis experiments he had done.

Where Terminal Research Was Done

In the 60s, MKULTRA directors kicked mind-control experimentation into high gear. Their investigations had three experimental levels: 1) basic research, 2) clinical testing, and 3) testing in operational situations. Richard Helms was "the driving force behind this." (Weinstein, p. 129). Various chunks of research were

> ...conducted at industrial facilities, academic centers, hospitals, government research sites and state and federal correctional and mental health institutions...MKULTRA's funding bypassed normal channels...its full scope was known to only a handful of people. (Scheflin and Opton, p. 132)

Fifteen penal, or mental, institutions were used by the CIA for secret research on their inmates. The Addiction Research Center of the U.S. Public Health Service Hospital, Lexington, Kentucky, was one such institution. The Federal Narcotics Bureau, the Food and Drug Administration, and possibly certain defense contractors, were also involved in mind experiments.

For example, in one typical LSD experiment, the CIA enlisted the aid of the Navy and also that of the National Institutes of Mental Health (NIMH). Both served as false-front conduits for CIA money. A typical CIA document states that the directors of NIMH and the National Institutes of Health fully recognized the CIA's "interest" and had offered the Agency "full support and protection." (Lee and Schlain, p. 24)

CIA mind-control researchers also worked, and were based, in educational institutions. They involved "at least 185 scientists and some eighty institutions: prisons, pharmaceutical companies, hospitals, and forty-four medical colleges and universities" in this type of study. (Chavkin, p. 12) Those facilities were

> ...all over the United States, at the great research centers like Boston Psychopathic, the University of Illinois Medical School, Mount Sinai, Columbia University, the University of Oklahoma, the Addiction Research Center at Lexington, Kentucky, the University of Chicago, and the University of Rochester, and still other centers, researchers had begun projects funded by the Agency through intermediaries. (Thomas, pp. 156-157)

Ivy League colleges, especially, became centers for defense and CIA contracts. At Harvard, "students and professors had for years served as guinea pigs for CIA- and military-funded" experiments (Lee and Schlain, p. 73). A professor later recalled that

> Princeton was crawling with agents. They came courting everyone. It was obvious. They would give us whatever we wanted...We realized we were being recruited, but at that time we were flattered that such a prestigious government agency was interested in us. (Ibid., footnote, p. 46)

In New York, MKULTRA researched in a very different social atmosphere—a safehouse disguised as a brothel. Although listed under the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, the safehouses were actually managed and funded by the CIA. George White organized the first one in a Greenwich Village apartment. He equipped it with a stable of prostitutes. He observed their interactions with customers through a special two-way glass, which functioned as a mirror on the brothel side and as a clear observation glass on the researcher's side.

The CIA was studying the use of "lovemaking" for espionage purposes and analyzing the sexual behavior of johns—especially of certain targeted individuals. White also tested experimental drugs, administered by experimental covert means, to the unknowing patrons. In 1955, White was transferred to San Francisco where he set up two more safehouses doing similar experiments. The safehouse experiments went on into the 60s.

After retiring, White wrote in a personal letter:

> I was a very minor missionary, actually a heretic, but I toiled wholeheartedly in the vineyards because it was fun, fun, fun. Where else could a red- > blooded American boy lie, kill, cheat, steal, rape, and pillage with the sanction and blessing of the All-Highest? (quoted in John Marks, 1979, p. 101)[1]

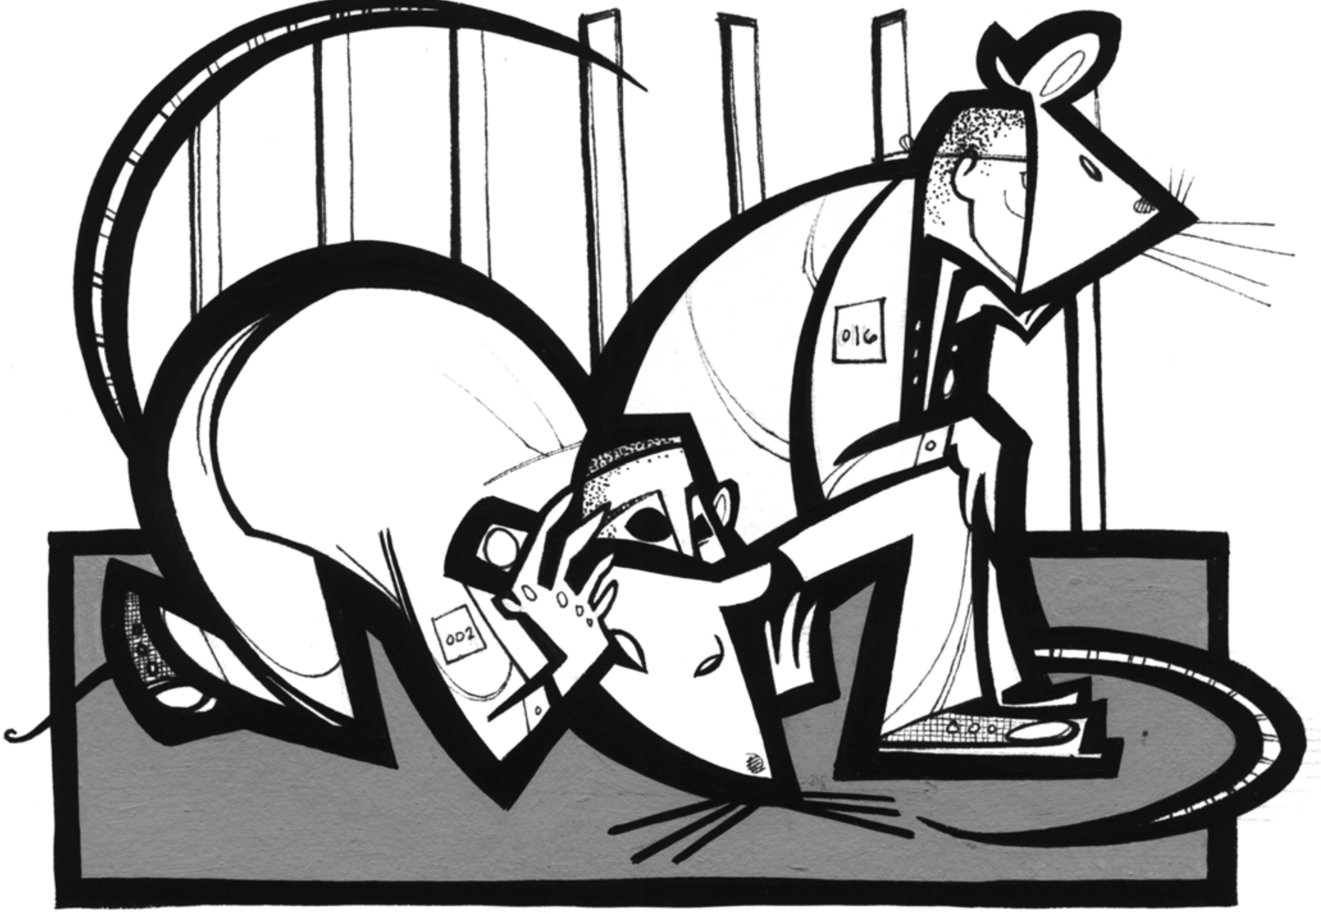
Cameron's Patients

Cameron's patients are the best-known individual victims of CIA-supported mind-control experiments. The patients and their presenting symptoms when they arrived at Dr. Cameron's office at McGill University in Canada for psychiatric help were not unusual: unhappy wife, middle-aged businessman with a holocaust flashback, hypochondria, arthritis, and menopause. Once they fell into Cameron's trap, however, they became humanoid white rats expended in extreme, ruthless, and brain-damaging experiments on mind control.[2]



Cameron was working on a new mind-control technique. One patient, Mr. Weinstein, was a middle-aged Canadian businessman who owned a prosperous clothing manufacturing company. Weinstein made the mistake of asking Cameron for help to overcome an occasional phantom choking sensation. After years of Cameron's bizarre, destructive experimentation, Weinstein acquired severe mental damage. His son, Harvey, grew up and became a psychiatrist out of a burning need to understand what happened to his father's mind.[3]

Why did Cameron entrap normal people (with minor problems) to use in his experiments? He did that because both brainwashing and hypnoprogramming work best on normal persons. Dr. Sargant, an English psychiatrist, expert on brainwashing, and a personal friend of both Dr. Cameron and CIA Director Dulles explained:

> ...the really crucial point which the whole history of hypnotism demonstrates is that the people most susceptible to hypnotic states are normal people. Hypnotism has never been very successful in treating the severely mentally ill...Many normal people, on the other hand, become hysterical un-

[1] By "All-Highest," did George White mean the CIA Director? Or his MKULTRA project director? Or the National Security Council? Definitely, he did not mean God. Here we have "situational ethics" stated blatently.

[2] In The Sleep Room: The Story of the CIA Brainwashing Experiments in Canada by Anne Collins is the most painstakingly documented history of the Cameron/CIA connection and the personal stories of Cameron's victims.

[3] The son, Dr. Harvey Weinstein, told the story of his father's life and his own search for the truth about what happened to his father in a heartbreaking book originally titled A Father, A Son, and the CIA, then Psychiatry and the CIA: Victims of Mind Control.

> der stress, and, when they do, they become amenable to hypnotism and to techniques which depend on the same brain mechanisms.
> It is not the mentally ill but ordinary normal people who are most susceptible... (Sargant, The Mind Possessed, p. 31)

The people most susceptible to brainchanging are stressed, normal people. So, Cameron captured normal people for his experiments. They did not stay normal. They became stressed. Funded, in part, by the Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology, he experimented with conditioning (building unconscious reflex habits), hypnosis (using a Sodium Amytal induction), other drugs, electroshock, and psychic driving. He analyzed the three stages of electroshock amnesia. He studied the retroactive amnesia for recent events which electroshockings can cause.

CIA Settles with Canadian Nine

In the spring of 1988, the CIA was on the brink of going to court because of a years-long lawsuit against it. The lawsuit was filed by Dr. Ewen Cameron's nine surviving mind-control research subjects. The Canadian government had already made compensatory payments to them, acknowledging its role in looking the other way and allowing them to be used in U.S. research. The now elderly Canadians were represented by a pair of Washington, D.C. lawyers, Turner and Rauh. The U.S. Justice Department was defending the CIA: "not guilty."

Abruptly, the Justice Department made the Canadians a cash offer. The U.S. would pay $750,000 total to the nine survivors if they would drop their case with a) no admission of guilt from the CIA, b) no trial, and c) their agreement never to publicly discuss the matter again.

They agreed, got the money, and never gave another interview. The CIA avoided a prolonged court battle which would have resulted in glaring publicity and the possible coming forward of more victims of their mind-control research, or more revelations about those experiments. The Company also avoided being found guilty, for the paper trail in this case was wide and clear indeed.

Cameron worked on two major CIA goals. One was the creation of irresistibly powerful remembering. His technique was forced listening to a short, taped message played over and over. He called that psychic driving. The other goal was its opposite: the causing of irresistibly powerful forgetting. Cameron's method to accomplish that was a large amount of electroshock. The amount was called regressive because subjects lost their bladder control.

Medical Ethics

Henry K. Beecher, a medical ethicist studying publicly available statistics, was astonished and disturbed by the steady increase, after World War II, in experimentation on unknowing subjects:

> ...they would not have been available if they had been truly aware of the uses that would be made of them...many of the patients in the examples to follow never had the risk satisfactorily explained to them, and it seems obvious that further hundreds have not known that they were the subjects of an experiment although grave consequences have been suffered as a direct result of experiments... There is a belief prevalent in some sophisticated circles that attention to these matters would "block progress." But, according to Pope Pius XII, "...science is not the highest value to which all other orders of values... should be submitted." (Beecher "Ethics and Clinical Research," 1966)

Beecher said that ethical errors were increasing not only in numbers, but also in variety. Above all, he was dismayed by the ballooning government budget for research on human beings.

> Since World War II the annual expenditure for research (in large part on man)...in the Massachusetts General Hospital has increased a remarkable 17-fold. At the National Institutes of Health, the increase has been a gigantic 624-fold...Medical schools and university hospitals are increasingly dominated by investigators. (Ibid.)

That was just NIH funding. What would the numbers have looked like to Beecher if military, thinktank, NIMH, CIA, and NSA fundings for human research were added in?

What exactly were they doing to all those people?

Mind-Control Research Goals

Can we get control of an individual to the point where he will do our bidding against his will and even against such fundamental laws of nature such as self-preservation?

1952 ARTICHOKE memo, quoted in Chavkin, p. 13

In 1950, the CIA's BLUEBIRD program began to target specific hypnotism goals. At first, the research goals were all defensive: to identify disloyal persons, establish a defector's legitimacy, make CIA agents able to resist hostile interrogation, and strengthen interrogation methods used on captured enemies. The list of goals soon changed, however, to include offensive uses of hypnosis. Hypnotism would make it > ...possible to brief a prisoner or other individual, subsequently dispatch him on a mission and successfully debrief him on his return without his recollection of the whole proceeding. (CIA memo, "Defense Against Soviet Medical Interrogation and Espionage Techniques," quoted in Scheflin & Opton, p. 114)

They also targeted the basic goal of getting absolute control, in absolute secrecy, over another person. The victim would become an unknowing hypno-puppet who would obey any command:

> The support program will consist of both fundamental and applied research studying all means through which control of an individual may be attained. (CIA memo quoted in Scheflin & Opton, p. 116)

They preferred the method of disguised hypnotic induction over nondisguised. Disguised induction would help achieve an > ...absence of resistance and counter-control: ideally, the technique will be so elegant, so smooth, that the manipulated will not suspect, let alone object, that someone or something is trying to shape their behavior. (Schrag, Mind Control, p. 10)

One author wrote of a military scenario in which hypnosis is used

> ...to obtain the services of an apprehended spy, obtain all the knowledge he might have by use of an involuntary technic and send him back out as a double agent. (Teitlebaum, Hypnosis Induction Technics, p. 172)

In 1960, the CIA's Technology and Science Director, who was in charge of operational experiments in hypnosis, began an aggressive, new, enlarged program which he called "field experimentation" in the "counterintelligence program." There were

> ...three goals: (1) to induce hypnosis very rapidly in unwitting subjects; (2) to create durable amnesia; and (3) to implant durable and operationally useful posthypnotic suggestion. (John Marks, 1979, p. 189).

An outline of ARTICHOKE research targets listed further goals in the hypnosis area: development of techniques for disguised induction, hypnotic memory training, and sealing.

Disguised Induction

They were "investigating the possibility of obtaining control of an individual by application of special interrogation techniques" (Scheflin & Opton, p. 116). "Special interrogation techniques" was a euphemism for methods of disguised induction. The ARTICHOKE research program subdivided that research into experiments on how to cause an unknowing person to become hypnotized using polygraphs, drugs, hypnosis, subconscious isolation, or electroshock.

Hypnotic Memory Training

They called hypnotic memory training memory enhancement. Hypnosis definitely improves memory. If a person's memory is good to start with, hypnosis makes it even better. Hypnotic memory training had at least two intelligence and military applications: a) couriers bearing unconsciously remembered messages and b) subjects used as human tape recorders where no mechanical recording of speech was possible or permitted. In 1962, a research hypnotist issued a lyric call to use hypnosis to > ...produce synthetic genius, emergent genius...in ordinary mortals...phenomenal memory...we are convinced that synthetic genius lies within the grasp of the human, but it will take long and patient research to activate this dream. (Wright, in Estabrooks, Ed., Hypnosis: Current Problems, p. 235)

Dr. Gindes studied rote memory in hypnotized persons for the Army.

...five soldiers were hypnotized...and given a jumbled "code"...they were allowed sixty seconds to commit the list to memory. In the waking state, each man was asked to repeat the code; this none of them could do...During rehypnotization, they were individually able to recall the exactcontent of the code message. (Gindes, pp. 33-34)

The men had learned to spell "ordinary" as "sqlcnrbc," "tendency" as "tmslnfsk," and so on. (Gindes, pp. 53-54)

Hypnocouriers

In 1500 B.C., the Egyptians were using a hypnocourier system. Programmed virgins served the Pharaoh as royal "message bearers from the gods." The women were sent under military escort to distant dignitaries who knew the cue which would unlock the messenger's lips and release the consciously unknown secret message locked in her unconscious. At journey's end, when presented to the dignitary and cued, the words of her message would miraculously form themselves at her lips and speak themselves. She had no conscious knowledge from where those words came. She had no foreknowledge what words it was that her mouth would speak.

Modern hypnocouriers are described in a 1963 text on clinical and experimental hypnosis:

Hypnosis is assuming an ever-increasing role in the psychological aspects of warfare. For instance, a good subject can be hypnotized to deliver secret information. The memory of this message could be covered by an artificially induced amnesia. In the event that he should be captured, he naturally could not remember that he had ever been given the message. He would not remember the message. However, since he had been given a posthypnotic suggestion, the message would be subject to recall through a specific cue, this having been given to him in the form of a posthypnotic suggestion. (William Kroger, Clinical and Experimental Hypnosis in Medicine, Psychology, and Dentistry, p. 299)

The basic system was to read or tell a message to a hypnotized subject, who then was instructed to remember the message and speak it on cue. It could be long and complicated. The courier did not consciously know the message, or even the fact that he carried a message. The message's intended recipient, who knew the cue, would speak or act it out when ready. After perceiving that cue, the courier would go into a posthypnotic trance and speak the message—like a human tape recorder on "play." A supplementary hypnotic suggestion could cause the courier to be amnesic for the meaning of the words he was speaking. (Bowart, in Operation Often, reported the case of a military man trained in this way.)

Estabrooks promoted the use of consciously unknowing hypno-messengers by government agencies:

> If one expert can build up a code, another can break it down...a code must be printed somewhere...And human nature is weak. With hypnotism we can be sure of our private messenger. We hypnotize our man in, say, Washington...give him the message. That message, may we add, can be both long and intricate. An intelligent individual can memorize a whole book if necessary. Then we start him out for Australia by plane with the instructions that no one can hypnotize him...except Colonel Brown in Melbourne...It is useless to intercept this messenger. He has no documents and no amount of "third degreeing" can extract the information, for the information is not in the conscious mind to extract... (Hypnotism, 1944 edition, pp. 210-211)

Sealing

An early CIA memo described sealing as "establishing defensive means for preventing hostile control." In civilian language it means that sealing the programmed mind blocks it from attempts by other hypnotists to put that person into trance. Sealing was another CIA hypnoprogramming goal:

> Can we prevent any unauthorized source or enemy from gaining control of the future activities (physical and mental) of agency personnel (or persons of interest to this agency) by any known means? (CIA memo quoted in Scheflin & Opton, pp. 116-117)

The usual method of sealing was, and is, simply a hypnotic suggestion that the subject cannot be hypnotized by any unauthorized person.

1950s CIA HYPNOGOALS, AND PROBABLE OUTCOMES

In a chapter called "Tampering with the Mind: I," Scheflin and Opton included a long list of hypnoprogramming goals obtained from a CIA memo written in the 1950s. Here are thirteen of those goals, and my opinion of their probable research outcomes:

(1) Identify Hypnotically Susceptible Personality—The CIA wanted to know "the types of personalities which could or could not be controlled." Since the 1950s, many studies, both military and nonmilitary, have sought ways to covertly recognize hypnotizability. Some systems are based on personality and behavior traits. A hysteric is always a good hypnotic subject. Compulsives are the hardest personality type to either hypnotize or to control by hypnosis, because they are going to be, and do, what they are going to be and do. Psychotics are categorically considered impossible to hypnotize, but there have been exceptions.

In some research, women were easier to hypnotize than men, but only by a small percentage. In both sexes, the higher the IQ, the greater the hypnotic susceptibility. In one study, bright female introverts were most susceptible. Extroverts forget more over time than introverts, but they are better at retrieving information from deeply buried memory, especially if it's relatively inaccessible. Introverts are more affected by punishment, extroverts by reward.

That data could be interpreted to make introverts preferred candidates for hypnoprogramming. They have better memory for unconscious instructions, less ability to recover repressed memory, and are more controllable by suggested suffering.

More formal evaluations of hypnotizability are derived from Rorschach or TAT tests and from brainwave patterns (more alpha indicates more susceptibility). If the subject had an imaginary playmate in childhood, that also indicates susceptibility.[1]

[1] See Section IV, "Susceptibility," for more markers.

(2) Which Mind Control Method for Each Personality—The CIA list included the goal of knowing "the methods which would or would not work on those personality types." Therefore, they studied every conceivable induction method: open or disguised . That included study of hypnotic induction hardware of every sort, including instruments for electronic induction by brainwave manipulation and post-electroshock induction. They studied the inductive effects of fatigue and stress, visualization, relaxation, narcohypnosis, repetition, disorientation, sensory deprivation, extrasensory (mind-to-mind, psychic) induction, and combinations of those. (Research knowledge in these areas is covered in Part IV of this book.)

(3) Time Needed to Establish Mind Control? The CIA wanted to know "the amount of time needed for 'alteration of personality' with each technique." How much time does the operator need to take control of a subject's mind? Using verbal techniques only? Using narcohypnosis? Electroshock? How long is it from the beginning of the process to the end—when the subject emerges as a controlled person, totally amnesic for all time spent under hypnosis?

Candy and Palle were trained for years. Estabrooks said that the essentials could be accomplished in ten days, but he recommended ten months for complete training. Bowart's military interviewees and the Operation Often subject reported that their operators spent six to eight weeks setting up basic programming, including their final electroshock series to reinforce amnesia.

(4) Is the Conditioning Permanent?—The CIA also listed the goal of learning "the duration of the change." Would the personality splitting and hypnoprogramming be permanent? In most cases, it would. However, time could have some weakening effect. Unconscious knowledge of safe distance or isolation from the operator can be even more helpful to a subject who unconsciously wants to escape and heal. If a victim becomes consciously aware that this technology exists, he may realize his situation, stop making excuses for the hypnotist, and start wresting his mind FREE.

(5) Can the Conditioning Be Reversed?—Early CIA euphemisms for hypnoprogramming were "brain changing" and "personality restructuring." The hypnoprogramming technology indeed could profoundly change a subject's personality. This goal on the list asked about "the ability to restore the original personality." In plain English, the question was: Could anybody undo their hypnoprogramming (conditioning)?

If the subject can get himself out of reach of all induction cues, and if he can avoid triggering any pre-existing check-in cues, his operator cannot reinforce old conditioning and cannot lay on new conditioning. In the absence of reinforcement, time may gradually loosen the hold of unwelcome conditioning. If that subject-in-hiding obtains the help of a skilled trance manipulator, more of the damage can be undone. Some—or all—of the old conditioning suggestions can be reversed. How much is reversed depends on how deep the changes were etched in the subject's brain, how much time and effort is spent on the healing process, if the subject has a safe place to hide from the hypnotist while healing, and if the healer has a clear understanding of this technology. (But then the subject will be in rapport with the new helper. This may or may not be a problem, depending...)

Humpty-Dumpty is easier to break than to put back together. And when Humpty-Dumpty is back together, he will not look exactly like the egg he was because the experience of being hypnoprogrammed and then overcoming it is going to deeply affect that personality. Some amnesia can be overcome, however. Perhaps old induction cues can be blocked. (Or the subject can live in hiding from those cues.) The best case scenario probably will result in a sadder-but-wiser, more comfortable, more functional, and somewhat reintegrated, personality who is relatively safe from the abusive former operator. (See Part V, therapy topics, for more on this.)

(6) What Could Go Wrong During the Conditioning?—The CIA wanted to know "the adverse side effects" of conditioning. The answer is that subjects may die if given a miscalculated dose of narcohypnotic drug. Some may be pushed into psychosis, temporarily, or permanently. Some may develop long-term neurotic symptoms reflecting unwholesome hypnotic repressions: rationalizations, hypochondria, phobias, compulsions, nightmares, etc. Some may have their body, relationships, or life damaged by thoughtless, or abusive, suggestions.

In general, the more stable the person is to start with, the more effectively their programming will implant, the better their unconscious will compensate for unconscious burdens with defense mechanisms, and the better their cover personality will function.[1]

(7) How Complete Will the Control Be?—The CIA wanted to know "the extent to which the new personality could be controlled." They learned that a mind-controlled person makes a better patsy than assassin because the unconscious retains some capacity to influence outcomes and sidestep the most unthinkable commands. For example, Zebediah shot his elbow instead of his hand. Mrs. E. tended to fail at murder and suicide instructions.Candy obeyed all the preceding orders, but she converted her suicide instruction into a break for freedom.

Nevertheless, obedience potential caused by hypnoprogramming is far greater than is generally recognized by the public. The assertion that "you can't be made to do anything under hypnosis that you don't want to" is FALSE. Great effort was made to train a subject to give reflexive responses, to be totally unconscious, mechanical, automatistic, and absolute in obedience. With ruthless training, involving techniques from the physical methods of psychiatry, a close approximation of robotic response was possible—including some criminal and self-destructive actions.[2]

(8) Complex Conduct Be Hypnocontrolled?—The CIA wanted evidence as to "the complexity of the conduct which could be commanded of the controlled personality." Research described in psychiatric case studies, and other research reports, makes it clear that direct commands ("suggestions"), indirect commands, and specific commands are all possible. So, also, are complex commands such as: "join it, believe in it, participate in it, but be unconsciously loyal to us and report back weekly."

Any variety of neurosis or psychosis can be suggested under hypnosis. The resulting performance can fool even an expert. Alove attachment can be suggested (Nielsen caused Palle to love Bente). A loving relationship can also be terribly harmed by hypnotic suggestion. A subject could be caused to not pay bills, sending all surplus money to one or more designated persons instead.

(9) Are Personality Changes Caused by Hypnotic Suggestion Detectable?—The CIA list targeted research into "changes in attitude of the person whose personality had been altered." Would the victim's family realize what had happened to their loved one? Would the neighbors catch on? The answer is that changes may be observable, but they are unlikely to be correctly interpreted unless observers understand that unethical hypnosis is possible and how it works.

(10) Can Preconditioning Be Detected?—The CIA listed "the ability to detect preconditioning and to determine the method used and the purpose to be accomplished by the conditioning" as a goal. Preconditioning has two meanings. It is, technically, the first stage of hypnosis, the period during which a subject becomes willing to be hypnotized by an operator, but has not yet been hypnotized.

The other meaning of "preconditioning" is probably the one which the CIA had in mind, however. This goal sought a method to detect if a person of interest to them was already somebody's unknowing hypnotic subject—a previously conditioned ("preconditioned") subject.[3] They wanted not only to be able to identify that preconditioning, but also to be able to detect the operator's method of conditioning the subject—and the operator's motive for that preconditioning.

The method could be tough to find out. Only the subject's unconscious knows, and his sealing would have to be broken to access that information. If the subject doesn't know his operator's motive, consciously or unconsciously, there is no way to find out—unless the CIA also has physical custody of the subject's operator, and probes his mind.

(11) Can a Preconditioned Subject Be Reprogrammed?—The CIA listed "the ability to recondition a preconditioned person" as a research goal. If a person of interest to them was already somebody's hypnotic subject, could they undo ("recondition") his previous programming, and then implant their own? Or simply implant their own and make it dominant over the previous programming? Since it was on their list, the CIA probably did try reconditioning and probably came up with some answers. I don't know what those might be, but I feel sorry for their victims.

[1] A cover personality is the "new personality," the conscious self, which is unaware of the conditioning period or of its second, secret hypnotic life.

[2] The CIA had a project "designed to turn people into programmed assassins who would kill on automatic command." (Lee and Schlain, Acid Dreams, xx)

[3] See Part V for methods to identify a victim of unethical hypnosis.

(12) Can We Reprogram a Reprogrammed Hypnoprogrammed Person?—The CIA put "the possibilities of multiple conditioning" of an agent on their research list. If a hypnoprogrammed enemy agent was captured by the CIA, could he be reprogrammed into a double agent? If a hypnoprogrammed CIA agent was apprehended by the enemy and reprogrammed by the enemy to be their own agent, could the CIA then reprogram that person back to being loyal to them? In the case of a double agent, the original operator would imagine that he still had an effective agent, when actually another unconscious isolate of the poor victim's unconscious mind reports to yet another master, without either the subject's conscious mind, or the original hypnotic operator knowing it.

I suppose the CIA carried out this experiment, too. I feel great sorrow and sympathy for the subjects who suffered such mental abuse. The reprogramming of a reprogrammed subject who was hypnoprogrammed before is an even more horrific concept.

Reprogramming could also be applied to somebody, who was originally programmed by the agency, and then managed to (partially or entirely) deprogram themselves. The reconditioning would, theoretically, restore the unconscious automatism of a balking subject. I also pity any victim who went through a first conditioning, got free, and then was subjected to yet another (probably far more brutal) conditioning period in order to enslave him again.

However, "reprogramming" is a mechanical concept. NO HUMAN IS TRULY A MACHINE. A living brain accumulates data, changes and adapts. It can develop an intense dislike for the condition of mind-slavery—even, or especially, at the unconscious level. It may look for loopholes in its programming which will support that person's survivability by enhancing his freedom. It may even find ways to avoid, even defy, the master.

(13) Perfect Amnesia?—The CIA also listed "the ability to induce states of amnesia so that the conditioned person is unaware of the conditioning" as a research goal. Posthypnotic amnesia is the foundation of all the previous scenarios. The person who knows what happened will take measures to protect himself from another hit. The CIA and the military wanted dependable ways to cause effective amnesia which would conceal the hypnotic conditioning—and all future episodes of hypnotic suggestion—from the subject's conscious mind.

The verbal (left) hemisphere can be silenced or made to lie. But, short of brain damage, the imaging (right) brain is very hard to silence. Projective techniques that involve imagery are likely to reveal the truth.

Personality Restructuring

...the day has come when we can combine sensory deprivation with drugs, hypnosis and astute manipulation of rewards and punishment to gain almost absolute control over an individual's behavior...a very rapid and highly effective type of positive brainwashing that would allow us to make dramatic changes in a person's behavior and personality...[in] a few months—or perhaps even less than that...

The techniques of behavioral control make even the hydrogen bomb look like a child's toy, and, of course, they can be used for good or evil. But we can no more prevent the development of this new psychological methodology than we could have prevented the development of atomic energy...

McConnell, Psychology Today, April 1970

When James V. McConnell announced the new method of positive brainwashing in the article quoted above, he was a famous Michigan behaviorist. In the early 1970s, he trained flatworms by electric shocks to prefer the lighted tunnel to the dark one. He edited and published both The Journal of Biological Psychology and the Worm Runner's Digest, a radical behaviorist periodical. If anybody outside the Company knew what happened when you put all the MKULTRA research together and applied it with the goal of personality restructuring to a single subject, it would be McConnell. In that article, he urged readers to adopt

> ...a revolutionary viewpoint toward society and its problems. Today's behavioral psychologists are the architects and engineers of the Brave New World... (Ibid., p. 74)

He suggested temporary incarceration for antisocial persons while they were being "cured" by means of this new technology. The subject would be housed in a "rehabilitation center" while experts "restructure his entire personality." McConnell argued:

> No one owns his own personality. Your ego, or individuality, was forced on you by your genetic constitution and by the society into which you were born. You had no say about what kind of personality you acquired, and there's no reason to believe you should have the right to refuse to acquire a new personality if your old one is antisocial... (Ibid.)

His words set off a furor. Who would have the right to define "antisocial"? How would they define it? (Was it "antisocial" of me to write and publish this book?) People asked for more information which McConnell declined to provide. Instead, he expressed regret for saying what he had said. He never again discussed the technology of "positive brainwashing."

Related CIA and psychiatric research, however, provides further insight.

Research Personality Restructuring

The CIA used language derived from research on artificial neurosis to describe the creation of an unknowing hypnotic subject—often with a new opinion, behavior, or loyalty. Sometimes they called it giving somebody a new personality; sometimes it was called personality restructuring. Whatever its name, the process could, they hoped, covertly and permanently change a subject's beliefs and behaviors. (If they became an unknowing hypnorobot in the process, that would not be seen as a problem.)

In the 50s and 60s, U.S. brainwash specialists studied the phenomenon of Christian conversion, and also why some Americans turned Communist in Chinese POW camps. They contemplated the history of heiress Patricia Hearst who was kidnapped by revolutionaries, became a gun-shooting revolutionary, then was captured by police, and became a law-abiding heiress again. They studied how meat-eaters become vegetarians; and how vegetarians become meat-eaters, and so on.

They must have also wondered if restructuring the personality might secretly convert a Communist follower, or leader, into a staunch advocate of free elections, free enterprise, demilitarization, dismantling of the Russian empire, and economic integration of the Soviet areas with the U.S. and Europe. What an achievement it would be if an important political opponent could be covertly hypnotized and given a new personality—one that took orders from the CIA and had a Western political philosophy.

Hypnosis, voluntary or involuntary (drug or disguised induction), was the key to restructuring an old personality into a new one. After induction would come training for depth, obedience, and amnesia—and then the personality restructuring, the mental reprogramming.

Hypno-conversions

Dr. Cook, a University of Chicago professor, hypnotist, and author, described his process of hypno-transformation in a 1927 book. After he "treated" a daughter, whose father objected to her love for a "worthless suitor," her feelings changed to "abhorrence." (She then became infatuated with the hypnotist!)

In another case, a jealous Miss Edith thought her fiancee too attentive to a lovely cousin. She explained her problem to Dr. Cook, hired him, and together they hatched a plot. Edith then dared her fiancee to be hypnotized by Cook. The young man accepted her dare. Cook hypnotized him and gave a posthypnotic suggestion that he would visit the cousin and scold her severely for some imagined neglect until she became angry. After that, Miss Edith had no competition.

Cook freed an Iowa man of tobacco chewing:

> ...hypnotized him twelve times in four weeks. Before he left the city he was entirely cured of the tobacco habit, although he had no recollection of his experience while in the hypnotic state.
> (Cook, Practical Lessons in Hypnotism and Autosuggestion, pp. 160-1)

A father, worried about his son's choice of companions, brought the young man to Cook's office. The son

> ...was willing...to test the power of hypnotism...and placed in the somnambulistic state. He was then told that it would be impossible for him to be induced to accompany his friends to any questionable places, and that whenever they met him he would treat them civilly, but would no longer make companions of them. Over and over again these suggestions were emphatically repeated to him before he was awakened, and this was repeated > daily for twelve days, during which time he had no communication with any of his companions, as his father had brought him quite a distance...

> (Ibid., pp. 225-6)

Cook suggested amnesia to the son for all the implanted suggestions. He was "cured" and avoided those unwholesome companions in the future.

Like Cook, another hypnotist, Marcuse, reported changing a person's convictions by hypnosis, obtaining a religious conversion. A "vehemently atheistic" subject lived in a boarding house. Marcuse enlisted one of his fellow boarders to report developments. The professor hypnotized the atheist in his office, read him a list of reasons for belief, and then suggested amnesia for the hypnosis. Marcuse soon exactly repeated the treatment. His dinner-table spy reported that other dining room guests were astonished at the sudden reversal of the subject's opinions on religion. For the first time, he began to attend church services. (Marcuse, Hypnosis, p. 228)

Reprogramming by simple hypnosis is not a sure thing. If it were, there would be no failures in stop-smoking clinics (most of which use hypnosis). But, what if the subject is an artificially-created split personality who was programmed using narcohypnosis and other physical methods of psychiatry? That makes the outcome more predictable.

Physical Methods of Psychiatry

Narcohypnosis

Electroshock

> [There were]... CIA documents describing experiments in sensory deprivation, sleep teaching, ESP, subliminal projection, electronic brain stimulation...Another document mentioned "hypnotically-induced anxieties" and "induced pain as a form of physical and psychological control."...Deadly chemicals were concocted for the sole purpose of inducing a heart attack or cancer without leaving a clue as to the actual source of the disease. CIA specialists also studied the effects of magnetic fields, ultrasonic vibrations, and other forms of radiant energy on the brain.
> Lee and Schlain, Acid Dreams, xx

After World War II, advocates of physical methods of psychiatry argued for "practical" (physical) therapies. They downgraded the "philosophical" approaches to healing, meaning the Freudian and Jungian methods.

The physical treatments offered, as of 1944, were narcohypnosis and drug abreaction sessions, electroshock, insulin shock, continuous sleep maintained by drugging, new vitamins, endocrine supplements, stimulants, anticonvulsants, and lobotomy. Advocates of physical psychiatry were hopeful that yet more and better electrical, chemical, and surgical treatments for the brain would soon be discovered.

The Rockefeller Foundation, CIA, National Institutes of Health, and others, lavishly funded that research. The following, 1950s, list of CIA mind-control research areas included physical methods of psychiatry and psychoanalytic methods:

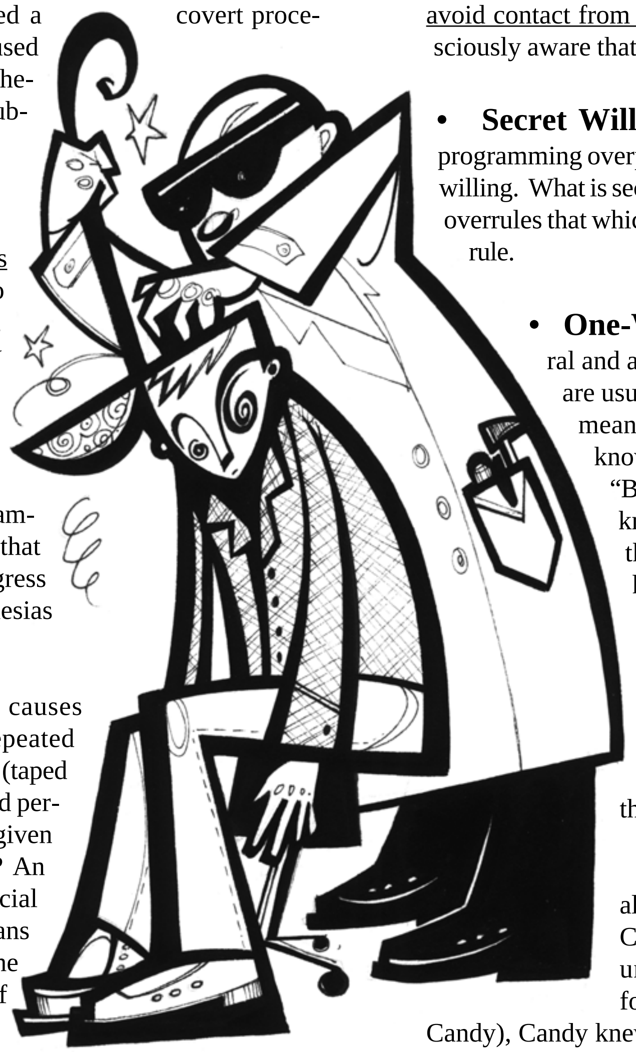
(a) Psychosurgery.

(b) Shock method:
  (1) electrical
  (2) drug: metrazol, cannabis indica, insulin, cocaine.

(c) Psychoanalytic methods:
  (1) psychoanalysis
  (2) narcoanalysis and synthesis
  (3) hypnoanalysis and synthesis.

(d) Combinations of the foregoing.

Other CIA documents from the 1950s list their goals in ultrasonics and "enhanced" polygraph techniques. For example, tests were done using an EEG as a polygraph. The question was "Do you masturbate?" Lobotomy was recommended in one document as a "solution" to neutralize a person "from a security point of view." (Lee and Schlain) Another document discussed a covert procedure in which the operator used electroshock to cause anesthesia, then lobotomized the subject with an icepick[1]



Amnesia Research

The CIA was always interested in methods to cause amnesia. July 15, 1953, after an employee who knew much sensitive information left the Agency, operations people told superiors in ARTICHOKE that they needed a drug which would cause amnesia. The bosses replied that work was constantly in progress on causing predictable amnesias by a variety of means.

What predictably causes predictable amnesias? Repeated suggestions to not remember (taped or oral) given to a hypnotized person? Amnesia suggestions given to a narcohypnotized person? An electroshock series? Artificial personality splitting by means of an artificial neurosis? The answer is YES. To ALL of them. Those methods can be used singly—or in COMBINATION.

Hypnoprogramming Uses for Amnesia

Here follow reasons why amnesia is advantageous for a hypnoprogrammer:

- Broken Feedback Circuit:—Amnesia hides the problem from the subject's conscious mind. If a subject remembers being hypnotized and remembers being given the hypnotic suggestions, he may resist them. Amnesia, however, produces a person who does not know that he has been hypnotized and given suggestions. An amnesic person makes no effort to overcome hypnotic conditioning or to avoid contact from the hypnotist. He is not consciously aware that there is a problem.

- Secret Will Rule—An amnestic brain-programming overpowers a competing conscious willing. What is secret in your mind automatically overrules that which is not secret. The secret will rule.

- One-Way Amnesia—Both natural and artificial multiple personalities are usually one-way amnestic. That means that the original self, "A," knows nothing about the split self, "B," but B knows all about A. The knowing goes one way but not the other. B sees, hears, and knows all that A experiences. A, the original personality, neither sees, hears, nor knows what the split does during a fugue.[2] The split, however, is aware and critical of all the original personality's acts, thoughts, and feelings.

For this reason, Arlene had all the information possessed by Candy, plus her own. However, until Arlene revolted and informed John (who enlightened Candy), Candy knew nothing about Arlene's life. Candy's mental access to what Arlene knew had been blocked by Dr. Jensen. Arlene referred to her own life as a split-off, hidden observer when she said, "...I'll go along tomorrow. I'll sit there and I'll watch...Where she goes, I go." (Bain, p. 99)

Amnesia suggestions given to a narcohypnotized person were an especially promising area for research and operations.

[1] Lee and Schlain describe many more CIA records of goals, experiments, and activities in Acid Dreams, some even more horrific than these.

[2] The period of time during which a dissociated personality split takes over, in an episode for which the original personality is amnesic, is called a fugue. A person may have one short fugue, or a series of them, or one long one, or any combination. Pierre Janet very narrowly defined "fugue" as an escape episode involving the dissociation (splitting off) of a set of ideas whose unity is based on a ruling emotion—such as fear. But modern writers use "fugue" to mean any time lapse or memory blackout.

Narcohypnosis

The question may be raised whether in narcohypnosis we are not dealing simply with sleep only instead of actual hypnosis. Anyone who has practiced narcohypnosis will have to answer this question in the negative, since the patients carry out suggestions and in every other way conduct themselves like deeply hypnotized subjects.

Schilder and Kauders, Hypnosis

Hyperventilation

Hyperventilation is a chemical induction technique. It can be a method of disguised induction. If you breathe as rapidly as possible (hyperventilation) for two to four minutes, you will have some degree of gaseous alkalosis. You will feel dizzy and confused. You will also be in a state of light trance. Changes in blood acidosis/alkalosis relate to changes in state of consciousness.

Hard, prolonged crying causes hyperventilation. (Hyperventilation induction is the key to Arthur Janov's Primal Therapy. Overbreathing lowers consciousness. In that state, a subject is encouraged to relive past traumas and to access and express deep emotion. You need a strong heart and lungs to undertake this stressful "scream" therapy.)

Barbiturates

Narcotic trance induction goes back to prehistory. Narcohypnosis began shortly after chemical anesthesia for surgery was discovered in 1846. Hypnotists experimented, testing to see if there were hypnotic effects associated with use of alcohol, ether, chloroform, scopolamine, and chlorpromazine. In the 1920s, Pavlov put dogs into a narcotic trance by injecting barbiturate. Again and again, doctors observed significant spontaneous hypnotic responses after barbiturate injection. The chemicals of choice for trance induction were eventually narrowed to two fast-acting barbiturates, oral or injected: Sodium Pentothal and Sodium Amytal (called "Evipan," in Europe). (I recently saw Trilene and Propofoy also recommended for this use.)

Barbiturates are a class of hypnoid chemicals (chemical trance inducers). They have been around since the 1930s, widely used both as surgical anesthetics and hypnotics. Operating personnel must be careful what they say because their patients are in deep trance and are highly suggestible!

In 1936, Horsley began using Sodium Pentothal as a narcohypnotic entryway to repressed thoughts and emotions. His procedure was a rapid psychoanalysis done with a narcohypnotized subject. His 1943 book on that technique, Narco-Analysis, became a standard text on barbiturate use in hypnotherapy. During World War II, American and English doctors used narcohypnosis to treat combat-traumatized veterans.[1]

Roy P. Grinker and John P. Spiegel published War Neuroses in North Africa in 1943, and Special Report: Conference on Narcosis, Hypnosis, and War Neuroses, in 1944.[2] Grinker and Spiegel published another book in 1945, War Neuroses. J.G. Watkins was an American who first researched hypnotic coercion as a military hypnotist. His 1949 book, The Hypnotherapy of War Neuroses, pioneered use of barbiturate drugging as a direct route to the unconscious in America.[3]

Police Use of Barbiturates—Police investigators at first called the barbiturates "truth serum." In the 1930s, they used them in interrogations or to elicit confessions. They gradually learned, however, that an operator could accidentally (or deliberately) suggest false guilt under those drugs because they enhanced suggestibility. Their popularity in police work then waned. Yet, as recently as 1979, B.L. Danto, who was both a doctor and a police officer, recommended "The Use of Brevital Sodium in Police Investigation" to overcome "unconscious resistance" and interrogate suspects. He argued that, whereas not everyone is susceptible to hypnotic induction, everybody is susceptible to Sodium Brevital.

Research on Narcohypnosis—During the Moscow show trials of 1937 and 1938, one by one, formerly strong, rational, and socially significant Communists (who had somehow gotten on Stalin's black list) humbly and publicly confessed to unlikely crimes. A European OSS agent, Allen Dulles, interviewed German chemical company executives after World War II. They believed the confessions were achieved by drug-hypnosis.

[1] The words narcosynthesis, narcohypnosis, and narcoanalysis all mean the same thing: Freudian analysis (or hypnotherapy) using drug induction and hypnotic training as the foundation of the therapy process.

[2] Both of those Grinker and Spiegel books were funded by the Josiah Macy, Jr. Foundation (OSS funds conduit) and "privately" distributed.

[3] I haven't read it. Estabrooks said the Watkins techniques "give us a picture of hypnotism that is weird and fascinating."

In 1942, Donovan formed a committee of psychiatrists and biochemists to investigate the drugs that might be used to extract data from an unwilling person. The Germans were also researching narcohypnotic technology. In 1944, the Gestapo in Hungary, aided by a Hungarian hypnotist named Volgyesi, used a drug-hypnosis combination to create a suggestible state, then interrogate and "prepare" people for trial.

In 1947, special military investigation teams carefully sifted through the records at Dachau where the German mind-control experiments had been conducted. The teams sent their findings, including descriptions of Nazi narcohypnotic experiments, back to the CIA. "None of the German mind-control research was ever made public." (John Marks, 1979, pp. 4-5)

After Dulles became head of the CIA, he created an elite team to research mindcontrol, including every aspect of every hypnoid drug. RAND Corporation did a series of research reports for the government in the 1950s on methods to force persons (the "enemy") to do things against their will. They concluded:

> The drug technique would probably turn out to be the simplest and most efficient...and would be the most likely candidate for...hypnotizing defendants against their will. (RAND quoted in Bowart, pp. 70-71)

The CIA studied the ability of barbiturates to quickly force deep trance on resistant subjects. They learned that a person could be first drugged, and then hypnotized. Or he could be first hypnotized, then drugged to push the trance even deeper. A 1950s Air Force report on the military uses of hypnosis pointed out that hypnotic drugs increased both induction speed and trance depth.

The Air Force tested whether narcohypnosis would increase the percentage of persons who could be made somnambulists. (Bowart, p. 71) Normally 10-20% of people, in a first induction, can be taken to somnambulistic (amnesic) depth of hypnosis. With a series of inductions and intensive hypnotic training, it rises to 75%. A RAND report said about 90% of the population would become somnambulists if trained under narcohypnosis. (Bowart, p. 71) Other experts have said narcohypnosis could train 95%. Lindner said "all."

Practitioners of narcohypnosis learned that injection works fastest. Oral doses take half an hour for full effect. Horsley compared oral and injected doses:

> Any of the quick-acting barbiturates may be given by mouth, where they will produce a similar effect but of delayed and more gradual onset...[the] intravenous method possesses the considerable advantages of speed, accuracy of dose, and greater force of suggestibility. However...the oral administration of a rapidly acting barbiturate is a valuable aid to the induction of hypnosis. (Horsley, 1952, p. 149)

The CIA, therefore, spent years studying covert ways to dose unsuspecting victims with Sodium Amytal or Sodium Pentothal. Barbiturate powder cannot be prepared in the necessary solution for injection (mixed with water) ahead of time. It is unstable when exposed to air. Even in solution, it deteriorates within half an hour. Therefore, the barbiturate solution to be injected must be mixed right before injection. So the CIA experimented with barbiturate-powder "mickeys" slipped into a drink, or delivered in aerosol sprays.

A CIA operation, targeting a Russian agent, involved both drugs and hypnosis. They were administered in a fake psychiatric-medical exam:

> Afterward, the team reported to the CIA's Director that EXPLOSIVE had revealed "extremely valuable" information and that he had been made to forget his interrogation through a hypnotically induced amnesia. (John Marks, 1979, p. 42)

It can be assumed that the CIA investigators also learned that barbiturate is rapidly destroyed by a normally functioning liver. So its effect soon wears off. It is highly addictive. It cannot be given to a nursing mother, for it enters the breast milk and may overdose the baby, suppressing its respiration. A nursing baby would have to be taken from the mother (weaned) before a series of narcohypnotic immersions for her could begin.

The optimal amounts of drug, and the best timing of doses, would also have become apparent. Candy's barbiturate conditioning was done using an intravenous-drip to control the flow and thereby her depth of trance. Intravenous-drip could, theoretically, hold her at that depth. An IV could work for Jensen, in his hidden office across the continent from everybody in Candy's life.

It would not be suitable for clandestine drugging in a situation where unexpected company might show up and see the intravenous line. A covert drugging with any risk of exposure would use oral or injected barbiturate.

If a dose large enough to result in unconsciousness (and maximally deep trance) is given by injection, suggestions can be spoken which will stick at any stage—while the subject is unconscious or in the groggy semiconscious state as the drug wears off. If the operator wants the subject to talk back, however, there is only one period in the drug's cycle in which that is possible. Immediately following injection of a large dose, the subject is unconscious.

As the subject's liver gradually throws off the narcohypnotic poison, his level of consciousness gradually rises. In the stage of complete unconsciousness, the subject doesn't speak, or doesn't speak clearly (mumbles). But as the drug wears off there is a stage during which the subject can speak clearly and answer questions. After a while, the subject is waking up from the trance. He is no longer deeply narcohypnotized.

Interrogators were frustrated by that small window of opportunity to get answers from a narcohypnotized subject. Then somebody thought of combining a barbiturate with a stimulant.

Barbiturate Plus Stimulant—Before World War II, psychiatrists noted the possibility of using barbiturate plus stimulant. Barbiturate stripped away consciousness and exposed the unconscious mind to manipulation, but the subject was very groggy. Before World War II, European police tried a dose of chemical stimulant to recover some alertness. They used

> ...strychnine or vitamin B6, or methyl-amphetamine as an antidote. This more complex procedure gives some control of the degree of relaxation. (Rolin, p. 36)

After the war, Horsley mentioned the concept of a barbiturate-stimulant combination:

> This process of conditioning by large doses of drugs, counteracted by Methedrine if the patient becomes too drowsy to think clearly, is mainly of theoretical interest, but its possibilities are sinister. (Horsley, 1952, p. 146)

Government researchers, however, believed they had a mandate to think the unthinkable, and then to accomplish it. In February, 1951, the CIA ordered six "hyposprays" and inquired about the possibility of procuring a double-barreled hypospray that could fire both barrels at once. That order also included 300 ampules of Sodium Amytal, 100 of Caffeine Sodium-benzoate, and 100 of Caffeine Sodium. (Scheflin and Opton)

The ARTICHOKE program called the technique of barbiturate followed by stimulant the "A Treatment." They began with a large enough dose of a hypnoid drug to knock out the subject's conscious mind. The subject then lay there, unconscious and still. They gave a shot of stimulant. The conscious mind stayed off-line, but the stimulant roused the subject's unconscious enough to answer questions. "Described in CIA documents as 'the twilight zone,' this groggy condition was considered optimal for interrogation." (Lee & Schlain, p. 7)

Project CHATTER—In 1947, the Navy came aboard the mind-control effort with Project CHATTER. It was an offensive tactic research project seeking ways to extract information from persons against their will, but "without torture." CHATTER lasted until 1953. The program researched barbiturate-stimulant combinations. With drug induction alone, the subject had a tendency to just lie there unconscious, "sleeping," spoiling chances of interrogation.

In one CHATTER experiment, the subject was given an injection of Sodium Pentothal to induce a deep trance, then stimulated back to semiconsciousness by an injection of Benzedrine. The operator then regressed the subject to an earlier time and suggested that he was talking to his wife:

> For roughly an hour, the subject seemed to have no idea he was not speaking with his wife but with CIA operatives trying to find out about his relationship with Soviet intelligence. (John Marks, 1979, p. 40)

In 1953, CHATTER ended. It was officially declared to have failed to reach its goal.

Barbiturate Forces Induction?

During WWII, the prestigious Menninger Clinic did much defense-oriented hypnosis research. Afterwards, however, it reported a new series of experiments, supposedly proving that Sodium Pentothal was useless to overcome the resistance of reluctant hypnotic subjects.

Since that drug is devastatingly effective at overcoming resistance, the Menninger experiments were obviously phony. Perhaps the report was intended to nudge the private sector away from use of narcohypnosis and create public and professional ignorance about this technology. Indeed, in the years since then, this has largely taken place.

Back in the Real World—Medical recognition of forced induction and forced depth maintenance by means of narcohypnosis, however, goes back at least to Schilder and Kauders, two Austrian psychiatrists of the Freudian era.

---

1. See Section V for the discussion on M.H. Erickson's equally phony experiments.

The clinical textbook they wrote mentioned:

> ...the most effective means to induce deep hypnosis in persons who are otherwise refractory, namely, the use of narcotics and sedatives. (Schilder & Kauders, pp. 34-35)

L. R. Wolberg did narcohypnosis during World War II when young men with nervous breakdowns were available by the thousands, and quick cures were badly wanted by their superior officers. He later wrote that "supplementary hypnotic drugs" solved the problem of "definite resistances to trance depth...which cannot be overcome by ordinary training procedures..." (Wolberg, Hypnoanalysis, p. 50) Horsley wrote that

> ...in resistant patients it is sometimes useful to give a full narcotic dose and to induce hypnosis during the stage of confusion while the subject is still half-asleep. (Horsley, in LeCron, Experimental Hypnosis, p. 146)

In 1949, Melvin Powers published instructions for both oral and injected barbituate use under his chapter heading "How to Hypnotize Refractory Subjects":

> Under normal circumstances, a person can not be hypnotized against his will by the power of suggestion. However, we can hypnotize a person by using drugs. (p. 24)...The technique is not involved, and skill can be easily acquired...Sodium amytal and sodium pentothal are the most commonly used. (Powers, Hypnotism Revealed, p. 52)

Narcoanalyst Lindner began with a drug induction, did hypnotic training of the narcohypnotized subject, then did a Freudian analysis under drug-hypnosis. He said that "With [narco-] hypnoanalysis it is as if surgical removal of such barriers and hazards (resistances and natural reluctances) has been accomplished." He called narcohypnosis "a means to the dissolution of the resistance noramlly present when treatment begins..." (Lindner, Rebel Without a Cause, p. 19)

Marcuse's authoritative and popular book on hypnosis (in print from 1959 to 1976) advised,

> If the patient has tremors or agitation which make it difficult for him to relax or if the patient actively resists verbal induction, then both hypnosis and drugs are required. (Marcuse, Hypnosis, pp. 131-2)

A medical doctor who wrote directions for preparing and administering barbituate in a psychiatric textbook stated:

> The use of intravenous barbiturates...is more certain and requires less time than does hypnosis. It does not, moreover, involve the emotional dependence [trust?] *often prerequisite to successful hypnosis...(Kolb, Modern Clinical Psychiatry, 1982)

T.O. Burgess (1956), an American doctor, also recommended narcohypnotic inductions for the "resistant or refractory patient":

> Refractory cases or unresponsive subjects can be made more receptive by light oral dosage of Sodium Amytal administered about half an hour before trance induction. (Burgess in LeCron, Experimental Hypnosis, p. 343)

The infamous medical ghoul, Dr. Ewan Cameron, also recommended barbiturate induction

> ...especially with apprehensive patients. This consists in the administration of a disinhibiting drug. Our preference is for intravenous sodium amytal. The use of this preparation allows one to maintain careful control over the state of the patient from minute to minute. If too little is given, then nothing is gained; if too much, then it becomes almost impossible to maintain the patient's attention at the level necessary for hypnosis...a well-developed hypnosis can be achieved by this means...Its main use is gradually to accustom the patient to the procedure of being hypnotized, so that ultimately he can be hypnotized without the use of such disinhibiting drugs. (Cameron, General Psychotherapy, 1950, pp. 222-223)

A Summary of Mind-control Uses of Barbiturate

1) Amnesia—Deep narcohypnosis immediately and severely interferes with normal memory-forming capacity. The unconscious mind retains trance-period events in its memory, but the dissociated conscious mind may not be alert and focused enough to form memory links with that data. So the subject has difficulty remembering what happened.

2) Immobilization—A large dose of barbiturate makes the subject unconscious and thus physically immobilizes him. In smaller doses, it weakens and discoordinates the subject and makes it hard, or impossible, to think, run, or plan an escape. This provides time for an operator to implant long-term control conditioning.

3) Forced Trance Induction—A subject cannot resist trance induction once the barbiturate enters his bloodstream. He cannot wake himself up after the induction (as may be possible in nonnarcotic trance), even if he finds the situation objectionable.

4) Opportunity to Carry Out Hypnosis Training—The drug speedily (oral) or instantly (injected) strips away consciousness and conscious control. It lowers consciousness and holds it down. During that period it eliminates the subject's power of will because his unconscious is exposed to a hypnotist's manipulations with no protective filtering, analyzing, and discriminating conscious layer. A drugged subject, if given no suggestions, is narcotized, but not hypnotized. He simply sleeps it off. He shows no signs of hypnosis except extreme, uncritical, suggestibility to speech heard while sleeping.

Hypnotic training is a standardized set of suggestions regarding a posthypnotic induction cue, etc. Hypnotic training can be done under regular hypnosis—or it can be done to a narcohypnotized person. Posthypnotic suggestions used to train a narcohypnotized subject are likely to include instructions to a) maintain trance at the deep level of the drug trance even after the drug has worn off; b) return to consciousness only when cued to do so by the hypnotist, rather than rising in consciousness naturally and gradually as the drug wears off; c) a re-induction cue to re-enter that same deep-level trance state any time a designated (non-drug) entry cue is perceived.

5) Speed of Induction—Horsley wrote that

> ...the main advantage of narcotic hypnosis over verbally induced hypnosis is the speed...Most normal persons respond only gradually to verbally induced hypnosis, and, as a general rule, only a light degree of hypnosis is induced during the first session. In most normal persons the depth of hypnosis can be increased at subsequent sessions, but many hours of hard work are required to produce complete amnesia and somnambulism. Once this has been achieved, however, any normal person can be rehypnotized quickly and easily. The value of narcosis is, then, that it practically eliminates the necessity for hours of preliminary sessions of instruction in how to be hypnotized. And, after a single session of narcotic hypnosis, posthypnotic suggestion is effective for the subsequent induction of hypnosis by verbal methods alone. (Horsley, 1952, pp. 148-9)

6) Depth-Conditioning—Drug induction can condition a subject for future hypnotizability and for increased trance depth. The more times that a person is hypnotized, the more easily that person can be hypnotized. The deeper a subject is pushed in one trance, the deeper that subject tends to go next time.

> The rule that a deep hypnosis, once accomplished, will facilitate all subsequent hypnoses, applies also in this instance [narcohypnotic induction]. (Schilder and Kauders, pp. 34-35)

M.H. Erickson said that narcohypnosis made it possible for most subjects to be developed to a somnambulistic (amnesic) depth. ("Hypnosis in Medicine," p. 643) Lindner said hypnotic drugs vastly increased the percentage of persons who could be trained to be somnambulists. He believed that anybody, by using drugs, could be turned into an amnesic, induction-conditioned hypnotic subject.

7) Rapport—The deeper the subject descends into a state of hypnosis (drug-induced or otherwise), the more the subject acquires the childlike characteristic attitude of exaggerated respect (awe) and unconscious obedience toward the hypnotist called rapport. Even drug-forced hypnosis causes that intense bonding, even under the cruelest circumstances.

8) Suggestibility—Drugging maximizes trance depth. Greater depth increases the strength of suggestions. Hypnoprogramming can thus be efficiently implanted. A Swiss expert on unethical hypnosis noted the dark possibilities of extremely deep trance:

> In the first stages of hypnosis the subject can preserve his personal independence; he will not carry out any action in this state of mind which runs counter to his moral or ethical beliefs. This can change to an appreciable degree as soon as the hypnosis reaches a certain depth...the subject's capacity for judgment is more or less excluded. In this state of consciousness the subject is almost wholly exposed to the suggestions which the hypnotist gives to him. The danger that criminal > advantage can be taken of hypnosis brought to such a depth has rightly been pointed out. (Hammerschlag, Hypnotism and Crime, pp. 29-30)

Christenson, a military research hypnotist, wrote:

> In narcosynthesis the subject cannot readily inhibit expression of thoughts or behaviors which are suggested by the administrant, so that the subject is no longer a 'free agent' and the question of coercion is a legitimate issue. ("Dynamics in Hypnotic Induction," in LeCron, ed, Experimental Hypnosis, p. 49)

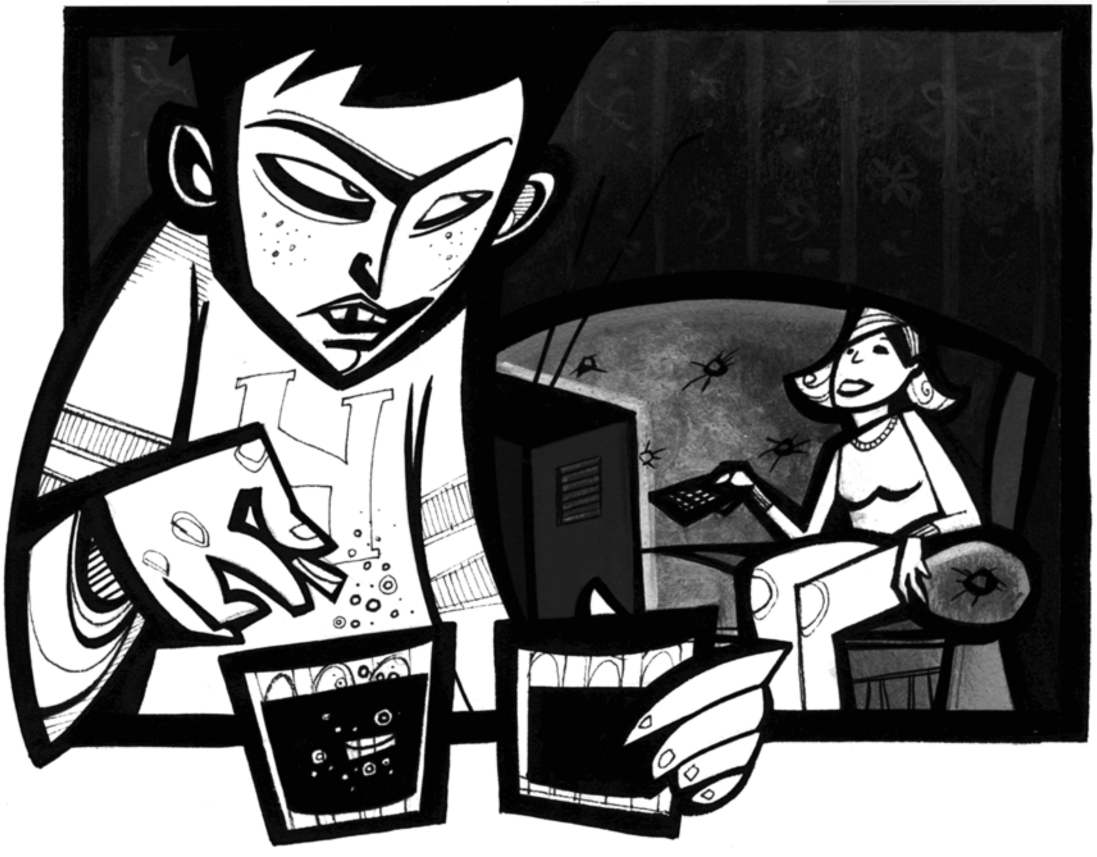
9) Addiction—The shift to lowered consciousness, whether from a drug or non-drug cause, is addictive. Induction is a "rush," a moment of pleasurable and extreme brain excitation. Rushes are addictive. "...apart from the specific suggestions by the hypnotist of well-being, it [hypnosis] commonly causes euphoria and even elation." (Horsley, p. 148) The euphoria is caused by chemical messengers settling into receptors in neurons of the brain's bliss center. Brain chemistry makes people long to reexperience a remembered intense (lowered consciousness) experience such as childhood, falling in love, etc.

Repeated barbiturate induction soon creates an humbling, enticing addiction. It takes very few times. Barbara Noel believed that her psychiatrist deliberately addicted her to barbiturate to reinforce his control. He would make her beg for the injection, then finally give it to her. (Chemical addiction can be converted by suggestion into unconscious craving for induction—even by a non-drug, cued method.)



Rohypnol

Narcohypnosis is a century old. It is also the latest thing. During three weeks, in July 1995, 101,000 tablets of Rohypnol, the "date rape drug," came into the U.S. at Laredo, Texas. Hoffmann-La Roche manufactures it in Mexico and also in South America, Europe, and Asia. Its U.S. street name is "roofies" or the "forget pill." Ten times stronger than Valium, lasting up to eight hours, Rohypnol is a narcohypnotic that can be slipped into a beverage. As with the old barbiturates, a slight overdose can depress respiration and cause death.

Electroshock

[The shock voltage is]...about equivalent to that consumed [by]...a 100-watt light bulb. This much power applied continuously would soon be lethal, but the shock timer is usually set between one-half and one second, long enough to set off a grand mal epileptic convulsion, but not long enough to kill.

Scheflin and Opton, p. 365

Electroshock has three effects which are of interest to mindcontrollers:

- Increased suggestibility
- Amnesia, even retroactive amnesia
- Calming

Here is a detailed look at each of those three uses.

Shock to Increase Suggestibility

Shock is inductive. It literally can send a person into trance (a state of relaxed "sleep"). Induction by mild shocking is called electronarcosis.[1] More intense shocking will also cause convulsion. Electroshock is also known as ECT (electroconvulsive therapy), or ECS (electroconvulsive shock).

The treatment jolts 70 to 140 volts of electricity through the subject's brain. That's enough to cause convulsions as long as the shocking continues. Dr. Ugo Cerletti, the Italian psychiatrist who demonstrated the first experimental human convulsion was fascinated:

> We observed...the onset of the classic epileptic convulsion. We were all breathless during the tonic [muscular contraction] phase of the attack, and really overwhelmed during the apnea [failure to breathe] as we watched the cadaverous cyanosis of the patient's face; the apnea of the spontaneous epileptic convulsion is always impressive, but at that moment it seemed to all of us painfully endless. Finally, with the first stertorous breathing and the first clonic [alternating contractions and relaxations] spasm, the blood flowed better...we observed...the characteristic gradual awaking of the patient "by steps." He rose to sitting position and looked at us...We asked: "What happened to you?" He answered: "I don't know. Maybe I was asleep."
> (Cerletti quoted in Marti-Ibanez, et al, pp. 91-120)

A nonprofessional also wrote a clear description of an ECT convulsion:

> The nurse at the patient's head took up two pencil-like electrodes with flat, flanged bases and smeared contact jelly on them; she and Dr. Rosen then pressed the electrodes against Mary's temples. Dr. Rosen set the dials quickly and pushed the button. At once, Mary grunted deeply, and her head jerked back...Her eyes were clenched shut, and her face was drawn into a tight, distorted mask. Her legs rose stiffly in the air, the toes and arches of her feet curled under, and her whole body now began spasmodically thrashing about. All three nurses kept hold of her, "riding," as Dr. Rosen said, with her motions to prevent self-damage. As far as I could tell, she stopped breathing. At last, after forty-five seconds...the convulsion subsided, a long gargling sound came from her throat, and as she sank down, her breathing began again. (Morton Hunt, Mental Hospital, p. 32)

CIA Researches Using Shock to Increase Suggestibility—In 1949, S. M. Korson reported "The Successful Treatment of an Obsessive-Compulsive Neurosis with Narcosynthesis Followed by Daily Electroshocks" in the Journal of Nervous and Mental Disease. Under a series of narcohypnotic inductions, Korson had developed the subject's hypnotic obedience. He then gave a series of electroshocks to cause retroactive amnesia which would prevent loss of conditioning. An obsessive-compulsive is the hardest kind of personality to hypnotize, the hardest to brainwash, the hardest to change. Any method that worked on that type patient would work on anybody. The CIA probably followed Korson's work with interest.

[1] A Hungarian psychiatrist, Volgyesi, used a mild electric shock to induce "passivity" (trance) in the 1930s. He then deepened, formalized the trance, and treated the subject with verbal suggestions.

Dr. Irving Janis of the RAND Corporation delivered a study to the CIA, in 1949, which surveyed the research done on ECT to date. He said it caused "a temporary intellectual impairment, diffuse amnesia, and general 'weakening of the ego'" This effect of being made extra suggestible, extra hypnotizable, extra persuadable continues "during the period when a series of electroshock convulsions is being administered." (Janis quoted in Bowart, p. 251) Janis recommended that the CIA should research ECT's potential for mind control.

They did. The 1950 BLUEBIRD goals include research into the mind-control uses of electroshock. In a 1951 CIA memo, Morse Allen, head of the behavior-control research program,

> ...asked if the psychiatrist had ever taken advantage of the "groggy" period that followed normal electroshock to gain hypnotic control of his patients. No, replied the psychiatrist, but he would try it in the near future and report back to the Agency. (J. Marks, 1979, pp. 25-6)

During the Korean Conflict, Dulles

> ...discovered, talking to psychiatrists in Scientific Intelligence, that electroshock treatments not only produced amnesia in patients for nonspecific periods, but when their memories started to return...at that stage it would have been possible for the Chinese and North Korean doctors to implant anti-American values. (Thomas, pp. 97-8)

An agency report speculated:

> Conceivably, electroshock convulsions might be used as an adjunctive device to achieve somnambulism in a very high percentage of the cases. ..From my own and others' investigations of the psychological effects of such treatments, I would suspect that they might tend to reduce resistance to hypnotic suggestions. It is conceivable, therefore, that electroshock treatments might be used to weaken difficult cases in order to produce a hypnotic trance of great depth. (CIA memo quoted in Bowart, p. 72)

A brainwashing specialist later summed it up:

> The short-time memory losses and the confusion produced by the treatment may actually create a state of mind that makes it easier to become free of those ideational fixations that interfere with the restructuring of attitudes. (Valenstein, p. 161)

Tien Shocks Bad Wife into Good Wife

In Detroit, Michigan, in the early 1970s, "Laura" and her husband, Tom, "bickered constantly." Laura wanted a divorce and custody of her three-year-old (hyperactive) son. A relative told the couple that Dr. Tien could save their failing marriage. Tom talked Laura into seeing Dr. Tien in one last try to save the marriage.

Dr. Tien diagnosed Laura as a "depressed, disturbed, emotionally unstable woman." Laura agreed to become a changed woman by the electroshock method (which Tien called "psychosynthesis"). It worked. As Laura sucked on a baby bottle filled with chocolate milk during the suggestible period as she was coming to after her electro-jolt and the convulsion it caused, Tien talked her into a new set of beliefs. He gave her a new name, "Susan," implanted a new self-definition, "good," not "bad," and provided her a fresh start on her married life.

Laura legally changed her name to Susan (Tien's patients often did that). In a later check-in, Laura and Tom reported their marriage now worked well. Tien said Susan had become "a more stable, mature individual than Laura ever was." Most of Tien's patients, including Susan, were grateful for their cure, according to reporter Dolores Katz in the Detroit Free Press (Feb. 11, 1973). Tien's method obviously derived from Cameron's theory of "blanking" followed by building a new personality.

Tien was profitably mass producing those "new personalities, new lives" using electro-induction and giving suggestions in the hypnotic period following the shock. He shocked hundreds of patients into new personalities—about twelve treatments a day. Tien's system was a kinder, gentler version of Dr. Ewen Cameron's shock system.

> ...the most controversial of his treatment methods is the wholesale use of electroconvulsive therapy, known to the layman as shock treatment. This is designed to 'erase' undesirable elements of an individual's personality so he can be 'reprogrammed' to function in a more desirable manner... (Katz)

Not everybody was enthused. St. Lawrence Hospital had to hire special staff members to work with Tien because regular staff refused.

Susan and his other shock-list patients received a series of around twenty treatments at the hospital on an outpatient basis, three times a week. In her periods of post-shock susceptibility, she learned to fear and loathe and hide her "bad" past.

> Tien and a nurse...place the electrodes that connect Laura to the shock treatment machine... The patient, Laura, talks of her childhood experiences while the electrodes are fitted to her head. (Ibid.)

Dr. Tien had Laura talk of running away and getting her longed-for divorce at the moment he shocked her. That is the circuit he wanted to burn out. Right before the zap, Tien asked Laura a question about her childhood:

> LAURA: ...I can't remember.
> TIEN: No? You mean the bad times were so bad you got all mixed up? So now you want your husband to divorce you and take your son away?

LAURA: No. You're mixing me up.[1] I never wanted that. I want the divorce and I want my son with me.

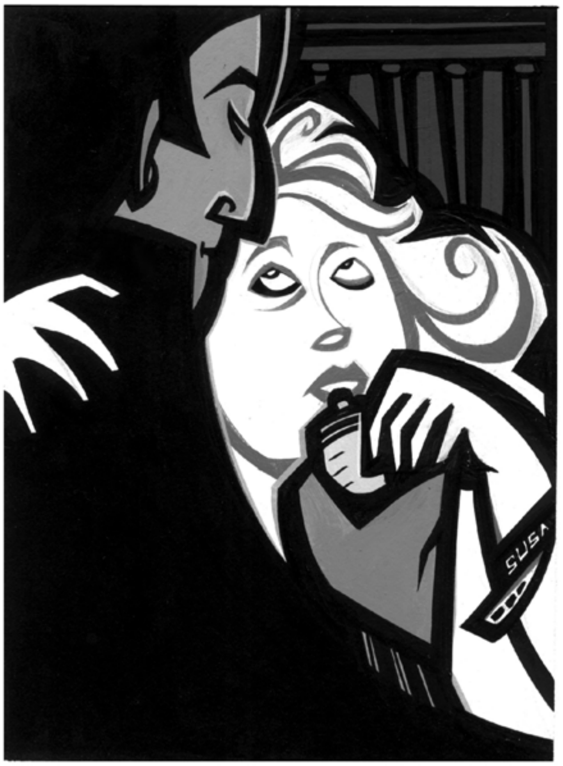
TIEN: Yes, it is all mixed up, isn't it? Do you remember running away? Just like your father ran away? Just like your mother ran away, leaving you with your grandmother? Remember running away from the orphanage? Remember running away from the foster home? Is it all coming back? You are so desperate sometimes and you feel so depressed, Laura. You can't put up with this any more. And now you want to run away from Tom. (Ibid.)

At that moment, the nurse slipped a rubber mouthpiece into Laura's mouth and the doctor hit the switch. Tien "deliberatily stimulates unpleasant memories immediately prior to the shock treatment so they can be erased."[2]



Laura's body briefly convulsed. A nurse wheeled the unconscious woman on a gurney into the next room where her husband Tom was waiting. When Laura started to wake up, Dr. Tien came in.

TIEN: Susan, your husband is here.

(Laura/Susan opens her eyes and looks submissivily at Tom, who cuddles her in his arms and attempts to feed her from the baby bottle.)

TOM: Come on, Susan, drink your milk.

Susan (childishly): I don' wan' it.

TOM: It's good for you. You're a good girl, aren't you?

(Susan begins to drink from the bottle...) (Ibid.)

The nurse had handed Tom a baby bottle filled with chocolate milk. (Tien said adults liked chocolate milk better than plain in their bottle. He said the cuddling by husband or parent while giving the bottle "makes the individual receptive to new ideas.")[3]

As Susan sucked on the bottle, Dr. Tien commenced the reprogramming:

TIEN: Have you ever been a bad girl, Susan?

SUSAN: Yeah. Sure.

TOM: No. Susan has never been bad.

TIEN: Right, Tom. It's Laura who was bad, not Susan.

*TOM: Susan's a good girl...(Ibid.)

Tien repeated that one over and over: "...the psychiatrist's voice croons, 'Susan is a good girl. She's never been bad, like Laura. Susan loves her husband. She's a good girl, Susan is.'" Then Tien moved on to specifics:

"Tell me, Susan, did your grandmother ever make you get in a doghouse?

"W-h-a?" Susan mumbled.

"No," Dr. Tien categorically stated. "Susan's grandmother never did that. Laura's grandmother did it. You're a new person now. Have you ever been in an orphanage?" (Ibid.)

Susan catches on. "No, never," she says. Laura's real childhood with all its traumas, like her root self with all its rebelliousness, is being split away from her in this semi-conscious state. "Susan" is learning repression and denial, how to lie-even to herself-about her true past. That solves the problem. She was BAD but now she's GOOD.

"Susan is a good girl...Susan loves her husband," Tien urged again. Tien stressed to his patients that they were getting "new," "good" personalities to replace "old," "bad" ones. "Susan" had wanted to leave her husband: bad girl. Now she will stay with him: good girl, and grateful for her cure.

After the treatment, Laura switched to calling herself Susan all the time.

ECT for the purpose of solving marital problems has not always ended happily. Dr. Cameron's patient named Lauren, in a similar situation, also agreed to take the ECT character cure. Her husband said she came out of her month of shockings a much better. Lauren, however, believed the shockings did not improve her. Two years later she decided her misery was definitely caused by her husband. She divorced him and declares she's been happy ever since.

[1] Confusion is also inductive and increases suggestibility.

[2] "ECT Timed with Disturbing Thoughts," Clinical Psychiatry News, Dec. 1975, p. 2, is a related article.

[3] In a 1951 article, the authors reported feeding shock patients using "a standard nursing bottle with nipple...she began to suck and was able to swallow the milk slowly but completely. To our further surprise, it was found that the other patients being [ECS] treated at this time also readily fed from nursing bottles...a return to an early, infantile mode of activity..."

Shock to Cause Retroactive Amnesia

The second mind-control use of electroshock is to erase the subject's memory for what happened during the shock series, or in the weeks immediately before it. A little shock, as from a prod, will not accomplish this. A big shock from a big shocker, called "electroconvulsive treatment," causes convulsions and memory loss. The memory loss from any series of shocks which are strong enough to cause convulsion can be retroactive. The current may be sent through both hemispheres of the brain using electrodes attached to the temples, or through only one hemisphere (right).

CIA Research on Using Shock to Cause Amnesia—In 1951, a famous psychiatrist, who was "a cleared Agency consultant," told Morse Allen that electroshocking could cause amnesia. He added that, in "the stupor following shock treatments," subjects were likely to be very loose-lipped about information. Allen was interested.

> The psychiatrist also mentioned that...these treatments could not be detected unless the subject was given EEG tests within two weeks...Allen noted that portable battery-driven electroshock machines had come on the market...the Office of Scientific Intelligence recommended that this same psychiatrist be given $100,000 in research funds "to develop electric shock and hypnotic techniques. (J. Marks, 1979, pp. 25-26)

A severe series of electroconvulsive shocks will cause retrograde amnesia: an inability to remember not only the time of shocking, but also a period of time preceding the shocking.

> There are clear memory losses for the events immediately surrounding the convulsions and with a prolonged treatment series the memory loss commonly extends further and further back in time... Most of the memories return within days or weeks, but some memory gaps persist for six months or longer and there may be permanent loss of recall of events that took place during the period of the treatment. (Valenstein, p. 159)

Dr. Ewen Cameron researched ECT extensively on his own, and for the CIA. (He hoped for a Nobel prize. The man who invented the lobotomy had received one.) He tried to depattern (blank) patients' minds by electroshocking. (Then he tried to program in new personalities by forcing the subject to listen to repeated suggestions played on an endless-loop tape—psychic driving—in a normal state or under hypnosis.)

Cameron wanted the subjects amnesic for the blanking and reprogramming. His research had shown that if "schizophrenics" remember their "symptoms," those symptoms will return. If hypnoprogrammed persons remember being conditioned, they will fight it. So both he and the CIA wanted a method that would cause permanent, leak-proof, amnesia.

Electroshock's ability to effectively erase memory of the time just before the shock greatly interested the CIA. Maybe somebody could be ordered to do something, then shocked and made to forget what they had done. Maybe an unwilling candidate could be narcohypnotized, hypnoprogrammed, and then shocked into retrograde amnesia—made unable to remember that they had been hypnoconditioned. The CIA hired researchers to find out what kinds of shocks best guarantee permanent loss of memory. Cameron received a grant.

Three Stages of ECT Amnesia

Dr. Cameron observed that his typical depatterning patient moved through three distinct amnesia stages. He named them the First, Second, and Third Electroshock Amnesia Stages (Cameron, "Production of Differential Amnesia as a Factor in the Treatment of Schizophrenia," 1960, pp. 26-33).

First Stage—In the First Stage of electroshock amnesia, the subject loses much of her recent memory, "yet she still knew where she was, why she was there, and who the people were who treated her." (J. Marks, p. 135). That is called keeping your "space-time image." The subject knows where she is, why she is there, and recognizes familiar faces. Names are harder.

Second Stage—In the Second Electroshock Amnesia Stage, the subject loses that space-time image and is aware of the loss. That awareness causes extreme anxiety. The subject wants to remember. At this stage the subject asks repeatedly, 'Where am I?', 'How did I get here?', 'What am I here for?'...

Third Stage—In this final stage, the subject becomes bizarrely calm. All the previous anxiety is gone. Cameron said this stage was:

> ...an extremely interesting constriction of the range of recollections which one ordinarily brings in to modify and enrich one's statements. Hence, what the patient talks about are only his sensations of the moment, and he talks about them almost exclusively in highly concrete terms. His remarks are entirely uninfluenced by previous recollections—nor are they governed in any way > by his forward anticipations. He lives in the immediate present. (Cameron, "Production of Differential Amnesia")

Regressive Shock

Cameron developed the policy of giving a regressive amount of ECT as the means to create an unbreachable amnesia. Regressive ECT is caused by so much shocking that the subject temporarily becomes infantile in behavior. Both regular and regressive ECT affect memory, but regressive ECT affects memory the most. Regressive ECT is caused by shocks given more frequently—as much as several times a day, or even several times an hour, or even several shocks given in rapid-fire sequence—sometimes at a stronger voltage than usual. The series of close, strong shocks is continued until regression occurred, defined as the point when the patient lost bladder control:

> They were dazed, out of contact, and for the most part, helpless. All showed incontinence of urine, and incontinence of feces was not uncommon. Most of them were underactive and did not talk spontaneously...They appeared prostrated and apathetic. At the time most of them whined, whimpered and cried readily...They could usually be made to walk if led and supported, but their movements were slow, uncertain and clumsy...They could not dress themselves and none...could complete the task of extracting a match from a matchbox and lighting the match. (Rothschild, p. 148)

Post-Shock Recovery—Scheflin and Opton compared the recovery of patients from ECT treatments to people who are very gradually

> ...coming out of a dead-drunken state, progressing back toward sobriety through the stages of blotto, soused, sodden, plain drunk and merely high...At first the patients do not know who they are, where they are, or what has happened to them...Gradually the world comes back into focus. (Scheflin & Opton, p. 366)

It took seven to ten days free of shocks for the subjects to come out of their torpor. They came out of it missing time. They also underperformed mentally, only gradually recovering over the next five years. (J. Marks, p. 107) Over time, the subject's amnesia gradually receded. However, in cases where a regressive amount of shocking had been given, Cameron wrote, "it is rare to find that any memories of the period of hospital treatment are brought back."

I once met a woman whose mother had briefly been hospitalized in the Deep South for a nervous breakdown. While in the hospital, this patient had been assaulted and raped by a black man, and had become pregnant as a result. The hospital forced her to endure an abortion, then electroshocked her into a condition of complete amnesia for what had happened, thus also erasing a source of potential liability.

In later years, the woman often complained to her daughter that, "There are patches in my memory that I just can't remember." It bothered her a lot, but she never overcame the amnesia. Her husband and pastor knew the truth about what had happened. It was from them that the daughter finally learned the full story, after her mother's death.

Shock to Cause "Calm"

An electroconvulsive shock series that reaches Cameron's Phase Three results in a temporarily emotionless, "calm," subject. Shocking has been, and still is, a treatment for depressed patients and for unmanageable ones because of this post-shock characteristic of being subdued and obedient. An English psychiatrist wrote, in 1947: "The quiet cooperation of the [electroshocked] patient will be appreciated by the nursing staff." (Thorpe, pp. 89-92) To manage "a patient in a state of wild excitement" he recommended

> ..."intensive therapy"...that which commences with several shocks daily until the excited state is suppressed, and by this method the most maniacal patient can be rapidly and dramatically brought under control. (Ibid.)

Anybody who is wildly and dramatically protesting the injustice of what is being done to him can also be brought under control. Because of the retroactive amnesia, he may then forget what the fuss was all about.

In 1993, I met a young woman who works as a nurse's aid in a downtown Seattle hospital which has a big mental ward. I mentioned that my college psychology professor had just told us that shock therapy was now outdated and seldom used.

The nurse's aid looked astonished. She said, "They use it lots." A few days later, I heard on the radio that electroshock is the single most common treatment for hospitalized mental patients.

Truth, crushed to earth, will rise again.
-William Cullen Bryant, "The Battlefield"

George Estabrooks proposed, over and over, that superspies with one-way amnesia should be created by deliberate personality splitting. An absolutely dependable, unbreakable amnesia for all events under hypnosis is the most essential single element to create an unknowing, authority-controlled hypnotic subject. A split personality is a very hard form of amnesia to overcome.

Is artificial personality splitting possible? A college psychology text declares: "Multiple personality is a rare event and there are no experimental means for producing it." (Coon, p. 38) That statement, however, is FALSE. The artificial creation of multiple personality was discussed for years in the psychological literature, and experiments were done—successfully.

> We know a great deal about multiple personality... and can now produce the condition on demand through hypnosis. (M.E.Wright in Estabrooks, ed., Hypnosis: Current Problems, p. 234)

The "Dual I"

In the 1800s, the hysterical disorders (dissociation, amnesia, conversion reaction, and multiple personality, all symptoms of excessive repression) were becoming understood. Scholars observed that hypnosis sometimes resulted in the spontaneous appearance of another personality. And they noticed that the dissociation caused by hypnotism could result in an amnesia similar to the amnesia of a multiple personality.

The first person who deliberately tried to split a personality was a French doctor named Azam. In 1858, he tried "to bring about the phenomena of the dual 'I' artificially, by means of hypnosis." (Hammerschlag, p. 14) The study of hypnotic dissociation and case descriptions of dual and multiple personalities were now underway. Hypnotists and psychiatrists (often the same persons), learned that dual, or multiple, personality could be cured by hypnotism—and caused by hypnotism.

Max Dessoir, around 1890, declared that everybody's mind contained the potential of a second personality which could be hypnotically stimulated into such strength that it would put the original personality at risk. Pierre Janet described a theory of dissociation in 1889:

> Things happen as if an idea, a partial system of thoughts, emancipated itself, became independent and developed itself on its own account. The result is, on the one hand, that it develops far too much, and, on the other hand, that consciousness appears no longer to control it. (Janet, The Major Symptoms of Hysteria, p. 42).

Dissociation was Janet's explanation for hypnotic amnesia, split personalities, etc. He believed that a split personality was caused by the "overdevelopment" of a dissociated subsystem which, if large enough, could become a rival for selfhood.

In 1945, Dr. Wolberg wrote about creating "dual personality" in his psychiatric patients:

> ...dual personality may be created by a relatively simple technic...The patient is told while in deep hypnosis that the [designated] part of him...is another individual of whom he is unaware. This new personality, however, knows all about him. A name may be given to this alter ego, and it may then begin to function as a distinct entity, with wishes and attitudes of its own...With proper suggestions the analyst can take the second personality into his confidence as an ally... (Hypnoanalysis, p. 280)

Speaking of the case history of Mrs. E., Dr. Reiter wrote: "Bit by bit he [Bergen] had built up a secondary personality within her, which it was extremely difficult to bring to light." In analyzing Palle Hardwick's case, the doctor referred again and again to

> ...the artificially produced splitting of H's personality...(p. 7)...the prompt and automatic carrying out of the given suggestions and the subsequent loss of memory about what passed under the hypnosis, in other words a complete and artificial splitting into two separate personalities. (Reiter, p. 65)

How did the hypno-exploiters, Bergen and Nielsen, split the personalities of Mrs. E. and Palle? Dr. Reiter said it took two things to make a personality split: automatic obedience and complete amnesia. Automatic obedience makes the artificial shifting from one personality to another happen, on cue from the hypnotist. Complete amnesia keeps the subject ignorant of that shift. Then he does not try to fix it. A healthy person has been given a mental disease (split personality) and made to function like a sick one.

In 1968, H. D. Birns published a book on hypnosis that described personality splitting:

> The starting place to deliberately create a manageable multiple personality is, of course, with a normal person who has a self-controlled conscious and a self-controlled unconscious. The next step is to displace the conscious will, substituting the will of the hypnotist. That goal would require achieving a very deep state of hypnosis with the subject...
> The techniques, and modifications of techniques, used in hypnosis may be numerous, but their purpose is the same: to enable the hypnotist to unseat the conscious mind from its accustomed place of authority so that he can take over control of the body. (p. 29) ...a hypnotist who has complete control of a subject is like a driver operating an automobile. And while the likeness is true, it's not really quite accurate because it doesn't do justice to the awesome powers that the hypnotist possesses. (Birns, p. 39)

Birns said that the last step was to "...create a split in the subject's unconscious that identifies with and acts in the place of the hypnotist—like the internalized parental figure in a normal subconscious."

Dr. William Sargant, a British brainwashing expert, wrote about Pavlov's technique for giving dogs nervous breakdowns:

> Hypnoid, paradoxical and ultraparadoxical states of brain activity can also cause a splitting of the stream of consciousness, so that certain thoughts, memories, or patterns of behavior implanted in the brain somehow become isolated and totally divorced from the main stream of consciousness, memory and behavior (pp. 12-13)...In the hypnoid phase of brain activity, the mind may also become split. Pavlov showed with his dogs how one small special area of cortical brain activity could be so specially excited that it resulted in reflex inhibition of much of the rest of the ordinary cortical activity.* (Sargant, 1974, p. 34)

Sargant also wrote about research on human mind-splitting using verbal midbrain implants developed while the subject was hypnotized:

> Pavlov thought that the alterations were sited in the cortex, but we now know that the process could easily be initiated by alterations in the other part of the brain, for example, the reticular area of the midbrain. (Ibid.)

CIA Researches Subconscious Isolation

The CIA also researched artificial personality splitting. In private memos, they called an artificially-created, new personality a subconscious isolate. The CIA goal was to create a split so deep, so wide, so complex, that reunification (and, therefore, conscious remembering) would be impossible. They sought permanent changes. They wanted to bury their secrets in a subconscious isolate that could never escape and tell.

The CIA called the process of creating an unknowing hypnotic subject the "application of SI." One goal-setting memo asked: "Can we obtain control of the future activities (physical and mental) of any individual, willing or unwilling, by application of SI and H techniques?" (It can be assumed that SI stood for "subconscious isolation" and H meant "hypnotic.")

A November 9, 1950, BLUEBIRD PROJECT memo repeated that SI goal:

> ...it is recommended that BLUEBIRD conduct experiments and develop techniques to determine the possibilities and the practicability of positive use of SI on willing and unwilling subjects for operational purposes. Positive use of SI would be for the purpose of operational control of individuals to perform specific tasks under post hypnotic suggestion...

After SI and H techniques were applied, the subject's conscious mind did not know that it now contained a subconscious isolate which would robotically obey its operator's hypnotic cues and instructions (and know everything the conscious mind did not know). Subconscious isolation created amnesia. That increased "compliance to suggested acts." (Scheflin and Opton, p. 115).

After Condon's novel came out in 1959, the term Manchurian Candidate became the popular name for an unknowing hypnoprogrammed person. Candy Jones was narcohypnotized into a "Candidate" in 1960.

History of Research on Artificial Neurosis

We undertook to produce synthetically a complete model of a stable neurosis...We took a model of neurosis because in it are found those properties of a stable conflict, of a prolonged affective disorganization of behavior...

Luria, The Nature of Human Conflicts

An artificial neurosis is a conflict between an urge and an inhibition, which has been implanted in a person's unconscious under hypnosis, and then hidden there by suggested amnesia. The hypnotist suggests the urge, the amnesia, and perhaps also the inhibition.

Pavlov Applies Freud

An artificial neurosis is created by applying Pavlovian methodology to Freudian theory. Freud determined that neurosis and its resulting symptoms may be caused by an unresolved, unconscious conflict (such as between an inappropriate sexual desire and conscience). That's how natural repression causes natural neurosis. Freud used his understanding of this natural cause of neurosis to help the patient. Because, if the repressed memory can be remembered, the patient usually will deal with the conflict and cure himself.

Pavlov undertook to cause neurosis, instead of cure it. He defined neurosis as "a chronic deviation of the higher nervous activity, lasting weeks, months, and even years." If he could experimentally cause neurosis, using Freud's model, it would prove that particular theory correct. Pavlov's experiments succeeded. He created experimental neuroses in animals by reversing Freud's method of curing neurosis. Pavlov caused dogs to develop real neuroses. He thus demonstrated that learning can create emotional responses—and can cause one type of mental problem:

> We have definite experimental neuroses in our animals...what is analogous to human psychoses....This was the reason for my becoming thoroughly acquainted with psychiatry.... (Pavlov, Lectures on Conditioned Reflexes, p. 39)

Pavlov could produce nervous breakdowns in dogs either by overstimulating their excitatory system (stress) or their inhibitory system (repression). Or he did it by creating a conflict between excitation and inhibition. For example, he gave them severe electric shocks timed together with the arrival of food to set up a conflict between the avoidance of pain (fear) and the desire for nourishment. They were afraid to eat, but they needed food to live. They were now neurotic.

Luria Researches Artificial Neurosis

A.R. Luria continued Pavlov's research in his Soviet laboratory in the 1920s. Luria was a prominent Russian scientist: Professor of Psychology at the Academy of Communistic Education, and a Research Associate at the State Institute of Experimental Psychology in Moscow. Luria took Pavlov's research on creating artificial neurosis one step farther. Whereas Pavlov had experimented on dogs, Luria now experimented on human beings.

Luria wanted to create "a complete imperativeness of those tendencies in the area of which we provoked the conflict." (Luria, The Nature of Human Conflicts, p. 240) He wanted to be able to go into somebody's mind, tweak it a certain way, and overcome their natural will with his implanted "imperativeness." He worked for a government which liked the idea of control—of being able to change people in a specific, permanent, controlling way.

Failed Conditioning Method—Luria's first efforts to implant "imperativeness" failed. The method which had failed used a Pavlovian conditioning approach. Luria called it "a prolonged elaboration of an automatism." It failed because, after the conditioning treatment, all of his subjects remembered what had happened. Remembering, they rejected the implanted thoughts Luria was trying to drill into them. They rejected Luria's attempts to railroad their minds into "prolonged affective disorganization of behavior." Luria reported:

> ...many of our subjects were well able to adjust themselves to or correct the difficulties set before them...These results told us...that the disturbances we obtained were not of a stable and intensive character. (Ibid.)

Luria did not give up his quest to create such a complete imperativeness that the subject could not correct the difficulties. His goal was still to make a stable (permanent) and intensive (unconsciously powerful and dominant) implant in a subject's brain.

Success—To accomplish that, Luria had, somehow, to overcome the subject's natural feedback ability to observe what has happened in his mind and to self-heal by reprogramming himself.[1] So, Luria tried it again. This time he deeply hypnotized the subject and suggested amnesia. This time he succeeded. His subject's conscious mind did not reject the implanted thoughts because it didn't know they were there.

Luria never talks plainly. His book sounds like gibberish until you catch his meaning. Then you realize that Luria instructed his "technician" (a skilled hypnotist) to begin programming the subject with "a natural reaction of the personality" such as sexual desire or an aggressive impulse embodied in the emotion of anger. The hypnotist was to seek to "obtain a stable conflict of maximal strength, closely related in its structure to the more acute neurotic states."

Therefore, an imaginary incident which aroused a sexual or aggressive feeling which would predictably be opposed by conscience was suggested to the hypnotized subject. Luria found it easy to set up "a collision between our suggested activity and the natural... personality" (Luria, p. 241) when the subject was hypnotized.

Accordingly, the subject was programmed to unconsciously believe that he had sexual relations with his mother when he was a little boy, or some such. Luria thus successfully implanted into a hypnotized person "a conflict of fair stability and intensity...by direct suggestion...[to] provoke a tendency of undisputed imperativeness..." (Ibid, p. 140) The hypnotic implant set up a primitive unconscious conflict in the subject's mind, such as between desire and fear/shame or between anger and fear/shame.

[1] The brain's natural self-governing capacity requires an operational feedback circuit. When memory works normally, pain , shame, or fear can cause reprogramming. But there will be no reprogramming if memory of the problem is blocked by amnesia.

The conflict could not be resolved because it could not escape from its hole of suggested amnesia into the mind's light of reason (where the subject's conscious mind would identify it as garbage and toss it out). The implanted conflict (now permanently concealed in the subject's unconscious by suggested amnesia) would be stable because it was insulated from the subject's self-correcting mental feedback mechanism. The deep-level guilt, shame, or anger generated by that suggested fictional conflict could then be used to drive whatever "imperative" Luria wanted.

Luria had succeeded in causing the targeted stable disorganization of personality. He called that an "artificial neurosis."[1]

Artificial Neurosis Comes to the U.S.

In 1932, Horsley Gantt published his English translation of Luria's book. There were many psychoanalytically-trained medical hypnotists at that time. They were comfortable with both Freudian theory and with hypnosis. Some continued Luria's research in the United States.

In 1934 and 1935, M.H. Erickson published his research on artificial neurosis. He said the implanted lie should be "a reproachable act committed by the subject—an act which would be contrary to the subject's usual personality trends." (Erickson, Huston, and Shakow, 1934, p. 66) In another Erickson experiment,

> ...hypnotized medical students were told they had illegally performed an abortion...he was able (in nine out of twelve subjects) to suggest the presence of conflict, to induce guilt feelings, and to proceed successfully with the experiment; that is, to obtain in six of his subjects both psychological and physiological disturbances. (Marcuse, Hypnosis: Fact and Fiction, p. 112)

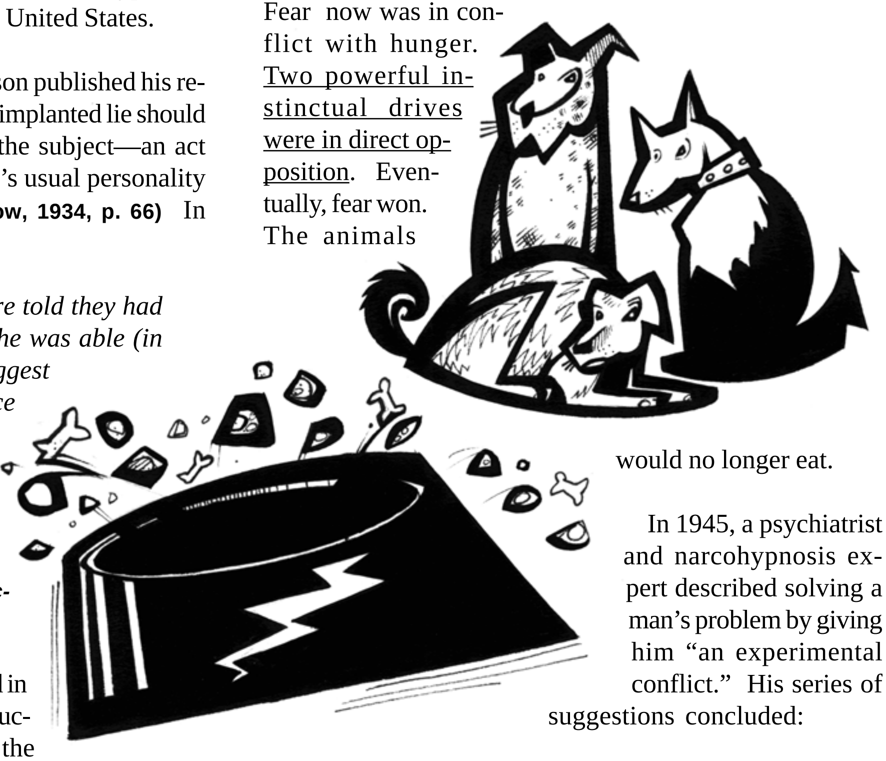
In 1942, P. L. Harriman reported in an article called "The Experimental Production of Some Phenomena Related to the Multiple Personality" that he had implanted conflicts, under deep hypnosis, in ten subjects. Then he concealed the implants from the subjects' conscious minds by suggested amnesia. He used automatic writing to test whether the implanted conflict was finding unconscious expression. The subjects were consciously unaware of their implanted conflicts (and of their automatic writing), but the writing which he suggested that they do while hypnotized showed that their conflicts were unconsciously active. Their "personalities had been changed."

Jules H. Masserman was a University of Chicago psychiatrist who continued the work of integrating Pavlovian concepts of conditioning with Freudian concepts. In a 1943 book, Behavior and Neuroses, Masserman explained compulsions, obsessions, masochism, etc., in terms of the Pavlovian/Freudian linkage. His conditioning theories were based on animal research—experimental neuroses he created in cats and dogs.

Masserman taught animals to find food by opening a food box in their cage in response to a certain noise. Then, the moment the animal opened the box, he gave a severe electric shock, or a terrifying blast of air. It took only one or two such incidents to make the animals neurotic. Fear now was in conflict with hunger. Two powerful instinctual drives were in direct opposition. Eventually, fear won. The animals would no longer eat.



In 1945, a psychiatrist and narcohypnosis expert described solving a man's problem by giving him "an experimental conflict." His series of suggestions concluded:

> You will not consciously know what it is, but it will nevertheless be on your mind. It will...govern your actions and speech, although you will not

---

[1] Modern knowledge of the molecular basis of brain chemistry and the various emotional states has caused near abandonment of investigation into mental distress caused by stress or misprogramming. It is so much easier just to give somebody a pill which will repress excess neurotransmitter or to cause a shortage of some kind of neurotransmitter rather than to struggle trying to change problem programming or problem circumstances. Most cases of mental illness are caused by dysfunctions of brain chemistry and drugs are the answer. But, in some cases, the problem is the client's life circumstances, or his programming. In those cases, the best treatment would be non-drug. Change the patient's circumstances or the patient's beliefs (programming).

> be aware that it is doing so. (Wolberg, Hypnoanalysis, p. 302)

By the late 1960s, hundreds of hypnotic experiments had been done on hypnotically-caused emotional states and shifts of state, such as depression, elation, and rage. For decades, researchers also studied repression, rationalization, and displacement using suggested unconscious conflicts. They established that:

> With the aid of hypnotism it is possible to reproduce, artificially and temporarily, the diverse symptoms of hysteria, or with equal ease to make a manageable laboratory model of compulsion neurosis. By the same means, one can create an artificial "complex," making it effectively "unconscious," and, for the first time under controlled conditions with known antecedents, study the irruption of unconscious strivings into the normal stream of behavior and the methods of defense set up against them. (R. W. White quoted in Moss, Hypnosis in Perspective, p. 119)

Young's classic list of hypnotic techniques that can be used for unethical purposes ended with artificial neurosis. He explained that

> ...by means of illusions, delusions, age regression, transidentification, and other powerful devices available in hypnosis, the personality can be temporarily so altered as to circumvent the ego demands and implant complexes which are as bona fide as those of a neurosis or a psychosis... (Young, 1952, pp. 406-7)

Focus Shifts to Child, Real or Suggested

Could they [adults] be returned to a state of neurologic and psychologic infancy for a short period, and then could new patterns of behavior be introduced?

Ewen Cameron, quoted in John Marks, The Search for the Manchurian Candidate, p. 108

In the 1950s, research on methods of artificial personality splitting also began to make use of the Freudian views of early childhood development and the psychology of the hypnotic subject.

Freudian Hypnosis Researchers

Sandor Ferenczi was one of the first psychoanalytic (Freudian) hypnosis researchers. Writing between 1916 and 1926, he hypothesized that hypnosis resurrects and reactivates a childlike persona in the subject's unconscious. He said that persona is characterized by abject dependency and Oedipal cravings toward the hypnotist (who is unconsciously viewed as parent). Ferenczi believed that a normal adult represses the unconscious wish to regress to childhood, but trance turns off the conscious mind and frees those immature desires to shape the subject's role in the hypnotic relationship.

> ...the situation during hypnosis tends to favor a conscious and unconscious imaginary return to childhood, and to awaken reminiscences, hidden away in everyone, that date from the time of childlike obedience. (Ferenczi, Contributions to Psychoanalysis, p. 375)

Ferenczi defined two styles of hypnotic induction and management which reflected that regressive element. He called them maternal and paternal. The maternal style of induction is conventional, gradual, polite, considerate, gentle, cooperative, and based on love or persuasion. A maternal-style hypnotist's voice is warm and friendly. A maternal induction lulls, persuades, or bores the subject into trance. Ferenczi said that a subject in a maternal hypnosis rapport is motivated by a need for love.

The paternal induction style is abrupt, shocking, dictatorial, highly authoritarian in tone, a domineering technique based on fear. A paternal-style induction uses a fast, directive induction method with a cold, unfriendly tone of voice. Ferenczi said that paternal hypnosis reawakens the hating and fearing attitude learned by a little child when disciplined by his parents. He said that, in paternal hypnosis, the subject is motivated by need for "abasement" and for "compliance." According to psychoanalysts, that need for abasement is an infantile, erotic, masochistic complex. Such a subject is in awe of the hypnotist, and submits to the operator's demands out of fear of him.

> ...the hypnotist with the imposing exterior, who works by frightening and startling...[is like] the stern, all-powerful father, to believe in, to obey, to imitate whom, is the highest ambition of every child...[hypnosis] consists in the deliberate establishment of conditions under which the tendency to blind belief and uncritical obedience present in ev- > eryone, but usually kept repressed by the censor (remains of the infantile-erotic loving and fearing of the parents), may unconsciously be transferred to the person hypnotizing... (Ferenczi, Sex in Psychoanalysis, Ch. 2)

Ferenczi believed instinctive Oedipal impulses were at the very center of hypnosis.

> The capacity to be hypnotized...depends on the positive, although unconscious, sexual attitude which the person being hypnotized adopts in regard to the hypnotist....[The hypnotic subject] is really in love with the hypnotist, and has brought this tendency from the nursery. (Ferenczi, Theory and Technique of Psychoanalysis, p. 473)

Hypnosis always arouses a childlike state of mind: dependence and transference. Transference means relating to the hypnotist as if to a parent figure, hero, or godlike spiritual leader.

> ...the hypnotic subject is being directed to assume a state of mind in which mature discriminations are excluded and childish dependence upon the hypnotist is encouraged. As some people are pleased to be in a state where life seems narrowed down to an easily manageable level of closeness with a powerful guiding parent, hypnosis is in no danger of extinction... (Kovel, p. 209)

In the midst of World War II, Margaret Estabrook reported, in a Seattle newspaper, on research which created an artificial childhood:

> *...hypnosis is a peculiar relationship between two people. The hypnotist is a figure of parental authority, just as a doctor is to a patient, or a teacher to his pupil. Even more strikingly than in these other relationships, the subject tends to respond emotionally to the hypnotist in the same manner that he responded to his own parents in his childhood. In particular, "parental" commands in the form of suggestions are readily obeyed...(Margaret Estabrook, 1942, p. 1)

The artificial neurosis was created in a subconscious isolate defined as a child. The deeply hypnotized subject had been given a fake memory:

> When you were a very small child, one and a half years old, your mother was taken to the hospital and your father made you drink milk from a cup. Up to this time you had been breast-fed. You thought it was your father's fault that your mother could no longer feed you. (Estabrook, p. 1)

The artificial memory was deliberately made painful.

> When painful emotions have been aroused, as in the subject who accepted the weaning story, there is a natural tendency to forget or "repress" the cause of them. This is particularly true of childhood experiences.... (Ibid.)

Young children have a natural tendency not to remember painful things. A false memory that will predictably cause painful emotions, when implanted in a hypnochild, will be strongly repressed and resistant to uncovering and healing.

Mind-control researchers were looking for ways to cause hard-to-overcome amnesia. One way turned out to be loading a hypnochild subconscious isolate with guilt, pain, or shame.

Natural Development of Multiple Personality

How does multiple personality develop under natural circumstances? Since Freud, psychologists have understood that the earlier a trauma happens in a person's life, the more devastating (and hard to remember) it can be. Over 95% of natural multiple personalities develop as a result of some combination of monstrous psychological, physical, and sexual abuses in childhood. All persons who suffer from spontaneous multiple personality

> ...have a history of being severely abused; the disorder is thought to stem from ways some children try to mentally isolate themselves against the horror of unremitting abuse. (Goleman, pp. C1, C6)

Sybil's life story, told by Dr. Schreiber,, is a well-known case history of a naturally-split personality. Her amnesia and multiple personalities developed during a childhood in which she was frequently beaten, shut up in closets, cruelly tortured, and nearly killed. The original Sybil-self escaped by dissociating, which created a split-self who suffered that torture instead of her.

E.R. Hilgard said that the cause of multiple personality can be traced to a "severely brutal period in childhood." (Divided Consciousness, p. 32) He detailed some elements of brutality that can result in a split personality:

> ...a disintegration of values at the heart of the family, with violent and excessive punishment, overt sexual assaults in childhood, unbalanced parental roles, one parent occasionally sadistic, the other rather passive and aloof. In resolving the conflicts over identification and guilt, and in try- > ing to cope in a context in which a unified strategy cannot work, the person divides...[and] the cause of the dissociations...lies in motivational conflicts that are often deeply unconscious. (Ibid., p. 40)

A Dutch psychoanalyst wrote in his post-WWII study of brainwashing:

> The method of systematically exploiting unconscious guilt to create submission is not too well known. Guilt may be instilled early in life...[may] burden the child with a sense of guilt when he does not understand what was unmoral or wrong about a given act. (Meerloo, The Rape of the Mind, p. 81)

A real child lacks understanding. It is a phenomenon of hypnosis that a hypnochild (created by suggestion) also does not understand. Therefore, suggested amnesia is hardest to overcome if the problem programming:

a) embodies conflict;
b) is implanted in a child, or a hypnochild;
c) has associations to psychological trauma;
d) embodies guilt and/or torture.

The Controllable Child

Here are the mental characteristics of a very young child:

- Dependence—Controllers say they are taking responsibility for another person's behavior or welfare. The silver lining of control, for the child, is the presumed privilege of dependence. A very young child must depend on adults to meet every need. Therefore, a young child humbly seeks approval and acceptance. It's a matter of survival. There's submission in any adult/child relationship, real or hypnotic.

- Does Not Clearly Distinguish Fantasy from Reality—A child does not clearly distinguish between fantasy and reality. Young children like to play pretend. Even when not playing pretend, a very young child does not distinguish reality from fantasy very well.

- Accepts Logical Inconsistencies—A young child's way of reasoning allows logical inconsistencies. That stage of nonlogical thinking is called preoperational. A very young child's mind passively accepts any logic provided by an authority figure, however preposterous it may appear to an adult mind. The child's literal and passive acceptance of whatever he is told resembles the acceptance of suggestions by a hypnotized person.

- Obedience—A child usually accepts a statement that he is guilty and believes that he deserves punishment. At the same time he internalizes the principle that he is in submission to the dominant punisher and must obey—or be punished. An adult mind understands that when the other person stops playing fair and begins to cheat, it is time to get OUT of the game. A child does not understand that.

- Natural Amnesia—Early childhood memories (before age three or four) tend to be inaccessible to adult retrieval. Very young children are naturally amnesic. Children—or hypnochild subconscious isolates—are more likely than adults to repress painful emotional memories.

- Assumption That Might Makes Right—Lawrence Kohlberg, a researcher on the development of moral reasoning in children, discovered that very young children reason on the basis that might makes right. So the child offers obedience to authority (and avoids punishment). Older they go through a "good girl," "nice boy" stage when adult approval is more important than anything else to them. So a child, or child split, might be urged to "be a good girl"—defined as doing what pleases the adult.

- Greater Imprinting Capacity—The earlier in life the programming occurs, the more deep-rooted and severe the psychological consequences are, and the more strongly driven an artificial neurosis may be.

Hypnochild Given Artificial Neurosis

The next technological advance in this black psychiatry sequence came when merely verbal hypnotic induction was replaced by narcohypnosis. It was Dr. Brickner, et al, who thus advanced this process of creating artificial neurosis. Their 1950 report, "Direct Reorientation of Behavior Patterns in Deep Narcosis (Narcoplexis)," described creation of a "psychotherapeutic method which utilizes directly certain neurophysiologic factors." The "neurophysiologic factor" was the forcing of their subject into a state of deep trance by drugging. They used intravenous sodium amytal

> ...because of the known accessibility and responsiveness of patients while under the effects of this drug. However, the doses we employed were much larger than those ordinarily used. (Brickner, 1950, p. 166)

They gave large doses in order to push the subject's chemical trance to a very deep level.

> When the brain is in that state, specific psychologic impacts often can be made with unusual directness. Frequently this results in unusually rapid psychologic changes. (Ibid., p. 194)

Even the biggest doses of barbiturate did not make the subjects "patternless." But the drug did create a physiological state of

> ...childishness and allowed the subjects' basic and primitive conditioning patterns which had been created early in life, to be stripped of their higher defenses...[and] directly susceptible to attack. (Brickner et al, 1950, p. 166)

The "higher defense" that was stripped away was the subject's conscious mind. The method was an IV drip of amobarbital sodium solution until the patient was in clinical coma.

Then Brickner read a script which pictured the patient in infancy, or early childhood. It dealt with the "early pattern" which they intended to reprogram. Each script followed the artificial neurosis model. It implanted a phony memory which was meant to become dominant over the subject's real experience, and to replace it as a psychological dynamic in his personality in order to achieve the operator's desired change in his behavior.

The script was read for an hour, either live or on tape, until the subject awoke from the drug trance. It was read to the drugged subject over and over during that hour, perhaps five times each session. They used an average of sixteen narcosis/script reading sessions to build the subject's new personality.

The script regressed the subject to early childhood and then reprogrammed him while in that drugged hypnochild state. The hypnotist pretended to be a childhood parent of the drugged patient. The script created a phony, implanted "memory." The new memory, thus implanted, was psychoanalytic dynamite. Brickner explained that an incest memory caused "unusually rapid psychologic changes." The script suggested

> ...a triangular (oedipal) situation, involving child and parents...WE HAVE NOT HESITATED TO GRANT COITAL RELATIONS WITH A PARENT...in a script... (Ibid., p. 172) [caps added]

The subject was kept totally amnesic about the new "memories." "No conscious insight is given..." (Ibid., p. 173)

Brickner's Technique, Summarized—An artificial neurosis is an implanted set of false memories. The hypnotist lies to the subject; the subject believes those lies because he is hypnotized. Brickner used the following steps:

☐ The subject received hypnotic training and conditioning under very deep barbiturate narcosis.

☐ The script addressed the subject as a child.

☐ New, false memories of childhood, intended to be the basis for major, permanent changes in the subject's personality, were implanted.

☐ The script was read to the subject over and over.

In the late ’60s, because of leaks that disturbed the public, the CIA put new mind-control research procedures into place. From then on, no Agency doctor involved in drug research would participate in outside tests, and a subject’s personal fate as a result of an experiment would not be recorded. Mindcontrol experiments involving narcohypnotic drugs conducted “outside” the Agency would now be done by persons who were not Agency doctors, and those persons would not keep written records. Soon after this new policy was in place, the CIA began a bold new mind-control research program called Operation Often.

> ...Beginning in 1969, a team of Agency scientists from the Office of Research and Development (ORD) ran a number of bizarre and potentially far-reaching experiments in mind control...The most innovative and daring doctors had been transferred to ORD, and a number of young consultants from civilian medical research laboratories had been recruited...It would be called Operation Often. (Thomas, p. 273)

Long-Term Operator-Subject Relations

What were Operation Often's goals? Did "Often" refer to a hypnotic subject in a long-term relationship with his operator? Marriage? In 1962, Orne said of the cases of Z, Mrs. E., and Palle: "In each of the reported cases a quasi-love relationship preexisted, or at least developed concurrently with the use of hypnosis." (Orne in Estabrooks (ed), Hypnosis: Current Problems, p. 171)[1] In 1972, Orne again pointed out that known cases of exploitative hypnosis had a "long history of extremely close personal association" ("Can a Hypnotized Subject Be Compelled to Carry out Otherwise Unacceptable Behavior?" p. 111). He concluded his "review of the literature" with the statement that > ...extant material does not indicate that an unsuspecting individual can be tricked into hypnosis and compelled to undertake behavior to the advantage of the hypnotist in the absence of a long term meaningful personal relationship...

If an unsuspecting individual was involved in a long-term, meaningful personal relationship, could he or she then "be tricked into hypnosis and compelled to undertake behavior advantageous to the hypnotist"? Would preexisting friendship, even love, increase vulnerability to the first induction? Would a subject who already loved his or her future hypnotist transform more efficiently into a hypno-robot after the first induction? Lifetime pairing with his subject would certainly be convenient for a hypnotist. Would this subject (a partner or spouse) be the ultimate controllable machine-mind because of the underlying love relationship? Only terminal experiments could answer all those questions.

The following case history matches the Project Often time period and research focus. The conditioning took place in early 1969, in New York, one of the two long-time centers of CIA mind-control research. The conditioning was done by a technician and his assistant, both somewhat amateur. The technician's wife had previously been conditioned and was now her husband's useful hypno-puppet. The man who acted as the technician's assistant in the upcoming experiment on his own wife would be rewarded by also gaining the imagined benefits of a hypnoprogrammed, obedient wife.

Complete, Helpless Obedience

The two Operation Often trainers aimed to maximize their subject's susceptibility to hypnosis, then to create, energize, and seal off a subconscious isolate in her lower mind. The split was designed to be maximally repressed (unconscious), maximally obedient (reflexive), and maximally operational. They would train her to enter trance on cue, at terrific speed, descending to any specified depth, even to great depth. She would learn to maintain that depth until instructed otherwise.

Her robo-split was designed to have no power of resistance or independent behavior. As in all unethical hypnosis, their goal was to put the subject into a state of "completely helpless obedience" (Young, 1952, p. 396). They wanted a combination of automatic obedience, complete posthypnotic amnesia, and irreversibility. Their control was intended to be permanent, unchangeable, never consciously known to the subject, and always available for use by the operator.

Combined Technologies

To an uninformed observer, the conditioning process they used would have seemed to be randomly cruel. Actually, it was deliberate, sophisticated, and technical. Their conditioning process combined methods from at least four major psychological traditions:

a) Hypnotic techniques (including suggested amnesia), developed by European hypnosis researchers from Puysegur to Janet

b) Conditioning methods from Pavlov and the behaviorists

c) Freudian concepts of the sexual unconscious and the dynamics of neurosis

d) Modern physical methods of psychiatry (narcohypnosis, electroshock).

The script was intended to implant permanently, into the subject's unconscious mind, a series of self-oppressing, inflexible rules. It would also change that mind into an artificially-created multiple personality. The newly created split (for whose activities her conscious mind would be amnesic) would be trained into a fully controllable hypno-robot.

The complex training script took her through a series of suggested personas. New characteristics were grafted onto each persona to evolve it into the next. The personas were:

1) Fish

2) Little girl (age two or three)

3) Slut: maximized sensuality, Oedipal script

---

[1] Coe, Kobayashi, and Howard also studied the link between the status of a longterm unknowing hypnotic subject and the nonhypnotic relationship.

4) Rules: an artificial superego which recorded operator input and provided reflexive obedience to any operator command, a "machine mind."

Each stage, each ingredient, each persona was created while the subject was under narcohypnotic immersion. Each built toward the next. Each was made into a building block for the ultimate edifice of a hypno-controllable, consciously unknowing, artificial personality split—what CIA goal-memos had called a subconscious isolate. The isolated persona was intended to dwell, thereafter, hidden inside her unconscious sector of mind, knowing all she knew, but unknown to her—and capable of overruling anything she might will, if the master so commanded.

Induction, Disorientation, and Reorientation

...if one were seriously attempting to induce antisocial behavior...he would seek to falsify the whole external and subjective situation for the subject, stepwise, of course, giving the subject only such suggestions as he could assimilate and giving him time to consolidate them...Into such a misperceived and misconceived world, the hypnotist with criminal design would insinuate his orders.
P. C. Young, 1962, p. 381

Here follows a detailed description of her conditioning. First came the induction, then a disorientation process, then a reorientation.

First Induction

The subject was acquainted with the technician. She was married to the man who helped him condition her. She had previously rejected urgings to let herself be hypnotized, spoken to her hypno-robot style by the technician's wife. This fateful day, however, the urging was done by the fellows themselves, her husband and his best friend.

She succumbed to their persuasions. She gave voluntary agreement to the first induction. That was an important unconscious foundation for the coming pyramid of programming directives. Any friendship or love attitude toward a potential manipulator acts as a presuggestion that enhances the effectiveness of later hypnotic suggestions.

She had no idea what the two men really planned to do to her. They tricked the ignorant young woman into agreeing. They told her that being hypnotized would be fun. She assumed it would be just one afternoon's adventure. She was seduced by the expectation that they would spend the afternoon paying attention to her instead of going out to sit in the neighborhood tavern together (as had been often their pattern lately). Perhaps they also slipped her some oral barbiturate as a preparation, which would have rendered her even more persuadable. She had no idea that their real plan was to condition her for a lifetime of mind slavery.

The technician used a verbal sleep induction: "You're getting sleepier and sleepier. You're very tired. You're so very, very tired." He deepened the trance. He told her to lie down on the bed. She walked to the bed in the next room and lay down. He sat on a chair, at her left, beside the bed. Then he deepened her trance yet more. He told her to close her eyes. He "sealed" her eyes shut. She was not to open them again until he said she could.

As she lay with eyes "sealed" closed, he told her to stretch out her left arm and clench her fist. He said she would be unable to open that fist until he said she could. He said her entire left arm was becoming more and more stiff, and more and more numb.

Then the technician quietly stood up and walked into the adjacent room. There, out of her line of sight—if she had opened her eyes (but she did not)— the assistant handed the technician a needle filled with barbiturate in solution, which he had just prepared. The technician carried the needle into the bedroom. He repeated suggestions that her left arm was stiff and numb, with her fist firmly clenched. Then he injected the first barbiturate shot of the series into the big blue vein inside the elbow of that arm.

She did not feel the needle going in because her arm was numb. She did, however, feel the drug hit her brain. In that brief moment, before she completely lost consciousness, she realized that something was TERRIBLY WRONG. She knew he was drugging her. She had no idea why. She tried hard to wake herself up, to stop all this from happening. That effort came too late.

Disorientation

While she was deeply under the influence of the drug, the hypnotist began a deliberate disorientation process. She had no idea that she was being subjected to a period of intensive conditioning involving a deliberate, systematic procedure. The procedure involved unusual technical knowledge and would cause irreversible changes in the way her mind worked. She had no idea that one human being could do such a thing to another. Accordingly, she had no idea why the programmers—two people whom she thought she knew well—were now behaving totally, wildly, out of character. They were doing things to her that she could neither predict nor comprehend. She did not know how either of them could know how to do such a thing as this.

Those circumstances were disorienting for her. The script deliberately disoriented her even more. The script's step-by-step falsification of her situation created "a misperceived and misconceived world" into which the hypnotist's orders were insinuated.[1] P. C. Young had said that if a criminal hypnotist used carefully planned, gradual techniques, it would be possible to slowly and completely change a subject's personality into that of a hypno-slave. Indeed, that is what happened to her.

As a result of the script's suggestions, she soon feels confused, lost. She is under water. With fish. Swimming. Fish swim away. Swim back, closer again. She doesn't understand what it means.

As the operator reads the script, "Fish, mackerel, herring," he stops for an aside to his assistant: "Pickled herring," he jokes. The subject is in a deep narcohypnotic trance, so she does not comprehend the reason for their laughter. Deep trance strips away a subject's ability to respond to a joke.

The programming script continues that deliberately disorienting patter: He is telling her to "go to the fish market...down by the sea...dance with the oyster man...on the shore playing...like in Alice in Wonderland...playing with the oysterman."[2]

She tries to keep up with the changing images. They are at the fish market?

No, they are down by the sea.

She is dancing with the oyster man?

No, she is an oyster, playing with the oyster man.

She is an oyster?

No, she is a fish.

Reorientation As Fish

The operator disoriented her for place and behavior. His onslaught next shifted to an attack on her human identity. He had been talking about water and different kinds of fish. Now, he talked to her as if she were a fish too.

---

[1] This technique is also called shaping.

[2] The script seemed indebted to Lewis Carroll's poem, "The Walrus and the Carpenter," in Through The Looking Glass. That poem is a tale of callous deceit and predation. It is also full of confusing riddles, contradictions, paradoxes, and word play. At its end, the Walrus and the Carpenter dine well on the naive little oysters.

> ...the most central element of brainwashing [is]...the deliberate breaking down of identity, the reduction of the individual ego to a helpless cipher...First comes the stripping away of the symbols of individuality...friends, status, name. (Scheflin and Opton, p. 60)

Her identity was stripped to such an absolute minimum that she was not even a mammal! She was an armless, legless fish. This disorientation technique had been used previously by M. H. Erickson:

> The subject was systematically subjected to a gradual disorientation for time and place, and then gradually was reoriented...The process is a slow one and involves jumping from one confusing idea to another until out of the state of general confusion the patient develops an intense need for some definite and reassuring feeling of certainty about something, whereupon he becomes only too glad to accept definite reassurance and definite commands. (Erickson quoted in Rhodes, p. 147)

The purpose of the fish's disorientation was to make her more willing to accept "some feeling of certainty about something," no matter how bizarre. They wanted her unconscious to accept their "definite commands." Now the script shifted from deliberately confusing and disorienting her to gradually reorienting her with a feeling of certainty about something (she was fish) and associated definite commands ("You will obey"). M. H. Erickson reported that

> In reorienting the patient...the hypnotist was careful to be extremely dogmatic in tone of voice, but equally vague and indefinite as to his precise meaning. (Erickson and Kubie in Rhodes, p. 147)

By repeating the postulates over and over which he wanted her unconscious mind to accept, the operator drilled them in. His language was precise, "extremely dogmatic," yet "vague and indefinite." He never let her know his real goal.

Training for "Can't Come Up"—She's a fish. She's a fish swimming in the sea and she can't come up. Not for days and days. She's a fish. She has to stay down—down, down, down. Can't come up. Fish don't come up. He says she can't come up. She has to stay down, under the water.

Capacity Regression

When a subject is regressed, in trance, to the physiological and psychological characteristics of an earlier level of development, it is called capacity regression. An older person, regressed under hypnosis to a five-year-old's mental capacity, is not truly that age. Her unconscious mind role-plays age five. Any susceptible hypnotic subject easily slips into the capacity role of any suggested age.[1] L. R. Wolberg wrote of

> ...regressing subjects to an infantile level, so that they lost the capacity for expressive speech...producing at the same time typical sucking and grasping movements... (Hypnoanalysis, p. 291)

LeCron and M.H. Erickson also demonstrated capacity regression in their research projects.[1]

Being a fish, swimming underwater, was used as an image for being in deep trance. Deep level programming is strong when formulated as an image: fish underwater. He said, "You can't come up. A fish dies if it comes up." This image was used to train her to maintain depth, and to not wake herself up from trance after they switched from narcohypnotic immersions to regular cued inductions.

"A fish dies if it comes up," the operator had said. His use of the word "die" shocked her. She was in deep drugged trance. Words are taken literally. Threats seem real, even phony ones. That was the first time one of them threatened her. With that threat, another ingredient was added to her new way of life: control by terrible threats which only her unconscious mind heard and remembered.

A fish is subhuman. Fish heard him say over and over, "I am the master. You will obey." It was as fish that she first experienced and gradually adapted to a psychological environment of seemingly endless humiliation, pain, and depersonalization: "He is the master. I will obey... servant... fish...I am not a person."

She was fish. Swimming in water. At this stage of the conditioning, they "fed" the fish with needles, each loaded with narcohypnotic drug—but perhaps there was less drug and more water each injection. She was being trained to be a fish, not a person. She was now a nonperson who would always obey the master, and who "can't come up."

[1] Pretended age regression can look the same as true hypnotic regression to observers, but the subject's mental experience of that event is entirely different. In some studies of capacity regression hypnotic subjects have behaved somewhat older than the actual suggested age. The best hypnotic subjects are intellectually talented and tend to be ahead of the usual childhood developmental norms.

Little Girl—The script continued to pyramid instructions in her mind. (A succession of instructions maintains, or increases, hypnotic depth.) The fish was now allowed to take on some qualities of a person, but only those of a very young person. "A worthless little girl," the operator now called her. He told fish she was not very smart. He limited her to a two-, or three-year-old level of intellect. He let the fish be vocal, but with only a child's capacity for speech.

"Fish," she said, her intellectual function and speech now limited by capacity regression. Brainwashers know that when a person is treated like a child by persons who have ABSOLUTE CONTROL of her environment, she tends to act more and more childlike. She also tends to become dependent on her keepers.

Deprivation/Partial Restoration Technique

Candy's split was rooted in her imaginary, child playmate, but allowed to emerge as an adult persona. The Operation Often script was a more advanced hypnoprogramming technology. It created a child split who was programmed to remain a child. Permanent capacity regression made the fish-child split more programmable, vulnerable, submissive, and gullible.

Taking away all of a set of qualities (her humanness), then giving back only part of that set (only childlike human qualities) was another Ericksonian technique. In 1932, Erickson reported a four-step method of eliciting profound obedience in hypnotic subjects. He hypnotized persons who could see normally, then suggested total blindness. Then he suggested that they were merely colorblind. After his distressing demand for total deprivation of sight, his subjects gladly accepted a suggestion of partial restoration of sight—even though it was marred by suggested color-blindness.

Erickson used a four-step process to get that profound obedience:

> 1) "Slow, gradual induction of a profound somnambulistic trance."
>
> 2) Deepening of trance to absolute greatest possible depth.
>
> 3) Suggestion of extreme deprivation, followed by conditional restoration of the privilege.
> 4) "The induction of a profound amnesia, to ensue at once and to persist indefinitely....In addition, there were given vague general instructions serving to effect an inclusion in the amnesia of all connotations and associations..." (M. H. Erickson, "The Induction of Color Blindness," pp. 62-63)

He first suggested total blindness (the complete deprivation)

> ...to permit the spontaneous development of affective distress and anxiety over the subjective visual loss...[This was followed by] "restoring" vision in part, yet leaving a "limited" blindness, which would preclude the seeing of a certain color or colors. (Ibid., p. 63)

Following this model, she was first stripped of all humanness and became the fish. Then some limited, specified human qualities were restored to her.

Sex Conditioning: A Pseudo-Oedipal Stage

...the person to be dehumanized is forced to engage in acts of which he or she is deeply ashamed.
Scheflin & Opton, p. 60

"You don't have any brains," the technician told the fish-child. "Well, you have a few brains," he amended, "but they're located here." He touched her pubic mound.

The next stage of this subject's conditioning was the implanting of an artificial neurosis modeled on Freudian concepts of toddler psychological dynamics. She was immersed in an Oedipal scenario which would maximally stimulate erotic longings for the love of father and produce fear of mother. This conflict would make her a split personality.

> The early childhood wishes of an individual cause him to become hypnotized and thus gain gratification by expressing his Oedipus complex. Thus the individual regresses back to childhood which allows him to express his repressed love for one parent and his fear of the other.
> (Kuhn and Russo, p. 61)

Types and Degrees of Suggested Physiological Arousal

Under deep hypnosis, any physiological function can be affected by suggestion. Heart rate can be increased or decreased. The temperature of the entire body, or any designated part of it, can be raised or lowered. Mysterious blisters can be produced by suggestion. And then, by suggestion, they can be eliminated. Vomiting, miscarrying, and the start-up or stopping of breast milk production have all been successfully suggested. Much research has also been done on causing sexual excitement, by mere suggestion, to a hypnotized subject.

In 1884, Ladame, a French hypnosis researcher, mentioned a case in which "...it proved sufficient to blow lightly on the palm of our patient to trigger both a sexual orgasm and a complete reenactment of the coitus." (Ladame, 1884, pp. 333-334) In an even more extreme experiment

> ...Tissie hypnotized a patient, and suggested to him that the right ring finger would indicate sexual desire, and the left, abstinence. When the patient awoke, contact with the right ring finger caused sexual excitement, contact with the left subdued it. Once Tissie forgot to remove the suggestion, and the consequence was that for twenty-four hours the patient was unable to refrain from coitus and masturbation, as well as spontaneous emissions. (Moll, 1982 reprint, p. 119)

In 1962, Gerald S. Blum reported his experimental investigations of psychoanalytic theory, his development of a cybernetic concept of how the mind works, and his research on degrees of affective arousal.[1] Blum united psychoanalytic research on hypnosis, concepts from computer programming, and modern studies of brain function. He called his hypnotic training regimens programming. He worked to

> ...develop models of mental processes patterned after those of cybernetic circuitry. Cognitive arousal is viewed as analogous to an electronic gain control that serves to amplify the signal regardless of the informational content. Affective arousal is conceptualized as ranging from free-floating pleasure to free-floating anxiety." (Blum, "Hypnotic Programming Techniques in Psychological Experiments," in Estabrooks, ed., Hypnosis, 1962)

Blum experimented on "small numbers of highly trained hypnotic subjects, usually undergraduate students." (Ibid., p. 359) He prescreened to eliminate anybody with heart trouble or bad nerves because he was going to put them through hell. The subjects were then "trained to experience degrees of cognitive arousal, pleasure, and anxiety...degrees of organismic anxiety...levels of pleasure" (Ibid., p. 384). He measured degree of arousal by monetary equivalents. (Are you feeling $40 good, or $400 good?)

Blum explained that his suggested arousals stimulated the primary process elements of sex and aggression in his subjects. Those are deep-brain instinctual drives. Any suggestion driven by a primary process element is powerfully motivated. Hypnosis exposes

> ...the complex psychodynamic realm of primary process thinking, defense mechanisms...[of] S's [subject's] 'natural' dynamic themes to laboratory scrutiny. (Ibid., p. 385)

Hypnosis makes possible artificial programming of the subject's unconscious. That programming can create a drive which the operator can then use to power his chosen agenda.

The fish-child's programming for total unconscious surrender to the hypnotist was deeply eroticized. Sexual arousal lowers consciousness and increases suggestibility. They began this stage of the narcohypnotized fish-child's training with suggestions of mild sexual arousal. Then they built that feeling into a desperate, huge desire. They urged and pressured until the fish-child was shaped into a flaming, primeval, hungry-hungry, desire-desire id incarnate.

Masochism Suggestions

The drugged fish-child now began to hear suggestions of masochism: "Do you want to hurt? You like to hurt, don't you? This is all your fault because you love to be hurt." The script urged her to be a "willing slave." The technician said, "It's nice to hurt. Hurt is good for you."
